"Wherefore Discourage Ye the People?"

ONE of the rules for officers in the British navy is as follows: "No officer shall speak discouragingly to his mate, either on the watch or at mess, concerning the business on which he is or may be engaged." It ought to be a rule for officers engaged on the business of the King of kings; and never more so than now, when we seem likely to overdo what some one has called "the world is evil stunt." One disillusionment has followed another so rapidly that many a stout heart has felt dismay, but that is not a Christian mood. The saying of Macauley is still true: "What is new is not the horrors we see but the horror which they inspire, and that is a hopeful sign. The things that terrify us now were there before, but we were blind to them, deluded by an easy, unthinking, and sometimes cowardly optimism. Attending a meeting of ministers today is often like reading a Book of Lamentations; but it ought not to be so. Where is our faith, and what is it for? To faith must now be added a new realism which sees all that the pessimist sees, if we are to have a faith worthy of the name. The shallow optimism that sees no evil, that takes everybody at his word, that reads unsuspectingly the reassuring claims made by newspapers and political leaders on behalf of measures and developments of which they are obviously not disinterested interpreters, that takes ecclesiastical employed officers' statements of church and denominational conditions at their face value—this sort of optimism is not faith at all, it is credulousness and illusion. Faith has an element of grimness about it. It faces reality unflinchingly. It explores the dark places. But it does not whimper nor groan, nor does it infect others with gloom. Its essence is courage and clear-eyed vision. Even God must find it difficult to do anything with a coward soul who refuses to face facts, and believes only what it wants to believe. There is no short and easy way to victory over the desperate evil of the world. It is a long campaign, and all our courage and strategy will be needed—"Wherefore discourage ye the people?"

Dr. Joseph Parker:
"God, and the Experts"

MUCH that has happened and is happening now recalls the famous sermon by Dr. Joseph Parker, of the City Temple, entitled "God, and the Experts." When he told a group of his young brethren what was to be his subject, he dared them to guess what his text would be. They tried valiantly, but failed. Nor did they find out until he mounted the high pulpit and announced his text: "The stone which the builders rejected has become the head of the corner." Then, after a dramatic pause, he thundered: "The builders! The men who know all about stones." It was one of those flashing insights for which he was famous, and it lets light through many of the muddles in which we find ourselves. An army of experts assembled at the peace conference in Paris, but the corner stone of a stable peace was overlooked. Again, at Washington, it is the experts who are making most of the trouble: they know so many things that they miss the main thing—perhaps because it is so simple and obvious. Expert knowledge is not enough; it has to do only with the past, whereas it is the future with which we have to do. And for that we must have vision, faith, and courage, if we are to walk where no path is into a world such as men have not known before. The Washington conference started off with a flash of vision and a stroke of daring; but, alas, the experts seem about to whittle down the proposals made, until they are but a shadow. The great things done in history have been the things which the experts said were impossible!

Murder Statistics in America

FREDERICK L. HOFFMAN, the leading authority in this country on the subject of murder, reports that in the numbers of murders to the hundred thousand of population, Maine is the most law-abiding state in the union. This state is closely followed by Vermont and New Hampshire. The state with the worst record is Mississippi. The number of murders in Mississippi is ten times as great per hundred thousand of population as in Maine where the record is 1.9 per 100,000. Chicago has the worst record of any metropolitan city in the world, but the inhabitants of that city may take comfort in the fact that after all there are many small cities in the United States where the chance of being murdered is greater than in Chicago. The most dangerous city to live in in America is Memphis, Tenn. The murder rate there is 64.5 per 100,000. In that city murder seems to be in a fair way to displace golf as the popular recreation. The figures given above for Memphis are for 1920. The previous year the rate was 70. The cities that follow Memphis in direct line are Savannah with a rate of 44; Atlanta with a rate of 40; Charlestown with a rate of 36. Comparing these cities with the Chicago rate of 7.2, it will be seen that it is the size of Chicago's population which has given this city a reputation for preeminence for homicide in the United States. The rate in New York is 5.9; Buffalo, 4.1; Newark, 3.4; Milwaukee, 3; Rochester, 1.3. The last named is the safest city in the United States to live in. The statistician indicates that contrary to popular impression the murder rate in the United States is slowly declining. The Sullivan law in New York makes it illegal to keep a gun in one's own house and this law has been widely recognized as exposing law-abiding men to felonious attacks. The low murder rate in that state, however, would seem to indicate that the law has proved helpful.

The Actor as Victim of Commercialism

MOST professions that have existed through the centuries have developed a code of professional ethics. A reputable lawyer will hardly solicit a client nor will a physician of standing advertise. Teachers are conscious of special loyalty to the truth, and a preacher of character would not be guilty of irreverence. One problem of the modern stage is its apparent lack of such ethical restraints as obtain in other professions. The difficulty has been diagnosed by many keen observers as commercialism. The pride of honest professional achievement is sacrificed to the box-office receipts. A generation ago Edwin Booth saw how things were going and made an appeal to his fellow actors. He never allowed his wife or daughter to attend a theater which he had not himself inspected. He said of the play-houses of his time: "The theater is permitted to be a mere shop for gain, open to every huckster of immoral gimcracks." He proposed that the control of theaters should be placed in the hands of the actors. Meanwhile the modern stage goes on its way unashamed. Now and then a play appears in which the moralities are not outraged. Occasionally one goes to a show in which there is clean fun without disgusting double meanings in the lines spoken by the players. More often the man of normal standards comes away with a kind of feeling that he has been tricked and besmirched. The drama at its best is one of the great instruments of inspiration. Playing upon the pity and the admiration of the spectators it may often arouse the loftiest purposes in the human soul. At its worst it becomes the side partner of the panderer and the debauchee. Attention is being drawn to the fact that the theater today is largely in the hands of men indifferent to religious conditions. Most of the big theater owners are Jews who in many cases have abjured their religion. The noble profession of acting should be no more subject to an overhead commercialism than should the profession of teacher, doctor or preacher.

Monogamy and the Church

UPON Protestant churches has rested for a long time the imputation of having less zeal for the monogamous home than do Roman Catholics. It is probably true that a majority of Protestant ministers, excepting those of the Episcopal communion, raise no fundamental question about the ethics of remarriage under certain conditions, but those whose scruples are so loose as to allow them to marry anybody who has a license and a five-dollar bill are too few to be representative. The Roman Catholic position is popularly supposed to be no remarriage under any condition. Yet the careful student knows that there are ways for the ecclesiastical authorities to get around difficulties, and recently the Catholic journal America has explained how this is done. The following are causes for which the church will declare a marriage contract null and void: Want of requisite age, impotency, disparity of worship—one or both parties being unbaptized, solemn profession in a religious order, public propriety, spiritual relations. Strictly speaking there is no such thing as a Catholic divorce, but the power to annul a marriage accomplishes the same end. Unlike the Protestant churches, the Catholic church gives no recognition to civil marriage. A marriage by a justice or a Protestant minister followed by a divorce in the civil courts would be no bar to marriage by a Catholic priest. The only marriage that is indissoluble from the Catholic point of view is a marriage solemnized by the church. Other marriages are in a different category. This has become an issue in Quebec where a real conflict has arisen between civil and church authorities over the question of marriage and divorce. Protestant sentiment needs to be strengthened continually. There can be no question that the ideal of Christianity is the union of one man and one woman until death do them part. What concessions are to be made to the weakness of humanity, and within what zone the Christian conscience may rightly permit remarriage are practical questions which must be settled in the light of that ideal.

The Shorter Bible

SO suspicious have certain self-appointed defenders of the faith become that they go about looking for a colored gentleman in every woodpile. Prof. Charles Foster Kent and a group of scholars working with him have recently produced a volume called "The Shorter Bible." This book is made up of those passages of the Scripture which have more direct and vital significance for the life of today. It is in some measure the kind of thing that has always been done by missionaries and Bible agents when they hand out a single gospel instead of a Testament, believing that the shorter book would be read while perhaps the whole Bible would not. But conservative journals see in "The Shorter Bible" some subtle scheme to subvert the faith. It must be so since the "higher critics" have produced it. The shorter Bible leaves out the long genealogical lists whose function in edification could hardly be considered indefensible by even the most pronounced literalist. The ceremonial law of the Jew is omitted, for scarcely anyone today thinks that this law has vital significance for a twentieth century American. Under the necessity of brevity it is probable that certain portions of the Bible which have some measure of significance have been omitted. But the idea of a shorter Bible which will invite people rather than repel them is a response to one of the real needs of the time. If people are to read all the Bible, they must first of all get a start. The shorter Bible is also given a fresh translation. As the church is emancipated from the letter of Scripture, these new translations that appear from time to time will cease to shock. None of us talks King James English. It is time that the most fundamental of our life interests was given a vocabulary and a volume as well understood by everybody as Luther's Bible was by the German people.

The Church's Slacker List

RECENTLY congress published the slacker list of the world war. Eleven thousand names are written on the congressional record to live through history as the names of cowardly souls. Some may not deserve a place there, but without doubt the list of names ought to be much longer than it is. If all those who used their country's emergency as an occasion to profiteer at the expense of the general welfare were tabulated it would be an interesting list to scan. The church has a slacker list much longer than the one that reposes in the archives of congress. All those who have looked upon the church from the point of view of what they could get out of it instead of how best they might fight the battles of the Lord belong on this list. Some have seen in the church a badge of respectability. Others seek business connections through the church with the best people of the town. Still others like to hear good music and a fine oration at the cost of a mere "tip" given sometime during the service. Meanwhile the battles of the Lord are to be fought. Thousands of quiet self-sacrificing men and women give up their Sunday morning rest that they may help educate some millions of children in the knowledge of God and righteousness. Church life demands frequent gatherings for good fellowship and a few unselfish women are always behind the scenes in the church kitchen. Men are needed to carry petitions in fighting the saloon or war or boss government. While the many wait for their door bells to ring, the real soldiers of the Lord take upon themselves the burdens which must be borne if the kingdom of God is ever to be ushered in. To these there is reserved the plaudit "Well done thou good and faithful servant." But what about the Lord's slackers?

British Churchmen on Social Problems

ALL reports from England indicate that the churches are taking a steadily deepening interest in social problems, especially those connected with industry and labor. Labor leaders and the unions have never been so remote from the churches in England as in other countries. The outstanding and most trusted labor leaders are churchmen, and the most trusted church leaders are no longer inhibited from stating Christianity in terms that involve radical changes in our social order. At a conference of representatives of north of England Congregational churches, held at Manchester, Rev. A. J. Viner, ex-chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, who presided, said it was not easy for the Christian churches to take an active part in the solution of industrial and economic difficulties, but they could at least insist that no kind of economic solution would endure if it failed to realize the ideals of Christianity. A Macclesfield minister said it was the recovered sense of Christ which in the nineteenth century both revolutionized theology and gave rise to the Christian socialist movement. In the name of Christianity Ruskin challenged the whole philosophy of the commercialism of his day, but the teachings of the older political economists, said the speaker, were not yet quite uprooted. A business man, who took part in the conference, said there is nothing discordant between religion and business; they rested, or should rest, on the same foundation—the principle of service. But he went on to say, we want a new spirit in commerce, and if business men do not impart it into business, how can we get it? To get rich should be the very last aim of a follower of Jesus, though he might not be able to avoid riches if wealth came to him as his business operations enriched the community. To the true Christian the rewards of business are not personal possessions but a trust." Rev. A. Penry Evans of Liverpool pointed out that while the labor program is based on Christian principles, the labor party pick and choose from them only those that affect economic affairs, ignoring the great spiritual and moral principles of Christianity. One of the great troubles today, he said, is that people are claiming Christian privileges and denying Christian obligations. "There should be a Christian socialism," he continued, "not a labor party socialism, but a Christian socialism within the church, having nothing to do with politics or any party in the state. There should be within the church a Christian band of men, sworn to Christ, exploring the possibilities of the City of God in terms of the socialistic state." He suggested that "some great public man like the Bishop of Manchester" should found within the Christian church a Christian socialist community, and if he did so the speaker, although a nonconformist, would leap to his side. The difference between a Christian socialism within the church and the socialism now existing outside would be (1) of temper, (2) of method of approach to the socialist state: it would be evolutionary, not revolutionary, and (3) the inculcation of Christian principles that are neglected by labor. Christian socialism within the church would be in touch with a great dynamic power. He believed that sooner or later a socialist state would be established in England, but there was no finality in socialism, and we should pass through the experiment to something higher.

Political Prisoners and the Christian Conscience

OUR national government permitted itself to celebrate Christmas by releasing from prison a fraction of the men imprisoned for violating the provisions of the special war-time legislation restricting civil liberties known as the espionage act. Less than thirty such men have been released, including Mr. Debs; over one hundred remain in prison. This occurs over three years after the armistice was signed and over two years after the slate of all the nations associated with us in the war was wiped clean of this score.

The record of our attitude toward those who "for conscience sake" refused to support the war is a matter which Christian intelligence can no longer decline to contemplate. We passed laws depriving such men of what they had supposed were their constitutional rights of freedom of speech and press. We enforced those laws with a degree of passion in excess of that obtaining in any other country, not excepting even Germany itself. We stretched and strained their language far beyond its face value.* For their violation we imposed sentences of ten and twenty years imprisonment while our allies were punishing similar offenders with sentences of six months to three years. When the war was over we refused to grant the amnesty that was given after our civil war on the ground that these men were criminals because they had disobeyed a statute which made the expression of opinion a criminal offense. By the same legal sophistry we might pass a law declaring wilful homicide not to be murder and there would then be no murderers in jail. Finally we let a few of these men out into the sunlight with the same action that sets free others condemned for murder. Some of them we let go on condition that they consent to deportation and pay their own expenses. The rest we do not pardon, for that would restore their citizenship rights; so we commute their sentences. In France such men had their citizenship restored by law and in England and Italy several of them are serving in the national legislatures, and that by vote largely of ex-soldiers.

Surely this latest act in the passionate tragedy of the conflict between war and conscience is a halting, grudging gesture. Yet is it perfectly typical of the feeble, fumbling manner in which we are slowly disengaging the national mind from the clutch of war propaganda and painfully feeling our way toward political sanity and Christian justice. Even this partial release of political prisoners is drawing down upon the administration the anathemas of the organs of property, certain leaders of the American Legion, and—some ministers. Yet the pressure of certain newspapers and other journals of labor and of the rest of us who still believe in the right of conscience and the validity of the constitution compelled some action. There can be little doubt that the kind of action that resulted demonstrates the representative nature of our government. At this moment the administration is the American people; kindly, sympathetic, well-meaning, but constantly failing adequately to realize its good intentions because of an over-consideration for supposedly practical interests, political and economic. We are continually stultifying and nullifying our ideals, failing to do the thing we know is right, in church as well as in state, because it will put us in conflict with some small but powerful group, whose economic interest is therefore able to assert itself successfully over our convictions.

The concessions made to the opponents of amnesty in taking up each case separately widens at once the standing room of economic interest and is liable to result in grave injustice. It must be remembered that nearly all the men convicted under the espionage act were members of either the Industrial Workers of the World, the socialist party, or the Working Class Union—an organization among the tenant farmers of the southwest. Most of these men were pacifists, but all of them were radicals and economic heretics. These latter considerations entered into their trials and they now bulk very large in the opposition to their release. How does it happen that fathers and mothers of the property owning class who lost sons in the war and naturally feel very keenly, who now insist that these political prisoners are traitors to be kept in jail because they were in reality shooting our boys in the back, were not so violently vocal when men were released like von Rintzen who actually plotted deeds of destruction against our forces?

It must not be forgotten that every man of the hundred now in prison under the espionage act is there solely for expressing his opinion. Their only offense was written or spoken opposition to the war—or language construed by the courts as liable to hinder the prosecution of the war. Almost all the men left in jail are members of the I. W. W. They were convicted wholesale (400 verdicts in 25 minutes in Chicago) under a charge of conspiracy which included alleged industrial acts and policies. But the appellate court has since thrown out the counts in the indictment relating to industrial matters on the ground of insufficient evidence. Sentences on other counts have already been served so that these men are now in prison as purely "free-speech cases." A technical exception to this statement can be made in regard to the men convicted at Sacramento because they conducted a so-called "silent defense." Convinced that justice in war prosecutions could not be obtained they refused to plead. Hence all counts in the indictment were sustained without rebuttal evidence and with no chance for appeal. But the essential facts in these cases are the same as in those reviewed by the appellate court.

It is significant that the statement issued from the white house regarding the list of prisoners released at Christmas says, "It is made up of less than a third of I. W. W. prisoners and these have either expressed full penitence or are booked for deportation.. The department of justice has given no recommendation in behalf of the advocates of sabotage or the destruction of government by force, and the President let it be known that he would not consider such cases." This is clearly a reflection of popular prejudice against the I. W. W., a prejudice whose bearing upon the conviction was so manifest to the legal officer of the military intelligence department charged with reviewing the record that his conscience compelled him to write the President urging action to right the wrong he was sure had been done. The white house statement clearly implies that the I. W. W.'s are convicted for advocacy of sabotage and violence. Now the department of justice and the white house can be excused for ignorance of the I. W. W.'s. Like most of the rest of us they have never seen one in the flesh, we know them only as interior Chinese know the "foreign devils." But it is the business of the department of justice to know the legal facts in this matter. Yet we find that department writing to the government of Denmark which had interposed regarding a Danish I. W. W., that so far it was adverse to clemency, and giving as a reason that the defendant "took an active part in the lumber workers' strike during the summer of 1917." The department of justice ought to know that the I. W. W. defendants have been acquitted of industrial offenses by the United States circuit court of appeals and are now held in prison solely for expressions of opinion on war, that not one of them is in prison on a conviction of sabotage or violence.

There are of course plenty of people who would keep these men in prison merely because they are I. W. W.'s just as they would have kept Debs in because he is a socialist, for the lawless spirit is strong just now in conservative quarters. But it is unthinkable that this spirit should find entrance into the department of justice and the white house. True we remember the illegal searches and seizure, the criminal violence of the Palmer raids and deportations; but it ought to be harder now for the lawlessness of the frightened rich to disguise itself in patriotism. To hold these I. W. W.'s in jail for offenses of which they have been acquitted, because they are popularly believed to advocate sabotage and practice violence is a procedure as unjust as it is intolerable. We cannot believe that our officials would contemplate or our nation condone such a monstrous procedure. When they understand that these men now in jail are serving sentence under precisely the same charges as the men recently set free, surely they will see to it that all shall receive that equality of treatment which is the boast of our political and judicial system.

It seems to us that the Christian ministers and teachers of the country have a particular responsibility for seeing that this result is arrived at. When they were considering the duties of the church in war time they declared for freedom of conscience. The Federal Council of Churches said: "Already free speech has been unreasonably curtailed and has been abused by the local authorities who have curtailed it. Its abuse is not so dangerous as its suppression. When the state compels men to military service it raises the ancient religious question of freedom of conscience." The I. W. W. has a right to freedom of conscience as much as the rest of us.. It was established beyond dispute in the Chicago trial and admitted by the government that continuously for twelve years prior to the declaration of war the I. W. W. had carried on the most active propaganda against both war and conscription. A good deal of the evidence offered in support of the charge of conspiracy to hinder the war was intimate and confidential correspondence about these matters in the light of our entrance into the war, letters about the stand the organization should take, and letters stating that the organization had taken no stand but that the matter was purely an individual affair to be decided in accordance with the dictates of each individual's conscientious views.

How many Christian leaders had the same conscientious views about war as the I. W. W. had? How many would feel a trifle more respect for themselves if they had followed their conscience a little further, instead of letting themselves be bullied by the crowd? It may be a bit of heart's ease for some of us now to do the unpopular thing of insisting upon justice for these Industrial Workers of the World, who now lie in jail for ten and twenty years for conscience sake. At any rate we can insist that the matter be not closed against them on the ground of their industrial philosophy and activities. Even the American Federation of Labor is doing that much. Its leaders wage unremitting and unrelenting warfare against socialism in theory and the I. W. W. in practice. Yet they have stood squarely and unanimously for general amnesty for all political prisoners, and Mr. Gompers actually visits Mr. Debs to assure him that they will go on working for release for the rest, who are nearly all I. W. W.'s. Can the church do less? Through its official bodies as well as through its pulpits?

The London Nation recently reviewing a volume of essays by Prof. Gilbert Murray described him as "a liberal to whom the vital aspect of his faith is its regard for the inherent dignity of the human soul. This attitude implies above all an insistence that the primary care in the organization of our institutions must be respect for conscience. It is, as a consequence, against every act which attempts the degradation of conscience that he is adamant." Here is the root of the matter. The church that stands by without protest while the state coerces the conscience of its industrial radicals and heretics will soon suffer the degradation of its own conscience, and the loss of its spiritual authority. The present status of political prisoners does but reiterate the challenge of the war to the church and its ministers; it asks whether they are to become once more the agents of the state to drill the conscience of the people according to the interests of those who control the state, or whether keeping their own souls in freedom they are to continue to function as the creators of conscience in the direction of their spiritual ideals.

The Preaching of Tomorrow

ONE of the most thoughtful, brilliant and timely addresses of recent years was that delivered at the opening of the eighty-sixth year of Union Seminary, New York, by Dr. Johnston Ross, and now published in the seminary bulletin. Dr. Ross has just returned from his sabbatical year, most of which he spent on the Christian frontier in the orient, and his experiences, observations and reflections during his holiday formed the background of his address. His whole address was a protest against provincialism in intellect and religion, which is doomed to death by laughter and scorn, and the disappearance of which must reshape the message and method of the preaching of tomorrow.

More specifically the address was concerned with the conditions in which the message of the Christian preacher can live, not in the esoteric atmosphere of the church only, but in the open and sometimes blustering air of the new world into which we are entering. To that end the speaker set forth four points—four “incredible platitudes,” he called them—as descriptive of what the preaching of tomorrow must be. First, it must take seriously the primacy of character as the end of preaching; the business of helping people to be good must take precedence above all else, as the end of ends in preaching—above doctrine, rituals, and every other consideration. The ultimate end of religion, he said, is the production of character, by which he meant “a disposition of respectful, ministrant goodwill.” Simple, God-anointed goodness is the one religion to foster which the church and pulpit exist, and this is the untried avenue of reunion of the churches—agreement on the centrality and supremacy of love. On the mission field, especially, there must be an enthronement of the Christian moral ideal in preaching and practice—and if that is to be so it must begin at home.

Second, it is not enough to tell people to be good; there must be the discovery of the individual, and his stimulation to goodness. If it be said that Christ is the inspiration to goodness, it is fair to ask how, precisely, does Christ help men to be good, in the sense of being incarnations of respectful ministrant goodwill? By his teaching? By his example? But it is one thing to see duty; it is another to be empowered to do it. The appalling revelation of the war was that men had reverence for the moral beauty of the character of Christ, but that reverence was linked “with an all but universal ignorance of any method of relating him to the moral life.” Is it true that Christ is still alive and active among us, quickening men to a new and haunting kind of goodness? If so, how can we make him real to men—as real, say, as the influence of their good relatives who have “passed on”? In visiting the east the speaker was impressed by the variety of stimuli used by people toward the achievement of goodness—such as the influence of the dead, of august personification of ideals, and especially of Gautama Buddha. How can we use the Christian realities to better advantage as stimuli to the goodness which is the finest flower and fulfilment of religion?

Here, as his third “platitude,” Dr. Ross adopted the formula of his colleague, Dr. Harry F. Ward, “the use of scientific knowledge to make effective the spirit of goodwill.” Science will and must be used by the preacher of tomorrow, as it has never been used before, if he is to be effective in promoting loving kindness among men. Between true science and real religion there is never any conflict, much less enmity, and the preacher of the new day will find science an aid in strengthening the sense of God in the minds of men, as well as in cultivating the worshipful spirit. Dr. Ross thinks the next step in the human advance will be a new sensitiveness of the conscience of mankind in our interpretation and use of nature, as it is revealed by science. This new discovery of nature will be concerned not only with her beauty and use, but with her meaning; her connection with the moral life, the power of an immoral use of her resources to react upon the personal and national life, and her capacity, when rightly used, to stimulate our highest aspirations.

History, too, will be revalued, the more because, as Rothe said, our Christian gospel appeared in the world as “a row of facts,” and back to those facts we must go for the sure foundation of our faith. Thus the preacher of tomorrow must seek to bring his people to terms with the God of history no less than with the God of nature. Most of the new cults ignore history, and thus reduce religion to one mental pose, or else make it a “set of dateless dogmas or mateless maxims of life.” The third dimension of science is the study of the mind which, in spite of its early crudeness, and its occasional blunders, has taught us much—for one thing, making us more anxious to teach than to excite—and will teach us more. Theology, today, bears to psychology a relation similar to that of alchemy to chemistry, but that will change, and is actually changing, and the result will be a better understanding of our relations to God and to our fellow man.

For, above all things, it is a better understanding of our fellows of other races and religions that we need, if we are to know their goodness, much less help them, and ourselves, toward that more intelligent, ministrant goodness which it is the chief aim of Christianity to create. Respect, courtesy, goodwill toward other peoples and other faiths, is fundamental in the little world in which we now live, where humanity is jammed together, and must learn love or perish. What oriental peoples, what all non-white peoples want and demand is respect. “Every missionary who goes to the orient out of mere pity for the heathen—mere pity—should be sent home.” In recent years we have loudly proclaimed our faith in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; and our task now, at home and abroad, is to take that faith seriously—so seriously that men the world over will be brought into one family of mutual respect and goodwill.

"Such preaching will be sacrificial, for it will have an experience of the cross at its heart; but for the preaching that makes love its end of ends, preaching that offers its doctrine and its central persons as stimuli to life, preaching that endeavors to use in the furtherance of its message every ascertained lesson learned in the school of science, preaching which is based on a profound respect for humanity and belief in its capacity for respectful ministrant goodwill—for preaching of this sort there has never been a finer opportunity than that which God is presenting to the preacher whose work is just beginning now."

Such, in bare outline, is the substance of a thrilling address which, in its spirit and method, illustrated the kind of preaching which it portrayed. But this sketch gives little idea of the vividness of the address, its flash and play of insight, humor, pathos, and that power of personality by which truth is made real and winsome, and which remains the secret of preaching today, as it will be tomorrow. This address, if accompanied by another of like kind—hinted at in one paragraph—dealing with the worship of tomorrow, a matter in respect of which Dr. Ross has more to tell us than any man known to us, would make a golden little book to be read and studied by the young men of today who are to be the preachers of tomorrow. We beg to make that as a motion, Mr. Chairman; we also second the motion most cordially; and it is carried—unanimously!

The Points of the Compass

A Parable of Safed the Sage

ONCE upon a time I journeyed unto a great city whose name was New York. And I lodged in an inn other than that wherein I had lodged previously. And when I arose in the morning I was Turned Around. For the North appeared unto me to be West and East appeared North. And I could not make it seem right, albeit I knew which way to go; for I had been there before.

And I went unto Twenty-third Street and stood looking toward the place where Fifth Avenue doth Gee toward the right hand and Broadway Haweth to the left. And then I recalled the vision of the town where I was born.

And straight before me I saw the little White Church, and I knew that I was looking North. And on my right down Twenty-third Street I saw the Red Brick School-House, and I knew that it was East, and behind me I knew was the Town Hall. And on my left hand I saw the house where I was born, over against the Town Pump, on Main Street where it joineth unto Richmond Street.

Thus did I pick up the city of New York and set it upon the top of a Flat Iron Building and twist it around till the points of its compass agreed with those of the town where I was born. And I was Turned Around no more.

And this same stunt have I wrought in London and Los Angeles, and in Paris and Pittsburgh; I have done it in New Orleans and I shall do it if there is occasion in the New Jerusalem, which standeth four square.

And this also have I done in Matters of Morals. For I learned other things than the points of the Compass in the little town wherein I was born. I learned the Ten Commandments, and the Golden Rule, and divers other good things. I learned invaluable Things in the Red Brick School House that is turned toward the rising of the sun, and in the Church that is toward the North Star, and in the house that stood over against the Town Pump, where Main Street joineth unto Richmond Street. And when I am perplexed concerning great matters or right and wrong, I pick up the Great Problems of Political Economy and International Law, and Corporate Responsibility, and I resolve the whole matter upon the Town Pump of the place where I was born, until I find how its Moral Directions conform to the points of the Compass in Ethicks which I learned from Godly Parents, and faithful though not brilliant pastors, and competent though not Illustrious Teachers.

Now there be those who Consider that this process is Provincial, and who think themselves Very Clever for having outgrown this method. But the Compass pointeth Straight toward the North Star in the room where I knelt by my Mother's Knee; and out of the window in the morning I did Ever behold the Rising Sun, and it rose ever in the East.

Influence

(Dedicated to all ministers of the Gospel.)

IF one shall journey calmly down the years
Nor yield to fret, disdaining fear and dread,
Still hoping when fate strikes his fortunes dead,
Still singing when the whole world's drenched in tears,
A hundred others, not so strong as he,
Shall too walk blithely through the puzzling maze
Which men call life; he shall reveal clear ways
Through darksome forests, and their eyes shall see
By his true vision dawns of deathless hues.
Each hour for them shall be joy-laden. They Shall bravely journey through the night, till Day Comes fair and golden o'er the hill. The dews Shall not tell clammy death. Through struggles rife
Their shepherd pointed them the path to Life!

Pessimist and Optimist

A YEAR of drab and uninspiring tasks,
Of weary days, nights marred by haunting fears;
Old friendships lost, new friends found insincere;
Hope turns to ashes, love proves but a wraith;
Dread takes the place of joy, despair of faith;
The days' bright faces are deceiving masks.

Three hundred days of glad and grateful toil—
Up with the dawn, homeward with day's decline;
Each task well done, as for my Lord Divine;
The winter past, comes springtime's singing choirs,
June brings the roses, and ere winter fires'
Snug comfort, autumn hoards its golden spoil.

The Aftermath of the War

By Jane Addams

[This article is the substance of a chapter in a new book by Miss Addams, to be published by Macmillans early in February, entitled "Peace and Bread in Time of War." While dealing with objective facts and events the book will, we believe, take on its chief significance from the fact that it records the interpretations of war from the point of view of a pacifist who paid a great price in maintaining her moral convictions while the conflict was on and men's passions were raging. Scarcely less poignant have been the experiences of peace minded men and women since the armistice. Miss Addams' book will throw a flood of light upon certain human aspects of the war, particularly the way in which our fierce American super-patriotism vented itself upon certain types among our immigrant communities. The book promises to be one of the most significant of the steadily enlarging post-war literature. —THE EDITOR.]

ALMOST immediately after the war, liberals began to realize that a contest was on all over the world for the preservation of that hard-won liberty which since the days of Edmund Burke had come to mean to the civilized world not only security of life and property but of opinion as well. Many people had long supposed liberalism to be freedom to know and to say, not what was popular or convenient or even what was patriotic, but what they held to be true. But those very liberals came to realize that a distinct aftermath of the war was the dominance of the mass over the individual to such an extent that it constituted a veritable revolution in our social relationships. Every part of the country had its own manifestations of suspicion and distrust which to a surprising degree fastened upon the immigrants. These felt, some of them with good reason, that they were being looked upon with suspicion and regarded as different from the rest of the world; that whatever happened in this country that was hard to understand was put off upon them, as if they alone were responsible. In such a situation they naturally became puzzled and irritated.

CLASSIFYING MEN

With all the rest of the world America fell back into the old habit of judging men, not by their individual merits or capacities, but by the categories of race and religion, thrust by them back into the part of the world in which they had been born. Many of the immigrants, Poles, Bohemians and Croatians, were eager to be called by their new names. They were keenly alive to the fresh start made in Poland, in Czecho-Slovakia, in Jugo-Slavia and in other parts of eastern and southern Europe. They knew, of course, of the redistributions in land, of the recognition of peasant proprietorship occurring not only in the various countries in which actual revolutions had taken place as in Hungary and Russia, but in other countries such as Rumania, where there has been violent revolution. These immigrants were very eager to know what share they themselves might have in these great happenings if they returned. They longed to participate in the founding of a new state which might guarantee the liberties in search of which they themselves had come to America. They were also anxious about untoward experiences which might have befallen their kinsfolk in those remote countries. For five years many of them had heard nothing directly from their families and their hearts were wrung over the possible starvation of their parents and sometimes of their wives and children.

LACK OF SYMPATHY

Had we as citizens of the United States made a widespread and generous response to this overwhelming anxiety much needed results might have accrued to ourselves; our sympathy and aid given to their kinsmen in the old world might have served to strengthen the bonds between us and the foreigners living within our borders. There was a chance to restore the word "alien" to a righteous use and to end its service as a term of reproach. To ignore the natural anxiety of the Russians and to fail to understand their inevitable resentment against an unauthorized blockade, to account for their "restlessness" by all sorts of fantastic explanations was to ignore a human situation which was full of possibilities for a fuller fellowship and understanding.

It was stated in the senate that one and a half million European immigrants had applied in the winter of '19 and '20 for return passports. In one small western city in which 800 Russians were living, 275 went to the western coast hoping for an opportunity to embark for Siberia and thus reach Russia. Most of them were denied passports and the enforced retention of so many people constantly made for what came to be called social unrest. We would sometimes hear a Russian say, "When I was in the old country I used to dream constantly of America, and of the time I might come back here, but now I go about with the same longing in my heart for Russia, and am homesick to go back to her." In Chicago many of those who tried in vain to return, began to prepare themselves in all sorts of ways for usefulness in the new Russian state. Because Russia needed skilled mechanics they themselves founded schools in applied mathematics, in mechanical drawing, in pattern work, in automobiling.

RAIDING A SCHOOL

It was one of these latter schools in Chicago, where they were so cautious that they did not teach any sort of history or economics, which was raided in the early part of January, 1920. A general raid under the direction of the federal department of justice "ran in" numbers of Chicago suspects on the second of January, but an enterprising state's attorney in Chicago, doubtless craving the political prestige to be thus gained, anticipated the federal action by twenty-four hours and conducted raids on his own account. The immigrants arrested without warrant were thrust into crowded police stations and all other available places of detention. The automobile school was carried off bodily, the teachers, the sixty-four pupils, the books and papers, the latter being considered valuable because the algebraic formulas appeared so incriminating.

One Russian among those arrested on January 1, 1920,

I had known for many years as a member of a Tolstoy society, which I had attended a few times after my visit to Russia in 1896. The society was composed of Russians committed to the theory of non-resistance and anxious to advance the philosophy underlying Tolstoy's books. I knew of no group in Chicago whose members I should have considered less dangerous. This man, with twenty-three other prisoners, was thrust into a cell built for eight men. There was no room to sit, even upon the floor, they could only stand closely together, take turns in lying on the benches and in standing by the door where they might exercise by stretching their hands to the top bars. Because they were federal prisoners the police refused to feed them, but by the second day coffee and sandwiches were brought to them by federal officials. But the half-starved Tolstoyan even then would not eat meat nor drink coffee, but waited patiently until his wife found him and could feed him grains and milk. As a young man he had edited the periodical of a humanitarian society in Russia and it was as a convinced humanitarian that he began to study Tolstoy. Because the grand jury held him for trial under a state charge he could not even be deported if the federal charge were sustained. It was impossible, of course, not to "stand by" old friends such as he and others whom I had known for years, but the experience of securing bail for them; of presiding at a meeting of protest against such violation of constitutional rights; of identification with the vigorous Civil Liberties Union in New York and its Chicago branch, did not add to my respectability in the eyes of my fellow citizens.

And yet the earlier settlements had believed that the opportunity to live close to the people would enable the residents to know intimately how simple people felt upon fundamental issues and we had hoped that the residents would stand fast to that knowledge in the midst of a social crisis where an interpreter would be valuable. Could not such activity be designated as "settlement work?" It was certainly so regarded by a handful of settlement people in Boston and New York, as well as Chicago.

FEAR OF DISCUSSION

There were two contending trends of public opinion at this time which reminded me of the early settlement days in the United States, one the workingman's universal desire for public discussion and the other the employer's belief that such discussion per se was dangerous. In the midst of the world-wide social confusion and distress, there inevitably developed a profound scepticism as to the value of established institutions. The situation in itself afforded a challenge, for men longed to turn from the animosities of war and from the futility of the peace terms to unifying principles, and yet at that very moment any attempt at bold and penetrating discussion was quickly and ruthlessly suppressed as if men had no right to consider together the social conditions surrounding them.

This dread and fear of discussion somewhat accounted for the public sentiment exhibited toward the hundred members of the I. W. W. who were tried in Chicago for sedition. They were held in the Cook County jail for many months awaiting trial. Our jail conditions, which are always bad, were rendered worse through the inevitable overcrowding resulting from the addition of so many federal prisoners. One of the men died, one became insane, one, a temperamental Irishman, fell into a profound melancholy after he had been obliged to listen throughout the night to the erection of a gallows in the corridor upon which his cell opened. A murderer was "to meet the penalty of the law at dawn," and before the drop fell the prisoners were removed from their cells, but too late to save the mind of one of them. Eleven of the other prisoners contracted tuberculosis and although the federal judge who was hearing the case lowered the bail and released others on their "own recognizance" in order to lessen the fearful risks, the prisoners were then faced with the necessity for earning enough money for lodging and breakfast, before the long day in court began. Fortunately the judge allowed a dinner and supper at the expense of the government. Some of us started a "milk fund" for those who were plainly far on the road to tuberculosis and perhaps nothing revealed the state of the public mind more clearly than the fact that while we did collect $1,500 the people who gave it were in a constant state of panic lest their names become known in connection with this primitive form of charity. The I. W. W.'s were not on the whole "pacifists" and I used to object sometimes that our group should be the one fated to perform this purely humanitarian function which would certainly become associated with sedition in the public mind. No one else touched the situation in Chicago, although at the very moment the representatives of "patriotic" societies working in the prison camps of the most backward countries at war, were allowed to separate the tubercular prisoners from their fellows, and to give them special food.

VICTOR BERGER

The Berger trial came in January of the wretched winter. I had met Victor Berger first when as a young man he had spoken before a society at Hull-House which was being addressed by Benjamin Kidd, the English author of the then very popular book on "Social Evolution." I had seen Mr. Berger occasionally during the period when he was in Washington as a congressman, and knew that many of the socialists regarded him as slow because he insisted upon proceeding from one legislative measure to another and had no use for "direct action." And yet here he was indicted with three Chicago men, one a clergyman whom I had known for years, for "conspiring to overthrow the government of the United States."

Later there was the sudden rise of "agents provocateurs" in industrial strikes, and working men believed that they were employed at Gary by the secret service department of the government itself. The stories constantly current recalled my bewilderment years ago when the Russian exile Azeff died in Paris. He was considered by one faction as an agent provocateur, by another as a devoted revolutionist. The events of his remarkable life, which were undisputed, might easily support either theory, quite as in a famous English trial for sedition a prisoner, named Watts, had been so used by both sides that the English court itself could not determine his status. It was hard to believe that a Russian, well known as a member of the czar's police, had organized twenty-four men in Gary for "direct action," had supplied them freely both with radical literature and with fire arms, but that fortunately just before the headquarters were raided the strike leaders discovered "the plot," and persuaded the Russians that they were being duped by the simple statement that any one who gave them arms in a district under military control was deliberately putting them in danger of their lives.

SUSPICION OF GOVERNMENT AGENTS

So it was perhaps not surprising that the Russians became angry and confused and were quite sure that they were being incited and betrayed by government agents. The Russians were even suspicious of help from philanthropists because a man who had been head of the Russian bureau in the department of public information and who had stood by the discredited Sisson letters, had after the discontinuance of the department been transferred to the Russian section of the American Red Cross; it was suspected that the settlements, even although they were furnishing bail, might be in collusion with the Red Cross society.

I got a certain historic perspective, if not comfort at least enlargement of view, by being able to compare our wide-spread panic in the United States about Russia to that which prevailed in England during and after the French revolution. A flood of reactionary pamphlets, similar to those issued by our security leagues, had then filled England, teaching contempt of France and her "liberty," urging confidence in English society as it existed and above all warning of the dangers of any change. Hatred of France, a passionate contentment with things as they were, and a dread of the lower classes, became characteristic of English society. The French revolution was continually used as a warning, for in it could be seen the inevitable and terrible end of the first steps toward democracy. Even when the panic subsided the temper of society remained unchanged for years, so that in the English horror of any kind of revolution the struggle of the hand-loom-weaver in an agony of adjustment to the changes of machine industry, appeared as a menace against an innocent community.

WAR ENTHUSIASM AND MORAL IDEAS

Was this attitude of the English gentry long since dead repeated in our so-called upper classes, especially among the older men in professional and financial circles? Among them and their families war work opened a new type of activity, more socialized in form than many of them had ever known before, and it also gave an outlet to their higher emotions. In the minds of many good men and women the war itself thus became associated with all that was high and fine and patriotism received the sanction of a dogmatic religion which would brook no heretical difference of opinion. Added to this, of course, were the millions of people throughout the country who were actually in the clutches of those unknown and subhuman forces which may easily destroy the life of mankind. A scholar has said of them, "Morally it would seem that these forces are not better but less good than mankind, for man at least loves and pities and tries to understand." Such forces may have been responsible for the mob violence which broke out for a time against alien enemies and so-called "traitors," or may it have been merely the unreason, the superstition, the folly and injustice of the old "law of the herd"?

There was possibly still another factor in the situation in regard to Russia—the acid test, a touch of the peculiar bitterness evolved during a strike where property interests are assailed. That typical American, William Allen White, once wrote, "My idea of hell, is a place where every man owns a little property and thinks he is just about to lose it." Was the challenge which Russia threw down to the present economic system after all the factor most responsible for the unreasoning panic which seemed to hold the nation in its grip, or was it that the war spirit, having been painstakingly evolved by the united press of the civilized world, could not easily be exercised? The war had made obvious the sheer inability of the world to prevent terror and misery. It had been a great revelation of feebleness, as if weakness, ignorance and overweening nationalism had combined to produce something much more cruel than any calculated cruelty could have been. Was the universal unhappiness which seemed to envelop the United States as well as Europe an inevitable aftermath of war?

VERSE

On Seeing a Picture of Christ In a Junk Shop

I WALKED today, along a city street
 So squalid, so unclean, my whole soul shrank,
 Revolted, from foul sights and odors rank.
 Naught could I see in those I chanced to meet
 Save hard or sodden faces, shambling feet,
 Eyes bleared with vice and liquor. My soul drank
 The lees of loathing. Then it was—I thank
 Who willed it!—that a Face, austere and sweet
 And strong and pure had stopped me, like a hand
 Laid gently on me. O'er that thoroughfare
 Of wretchedness and sin they looked, those eyes
 Of one who was too tender to despise
 The least, or of the lowest to despair.
 Rebuked, I passed. The Christ must understand.

Legacies

UNTIL my friends I give my thoughts,
 Unto my God my soul,
 Unto my foe I leave my love—
 These are of life the whole.
 Nay, there is something—a trifle—left;
 Who shall receive this dower?
 See, Earth Mother, a handful of dust—
 Turn it into a flower.

Christ and Criticism*

By Reginald J. Campbell

THERE is no subject of more fundamental importance to Christian experience and to the future of religion in this and other countries than that of an adequate view of the person and work of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is a subject on which scientific inquiry into Christian origins has been busily engaged for several generations, and it is a subject which is exciting earnest and animated discussion even at the present time, perhaps as much as in any previous time. Recently we have been hearing a good deal about it on account of the summer gathering of modern churchmen at Cambridge, at which a certain address was delivered by Dr. Rashdall, Dean of Carlisle, dealing with the doctrinal conception of the person of our Lord. To speak quite frankly, I cannot see very much the matter with what Dr. Rashdall said. It has been grievously, most unfairly, misreported, and it does not offend, when pushed to its last analysis, against ordinary orthodox Christian belief in the significance of our Lord's person for mankind. The problem of who and what was Jesus Christ is one that none of us can afford to pass lightly by, and we may say that there never would have been any such things as the higher or the lower criticisms of Holy Scripture, nor would there have been the amount of archeological investigation that is proceeding in the Holy Land and elsewhere at the present time but for the interest that is excited in nearly every mind by this vital subject.

PHASES OF CRITICISM

Criticism has passed through several well-marked phases and certain very definite schools of thought have emerged in the last fifty years in connection with this theme. To begin with, there was a reaction against the conventional figure of Christ who might reverently have been described as a divine official—the second person in the Trinity, the eternal son of God. Many persons, some of them very devout Christians, were inclined to believe that that divine official had been superimposed upon the real Christ, the Christ of the Galilean days, who taught by the lake shores and on the hillsides of eternal life, and who could be rediscovered in the gospels if sufficient care and sufficient knowledge were brought to bear on the task. The assumption was that if we could come upon the real Christ, Christ as he actually was, we should find him to be a teacher, I might almost say a purely human teacher, ages in advance of his time, an apostle of sweetness and light, to use a well-known phrase of Matthew Arnold's; a person whom we could understand, very much like ourselves, only greater than most, perhaps greater than all, of the masters of men who have ever spoken in the name of God.

Now that seems a very natural and reasonable assumption. It seems so simple, it seems reasonable to conclude that Jesus Christ is perhaps the greatest of all the religious teachers who ever appeared in the world, but that he was not essentially different from other teachers who had preceded him. And so the cry was, raised in the early decades of the nineteenth century, Back to Christ! That cry meant much: for one thing, that we must seek to discover or rediscover the truly ethical standard of Christianity and adjust our individual and corporate life thereto, and in that sense the cry back to Christ needs to be re-echoed today as much as in any day. But it also meant, let us get back far enough and see if we can find out what this man, Jesus, the founder of Christianity, was really like, what he actually said, what we can reasonably believe about him, where we are on firm ground and where we are not. Let us, so to speak, put the divine official on one side, the dogmatic Christ of the intervening centuries, and come upon the purely human Jesus. The assumption was that if we could come upon the actual historical figure himself, dis-interred not only from written records, but still more from tradition, we should find him to be a man, as much a man as any of us, with nothing supernatural about him, and who of course would be too reasonable to make staggering claims about his own status in relation to the godhead and his authority with mankind. We might call this a critical prepossession, and it has not gone yet, though a good many of the very foremost of the authoritative critics of the New Testament sources of the present day have frankly given it up. Their problem was to get behind and beneath the text of the gospel and come upon indisputable history.

THREE OUTSTANDING CRITICS

Here one might mention as typical of this process three outstanding names. Everybody has heard of Strauss who published his "Leben Jesu" about 1875; perhaps the more important edition would have appeared a few years later, and it is only fair to say that that was itself a reaction against some of the more extreme conclusions of the rationalistic school who have begun the work I have indicated. Strauss proceeded upon the theory, the mythological theory it is called, which still holds the field to some extent; that is, that the gospels are to be regarded as documents more or less, say, of the type of "The Little Flowers of St. Francis," those beautiful stories that appeared about the little poor man of Assisi within quite a few years of his death. Strauss assumed that there is historical truth there, but you have to get behind the myth to find what it is. Strauss gave priority to the fourth gospel, which many people love best, and it somewhat hindered his progress as a New Testament critic that he did so. But his theory was so novel, and being novel was so unpopular with religious authorities that it ruined that distinguished man's career. He never recovered from having published such drastic views, although he modified them to a considerable extent a little later on.

Everybody has heard of the great French writer, Ernest Renan, whose Life of Jesus has been translated and re-translated and gone all over the civilized world. I once heard no less a figure than the well-known author, Mr. Jerome K. Jerome, say in the City Temple, at a meeting over which I happened to be presiding, that Renan's Life of Jesus had made him a Christian. He is the only man I ever heard of saying that. But I know what he meant. He said that Renan had made Jesus very real to him, very vivid; he felt that here was an unmistakable historical figure, and he began to ask himself questions about it. On Renan's principles and assumptions was this Jesus to be fully accounted for? Jerome came to the conclusion that he was not.

Then in our country at about the same time, or a little later—in the middle of the nineteenth century—was published a book which in its way is as suggestive as Renan's and almost as beautifully written, Seeley's "Ecce Homo." You remember the chapter on the Enthusiasm of Humanity; that chapter could very well be printed in letters of gold and circulated in this troublous hour as a solvent of our difficulties and a force to get rid of the antagonism that has arisen or re-arisen between man and man and class and class since the war ended.

THE HUMAN CHRIST

But all those three Lives of Christ, or studies of the Life, proceeded from the standpoint that Christ was a purely or at least a truly human figure, and that as presented to us traditionally and conventionally in Christian usage he was not fully, he was not accurately interpreted; he needed to be re-interpreted, and therefore there came a new emphasis on the humanity of Jesus, and a multitude of studies of his life arose, the best known in this country perhaps being Farrar's. A good deal of water has run under the bridge since Farrar's Life of Christ was written. All these studies, even the orthodox remember, stressed very emphatically and in a new way the human character of Christ. The fourth gospel, I repeat, remained the favorite for a considerable time as the norm and standard whence to survey and to interpret the others. But after a time critics began to see that that was impossible, and there was a reaction against the authenticity, at any rate the historicity, of the fourth gospel. It would be too much to say that that reaction has ceased, but I shall indicate in a moment that there are signs that it soon will.

Critics began to see that the three earlier gospels, which bear more or less resemblance to each other in style, drew upon an original source for the history and very largely on another source for the teaching of our Lord; and that in their present form you must give the priority to the second gospel, St. Mark. Now the fourth gospel we must admit is a problem by itself; it is not solved; but I dare to affirm that its value as a historical record, and not so much as correcting but as deliberately supplementing the others, has been re-established within the last few years. More and more we are coming to see that the fourth gospel must be reckoned with just as much as the others for any true and accurate view of what Jesus was and is. I admit it is not so much a biography as a spiritual treatise, but a spiritual treatise written by one or derived traditionally from the reminiscences of one who stood very close to the actual historical person of Jesus himself.

It is also seen that the other three gospels, the earlier gospels—by the way, not so very much earlier than the fourth after all—the other three gospels equally emphasize the superhumanity of the central Figure. Now and then, when criticism has percolated down—permit the hackneyed phrase—to the man in the street, the assumption is made, or the assertion is made, that the first three gospels present a really understandable human figure and the fourth a divine. That is not correct. In the three earlier gospels the figure of Christ is as supernatural as in the fourth. Recall, for instance, that one passage in St. Matthew, which criticism is prepared to pass as genuine: "No man knoweth the son but the Father, neither any man the Father save the son, and he to whomsoever the son will reveal him." The Christ of the first three gospels is just as much a superhuman figure as the Christ of the last gospel; and as a friend of mine of former years, Dr. Anderson of Dunlee, used to say, the Christ of the whole four gospels is not, strictly speaking, a human person, as we understand that phrase.

Now this is how the case has stood in recent years. The farther back we go, the more evident it becomes that the purely human Christ, that is, the enlightened teacher in advance of his time, does not exist and never has existed. That is, as far as criticism can get back to the sources of Christianity it still comes upon an august superhuman figure. Christianity did not begin by preaching, as so many people seem to think, a human Christ, and then, later on, lifting and lifting until at last they placed him upon the throne of God. They began by preaching the divine Christ, and no criticism so far has succeeded in establishing or justifying any other theory. He made claims such as no mortal ever made. In this respect St. Mark's account is as uncompromising as St. John's, and the oldest strata of the gospel record indicates that point of view.

AN ELUSIVE QUEST

Then, further, there is the question of miracles, on which I have not time to touch. But the late Dr. A. B. Bruce, of the Free Church college, Glasgow, in a pregnant sentence in the Expositors' Greek Testament, has said that the miracles stand on as solid ground as the best accredited part of the teaching—though, of course, we must admit that messiahship and the working of miracles did not necessarily imply each other. Our Lord wrought miracles, but these did not attest his messiahship. His messiahship could have been attested even to the Jewish nation without any miracles at all.

And so criticism has been forced upon this alternative: either Jesus was a being more than human as we understand humanity, or he is only an ideal; he never was a historical figure at all. That is the alternative: either the Christians began to preach an ideal figure at the beginning of Christianity in this world who had no real existence as a human being, or else the historical Christ is something quite different from, let us say, the familiar Unitarian conception. Perhaps I ought not to have used the word Unitarian, because the Unitarianism of today is not the Unitarianism of some previous days, and there is more than one school included under that term, some approximating very closely to the ordinary orthodox Christian standpoint.

It has to be admitted that not all critics would be prepared to admit my alternative; they are still working away, still hoping, many of them, to come upon a more understandable purely historical figure.

THE IDEAL CHRIST

What about the ideal Christ? Again I have something to admit—nay, to assert. I do not like the phrase the Eternal Christ very much, because Christ is a historical name, yet what can I do but use it? The perfect and eternal or ideal man, or the Gnostic conception of the dying and rising Saviour, God, was long preached before there was any Christianity, before Jesus lived. There was an ideal figure believed in and proclaimed within Palestine, but still more without it, before there was any Christianity to preach. This ideal not only existed before Christ but would have existed if there had been no Christ as we know Christ today. And so there are some scholars of the Christ Myth school, a very small group, who still maintain that the Christ that St. Paul preached never lived, but that quite truly he could be proclaimed as that in God which is akin to ourselves, and has come to our deliverance. Take the Pauline phrase: "Though we have known Christ after the flesh, henceforth know we him so no more." Paul's "Christ," of course, is that ideal Figure upon the throne of God.

The difference between Dr. Rashdall's conception and the Gnostic conception was this. Gnosticism said that at the back of the purely human Jesus, for there was such a person, he was taken hold of, as it were, overshadowed and possessed by that eternal figure, perpetuated in the creeds as the second person in the Trinity; and in one of the apocryphal gospels you see the salutation from heaven thus given in Old Testament terms: "Thou art my son. This day have I begotten thee." So that, as it were, the human Christ disappears in being taken possession of by the eternal Christ. Now Dr. Rashdall does not say that. What Dr. Rashdall says is that the word Christ is historical, that Jesus was truly human—he began in history just as you and I began in time—but that the Christ is eternal, the Son of God is eternal and existed before becoming incarnate in the person of Jesus of Nazareth. That is not the same thing as the Gnostic conception to which I have alluded. Criticism today is firmly convinced of the historicity of the Christ of the gospels, and up to the present, in spite of rationalistic leanings, is compelled to admit that this historical person cannot be separated from the ideal or eternal Son of God, the object of our faith and worship, the faith and worship of Christians throughout the world.

In conclusion, it is this Christ the Lord of glory, to whom all authority is committed in heaven and on earth, with whom you and I have chiefly to do. He meets our needs as no purely human Christ ever could. Do recognize that. I am continually meeting men who say, the Christ who is precious to me is the Christ who was tempted like me, who had the same battle with life to fight that I have to fight, who asked questions as I have to ask them about the mystery of existence, and so on. Yes, all that is perfectly true, but if you did not feel that at the back of that same Christ was the authority of Deity he would not long remain precious to your experience. And yet he is human. We may thank God for that. The power of Christianity resides in that, that our Lord and Master is both human and divine, carrying our humanity into God. He is the infinitely far but is also the infinitely near, our kinsman upon the eternal throne, able to lay himself alongside every human experience. And I will dare to add he is the only person you have ever heard of whom you feel to be the intimate Companion of your own spirit.

O God, O Kinsman, loved not enough,
O Man, with eyes majestic after death!
Whose feet have toiled along our pathways rough,
Whose lips drawn human breath,
Come, lest this heart should, cold and cast away,
Die, ere the Guest adored be entertained,
Lest eyes which never saw thy earthly day,
Should miss thy heavenly reign.

The Cog

HERE at the window all day long I stand,
Eight hours a day, six days a week and self Stamps, and weigh packages, and things like that.
A child comes in and wants a postal card,
A blonde stenographer wants two cent stamps,
A farmer's wife has eggs to parcel post,
"How much it cost send this to Budapest?"
So it goes all day long and every day.
One day a woman said, "I want to get Eighteen Kenosha stamps." You'd never guess
What 'twas she meant. Yes, there are funny spots Light the routine—but it's monotonous.
Some day I'll drop and then—another chap
At the same window, doing the same work,
In the same way, for the same pay—about.

Sometimes I tell Janet I'm just a cog,
In a machine. Then she bursts into flame:
"Why, Dickie, boy, you're not, you're no such a thing!
You stand there at your window and you weave
The web of life. Think of it! Christmas gifts,
Engagement rings, and bits of wedding cake,
And packages of food to hungry lands.
Letters from home to far-off boys and girls,
Letters from boys and girls to folks at home,
Letters from friends, and lovers, husbands, wives,
Pass through your fingers like the warp and woof
Of a great, golden tapestry of love,
Tucked close around us all to keep us warm.
A cog! Why, Dick, what makes the world go round
Is just such strong and faithful cogs as you."

Of course, that's only Janet's jollying
But—jollying, too, helps make the world go 'round.

A Christian Conscience On Social Justice

By William E. Sweet

THE social and economic problems of the world can only be solved by the application of the principles of Jesus Christ made effective through the operation of the Christian conscience of the world. This fact is becoming increasingly apparent. Leading statesmen and publicists in all nations are united in saying that the philosophy of life proclaimed by Jesus Christ is the only solution for the turmoil, distress, and hatred from which the world is now suffering.

The church—Protestant and Roman Catholic—is the only institution in society whose sole task is to study and interpret the spirit and ideals of Jesus Christ to the world. For this cause the church was founded. If it fails to teach the supreme value of every individual soul in the sight of God, and ceases to proclaim sacrifice and service as the laws of his kingdom, its influence upon civilization becomes negligible, while some other agency will take the place of the church in the task of redeeming civilization. On the other hand, if the church proclaims courageously and fearlessly the whole message of Jesus and tests society by this standard, its power will increase and expand throughout the world. This will require that the church shall carry through to their roots the teachings of Jesus concerning social and economic justice. This will require that men shall approach the teachings of Jesus with an open mind. Most of all, it will require that Christians shall cease being skeptical about the possibility of these teachings becoming dominant in the world. The church is moved by fear and timidity whereas it should be actuated by courage and boldness and assurance. The church must face the world with the trenchant revolutionary judgments of the Master. Happily, in recent months the church has given evidence that it realizes its power and responsibility in a world floundering in a sea of doubt and uncertainty.

SOLIDARITY OF CONSCIENCE

Before the church can be effective in moulding public opinion on a moral issue it must first possess a solidarity of conscience on this issue. This was illustrated by the church and the question of slavery. Until the church possessed a solidarity of conscience on this matter it was impotent and powerless in attacking the evil. At one time Henry Ward Beecher was criticized in scathing terms by his congregation for his attack upon slavery and members of his church in sympathy with this evil withdrew from the church. The first task therefore for the church is to create a solidarity of conscience within its membership on the question of social justice. At present there is no common understanding as to what constitutes social justice and there is no common method for securing this understanding. There is a conflict of opinion as to what constitutes a thorough Christian civilization. Opinions differ widely as to how it can be established. Furthermore, standards of conduct vary greatly among Christian business men affecting social practices and there is no unity of purpose or ideal among them concerning a social order which would make it easier to practice social justice. Often men who make no pretense of practicing the ideals of brotherhood in business are men of influence and power in the church. They will prevent, if they can, any attempt on the part of the church to teach the social implications of the gospel. There is, however, a constantly enlarging group of laymen, as well as ministers, who believe that the social gospel is a matter which the church should teach and proclaim. The church, nevertheless, is divided and ineffective in meeting the present crisis and it will continue to be until it has created a solidarity of conscience in its membership on what constitutes a Christian social order.

The question may be honestly asked whether or not a common economic interest is not a stronger tie for holding men to like purposes of action than is a great moral issue. The workers of the world are united because of their common needs and desires to better their economic conditions. No amount of criticism, antagonism or bitter opposition has been able to break down this class conscious spirit. In England over 6,000,000 workers are united in the trade union movement. We may deplore a class conscious spirit but it exists nevertheless in the world as a mighty bond of fellowship. A common economic interest also binds our capitalistic group into a solid compact body which speaks unitedly on every measure affecting the interests of this group. For instance, municipal ownership of public utilities is quite unanimously opposed by organized business associations because it is thought to be inimical to the economic interests of this group.

For this reason the same interests very generally oppose the Plumb Plan for the operation of the railroads. No one would say that the moral issues raised in the discussion of what constitutes social justice are as effective in uniting the thought of men as are economic interests. Until moral issues are held paramount to everything else the church cannot come into its rightful place of power and influence. In the preface to the book "The Church and Industrial Reconstruction" the church is summoned "to reconsider its own gospel, to re-define its attitude toward the present social order and to interpret for our time the way of life involved in Christian discipleship."

BASIS OF CHURCH MEMBERSHIP

Out of this will come a new church. A division in the church is greatly to be deplored, but better a division on the great living issues than union on the unvital issues of the dead past. The historic basis of the church membership has been that of creed, tradition, ceremony and church polity. Our fathers contended long and bitterly over these matters and they were doubtless important in their time but these are not the vital questions which confront the church of the twentieth century. Is not the individual's purpose to apply the principles of Jesus Christ to all of life a sufficient basis of church membership? Such a basis would unite in fellowship all those who desire to explore Christ's teachings to their very roots regardless of their effect on the social order. In this day the disciples of John Knox, Charles Wesley and Roger Williams will welcome to their fellowship all those whose dominant purpose is the establishment of justice in the world.

This gospel of social and economic righteousness will create a new type of apostle in the pulpit and a new type of disciple in the pew. The solidarity of the Christian conscience was never more necessary than now when justice cries aloud for some one to plead her cause in establishing a new Christian social order. What power is strong enough to penetrate the armour of self-interest? The only power that can do this is the Christian church dominated by men and women who are imbued with the spirit of Christ, and who are courageous and unafraid. When the church is once aroused it will prove invincible. The future of civilization depends upon the ability of the church to establish the principles of Christ on earth. We must study earnestly to determine what these principles are and then work vigorously and persistently to have them applied to the social order.

Jesus and Our Scientists

By Lynn Harold Hough

JESUS was not a protagonist of science. He did not antagonize its conclusions. He never said anything about the subject. There is no evidence that he ever thought about it. And all this for the very good reason that during the period of his life and teaching that which we know as science did not come within the range of his experience. The Greeks had produced a scientific type of mind in Aristotle in the fourth century B. C. But we have no reason to believe that the work of that encyclopaedic mind ever occupied the attention of Jesus. And as for those habits of observation and classification and generalization which have produced what we call modern science, these did not come to their own in the life of the world for many hundreds of years. Jesus was not a contemporary of Darwin and Spencer and he never breathed the intellectual atmosphere of their age.

It may seem then to be a futile thing to attempt to compare the mind of Jesus with the mind of a contemporary scientist. It may seem like trying to find a common denominator for music and commerce. But if we are careful to see just what we mean to do and to think patiently and clearly the attempt may not prove abortive after all.

The truth is that everything which Jesus said and did depends at last upon certain fundamental assumptions about life. They constitute the very foundation of his ministry and of his influence in the world. And it is perfectly reasonable to ask whether it is still possible to make these assumptions in the light of the conclusions of modern scientific activity. Is it possible to believe in freedom and responsibility and righteousness and a personal God and brotherhood and the spiritual life and immortality in the light of those positions which modern science makes inevitable? Jesus did not argue about these things. He did not try to prove them. But the belief in them lies back of every word which fell from his lips and every deed which expresses the deep meaning of his life. They are the great fundamental assumptions which lie back of his activity in the world.

We may admit with the utmost cheerfulness that the documents of the Old Testament and the New must meet the same criterions of scientific historical criticism as any other writings. And with equal cheerfulness we may concede that an ethnic myth or a hoary superstition is not to be treated with some special reverence because it lies embedded in these documents. But all such considerations are far from the heart of the real discussion. For the question of primary and crucial importance is just as to whether, when all the evidence is in, we can still believe that we live in a world of free choice and responsible action with a lofty and final standard of character and a God as good as he is strong and as strong as he is good.

Now it cannot be denied that some scientists have held positions which implied the denial of every characteristic assumption of Jesus. In their thinking the universe had become simply a vast mechanism which moved with mathematical precision and in which everything unfolded with inevitable movement. There was no freedom. There could be no responsibility. Righteousness became a word without meaning. A personal God was an idle fancy. Brotherhood was a flat contradiction of every actual fact of existence as they interpreted these facts. The spiritual life was a neurotic make-believe. Immortality was but a dream. In very downright speech some scientific thinkers have advocated such a view of the universe. And it cannot be denied that other scientists who had no desire to go the full length of these conclusions have occupied ground which has seemed to involve just these results when logically understood.

When one comes to analyze these mechanistic and deterministic views of the universe several important matters come in for consideration. In the first place the belief in a world of hard and fast uniformity where freedom is an idle dream is always reached through the closely applied activity of a mind every step of whose work implied the possession of that very freedom whose existence is at stake. In other words, a man must always assume that his mind is free in order to prove that the universe has no place for freedom. But if the universe has no place for freedom, what becomes of his free mind? And if his free mind is gone, what becomes of his proof? It is only by reducing the mind to impotency that you can come to believe in a universe without freedom. And when the mind is so reduced its processes have no significance one way or the other. It seems clear that we can never accept in a conclusion that which would invalidate the very process by which the conclusion was reached. And if that is true, freedom can never be ruled out of the universe in which we dwell. It is not simply an assumption of Jesus which is here at stake. It is the very life of science itself. For the validity of every investigation of science depends at last on the freedom and the responsible action of the human mind. Attack that and you attack every science. Destroy that and you destroy them all.

But after all, is it possible to believe in a spiritual life moving in its own free way amid the uniformities of nature without breaking that order and uniformity which science has discovered to be the basal character of the physical world in which we dwell? It is easy to confuse the issue here by attempting to confine our discussion to the spiritual nature of God which at once puts the matter in a distant and formal position. But this is entirely unnecessary. The question of a free moving spirit using the very uniformities of this world in its own masterful fashion is a matter of daily experience. Every time one man knocks at a door and another opens it you have the amazing meeting of two worlds of experience. On the one hand you have the world of physical uniformities which you can trace. On the other you have the decision of that free spirit unbound by mechanical laws. The one constant experience of human life indeed has to do with the fashion in which the invisible human spirit uses the uniformities of nature to accomplish its own behests. Human commerce is the demonstration of freedom in a world of law. And in a world where we must concede so much to man there is clearly ample room for that which we need to assign to God.

If by science you mean the objective study of the forces of nature, it is easy to reach a position where all personal activities are translated into impersonal forms. But if by science you mean the careful observation of all the facts and the constant critical insight into what is involved in the possession and the use of intelligence it soon becomes clear that science itself requires that very world of freedom and responsibility and spiritual life which were fundamental in the thought of Jesus. And when once these preliminary positions are clear it quickly follows that there is a place and a demand for righteousness and brotherhood and there is at least no inner contradiction in the belief in immortality.

It does not then surprise us that some of the most acute intellects which have applied themselves to the pursuit of science have held with assured and hearty confidence to those positions upon which the very possibility of ethical religion rests at last. There is indeed no need of religion which does not at last reveal itself to be a need of science. And the assumptions of Jesus are seen at last to be the foundations upon which science finds it easiest to work. In the case of freedom and a directing intelligence, such presuppositions are necessary as a basis for the whole structure of science.

It is impossible to speak too highly of the services which the scientific method and the scientific habit of mind have rendered to the world. And when men who profess its sanctions fail it is really because they need more science rather than less. They need to cover a larger territory, to survey a vaster field, to exercise a more critically scientific mind, and to include the essential presuppositions of scientific investigations in their interpretation of the facts. So apprehended there is no contradiction between the assumptions of Jesus and the conclusions of science. Jesus was intuitive in his approach to reality. Science is inductive in its methods. But it is the same truth which is reached by the two methods of approach. The obscurantist has no right to claim the banner of Jesus as his own.

A Father's Prayer

LORD GOD, who let your Baby Son
Pass earthward where the joys were few,
To a hard death, when all was done,
And very far away from you.

My little lad must go one day
Roads where I cannot guide his feet,
Through dangers that I cannot stay,
To griefs I cannot help him meet.

He must hear voices calling him—
When youth is wild and life is warm
And sight seems far away and dim—
To evil things and battle storm.

Lord God, whose son went steadily
Down the hard road He had to tread, Guard my son, too, that he may be Strong through his hours of doubt and dread.

Revolution and Missions

By Jerome K. Davis

WITH ever increasing tempo, as idea succeeds idea and culture supercedes culture in the unfolding of social evolution, the Christian church has had to face new battles and use new stratagems. This was never truer than in an age of world war and revolution. In dealing with revolutionary Russia, each of the great powers has adopted hitherto unheard-of policies and relationships. The Christian church should be ahead of all other agencies in changing its program to meet the unprecedented. To the rabbinical leaders of Palestine, one of the most startling characteristics of Jesus' methods must have been their novelty; and we too must be ready to try unique and perhaps untried policies. This is preeminently true if we desire to spread the contagion of the spirit of Christ in Russia.

In the slow onward march of missionary activity, ideas and methods have been completely revolutionized and those changes have today become part of the established order. We no longer attempt to win men to Christianity by the sword, neither do we send the missionary to distant lands armed only with Holy Writ. With him go the doctor, the teacher, the social service worker and perhaps even the agriculturist. Furthermore, it is almost axiomatic that we should study the religion of each people and utilize its elements of truth for winning them to Christ. To cite one of the most masterful and well known examples, Paul used the inscription "To an unknown God" in Athens as an introduction to his appeal. He worked through an existing faith.

LOVERS OF BEAUTY IN WORSHIP

In Russia today we find a people who profess to be Christian. There are Orthodox churches scattered broadcast throughout the length and breadth of Russia. The interiors beautiful with golden ikons and glittering candles, the fragrance of sweet incense, the magnificent music, all make a powerful mystical appeal to a people unusually susceptible to such things. Even to the Westerner this beautiful worship takes on new meaning when he comprehends that it is all in honor of Christ. In Russia, then, we have to deal with a people who have long been ministered to by the forms of Christian worship.

For hundreds of years this church was held in bondage to a corrupt and autocratic tsardom. Today these bonds of oppression and tyranny have been destroyed. The church stands free to champion the cause of Christ unfettered. Not only has church been separated from state, but her rich lands have been confiscated. Some of her priests have been imprisoned; attacks are constantly being made against her faith; and on the wall of the city hall in Moscow has been inscribed, "Religion is the opium of the people."

In thus persecuting her, the bolsheviks have unconsciously rendered the church an inestimable service. Corrupt and selfish leaders, forced to endure hardship and oppression, have melted away like snow. Consecrated and devoted priests, on the other hand, have endured all with increased devotion. The people suffering from starvation and misery are flocking to the services. In consequence priests testify that they have never known what it was to be so happy. In serving a people who are thus deeply longing for spiritual realities, they have discovered the key to the richest joys and satisfactions.

THE CHURCH CHANGED

With this new consciousness working in the midst of a changed social order, the church herself has undergone the greatest revolution since Russia accepted Christianity in the ninth century. To meet the changed conditions, she desires new methods, new visions, new opportunities for service. Her priests stand calling for the programs and principles that western Christianity has proved and found good. "Can you not share with us your rich experience in Sunday schools, men's clubs and social service agencies?" they say. More than ever before they want to preach to the people, yet their training has been entirely inadequate for the task. As one of them expressed it, "If we are silent in the house of worship, we at least satisfy some of the deep needs of the people; if we speak, we too often but display our ignorance." These men long for sermon aids and concrete material for devotional talks, yet have none. They are anxious for the inspiration and help of the religious literature from other lands. To the foreign worker in Moscow they bring again the old Macedonian call, "In Christ's name bring us help from America. Send us Bibles, your Christian books, share with us your rich and abundant stores of devotional, inspirational, and social service literature."

How eagerly they appropriate any such material was brought home to the writer in Russia. Through cooperation with the patriarch, a Russian translation of Fosdick's devotional books, "The Manhood of the Master," and "The Meaning of Prayer" was given to the priests. As a result some of them began to preach entire sermons based on these books. The Russian church has consecrated Christian leaders, she is passing through one of the greatest crises in history, and the patriarch of all the Russian churches and the priests are calling to the stronger forces of Christendom, "Come over into Russia and help us."

A CHALLENGE TO THE CHURCH

This is a real challenge to the consecrated forces of the Christian world. Are we sincere enough to adopt a new missionary method, a more unselfish motive? Can we go into Russia, not to build up a Protestant faith but to help the Orthodox church; not to use our money, our time, our Christianity to impose a western church where it may not be needed, but to give the best that we have gladly and unselfishly to the Orthodox church?

It would be quite simple for us to respond to this call. Some one denomination, perhaps the Episcopal because it has long been on terms of friendship with the Orthodox, or preferably a federation of various denominations such as the Federal Council of Churches, should send in representatives, not to build up new churches but to aid the existing church. They should go prepared to make this their life work. They should go with the best literature and consecration the West has to share. Could England and America only catch the vision of this unparalleled opportunity! A nation with a Christian church, a Christian priesthood stands calling to her sister churches across the seas, calling for religious comfort, aid and instruction.

Perhaps in some lofty moment of prayer, as Paul toured among the feeble and struggling Christian groups who were crying to him for help, he had a vision that in a far off age, not isolated churches but an entire nation would call for help. And today not from a handful here and there but from a nation of Christian churches, comes this challenge. Surely it will not be in vain, somewhere a modern prophet and statesman will catch the vision.

British Table Talk

London, December 12, 1921

PEACE with Ireland! The news met me on one poster outside our station on Tuesday, December 6th; I did not believe it; but in the city every poster told the same good news. The day which Gladstone and Redmond hoped to see and saw not, had dawned. There opened before us a new age in which Ireland should no more vex England, nor England, poor bewildered nation, trouble Ireland! With that vision came a new hope for the world, for we had been told and we believe that without a settlement in Ireland there could be no permanent understanding and friendship between the great nations of the west.

The day had come. Did we become elated and sing Te Deums? Were our mouths filled with laughter and with singing? Not in the least. We are a strange people. We said casually to each other, "good news this from Ireland!" and passed on to the routine of the day. It is small wonder that we are misunderstood. And yet, beneath the calm surface there was a thrill of joy; perhaps we were a little afraid of believing the news.

A Cheap Reprint of a Noble Book

"There can be no better use for money than to spend it in spreading the knowledge of a noble life." With such words Mrs. Barnett prefaces the cheap edition of the life of Canon Barnett. This can now be had for 6s; it is a book of more than 800 pages, with abundant illustrations, and by far the cheapest of books to be had, and if not the best, not far from the best of all recent biographies. Mrs. Barnett published it first during the war at a cost of 26s and this brought no profit to author and publisher. It became at once a classical work; but the price put it outside the range of many readers who wanted not to borrow but to possess it; now thanks to the generous and characteristic act of Mrs. Barnett the book is set free to do its work over a new range. When Clemenceau was in England some years ago he said that he had met "but three really great men in England, and one was a little pale clergyman in White chapel." There are few of us who would not agree with the Frenchman in this choice. Barnett left the mark of his wise and far-seeing mind upon all who followed him in the University Settlement Movement; he and his wife—for they always acted and thought together—profoundly changed the attitude of the nation to poor relief and poor law reform; they helped to create a new conscience within the church; in the lives of many distinguished public men, when the influences which shaped them are recalled, you will read 'Enter Barnett!'

It is sometimes said that widows do not make the best biographers; but three, at least, of the best lives published within recent years are by the widows of distinguished men. Lady Burne-Jones wrote the story of Burne-Jones in a way that makes the book a sheer delight; Mrs. Creighton's life of her husband is a classic; and Mrs. Barnett has kept for after generations the story of that noble man with whom she lived and worked and served her generation in the love of God.

Some Losses

Among the deaths of the week there is the name of Lord Halsbury, the most stalwart of the Die-Hards; a "Church and State" man, who remained to the end where he had been for fifty years. Nevertheless he was honored as a great fighter and a sound lawyer; and rich in years, he has finished with the goodwill of all men. There is one supreme advantage in the lingering behind the rest of such a man; it is discovered how in spite of fierce words we really value our enemies' characters; they have only to live long enough. . . Sir Arthur Pearson was the hustler of the tariff reform party—a great journalist who very nearly captured The Times. In his early days he got his first opportunity when Sir George Newnes sent him to America on an errand concerning The Review of Reviews. He became a powerful force in English public life, but he will be remembered most for his heroic facing of blindness when it came upon him; he determined to make it not the end of life, but the beginning of new interests. Both before the war and afterwards he had devoted all his powers to the service of other blind folk. To them he imparted something of his own indomitable spirit. He turned his "necessity to glorious gain"; and the blind of this land, especially the blind soldiers, never had a truer friend.

The Free Catholic Conference

The opening of the New Year brings with it this interesting annual conference. The main theme is worship; one morning's session (January 3rd) is devoted to the history of worship when Dr. Biggs is to speak of the meaning and growth of ceremonial, and to me not a member of the society has been allotted the task of showing why the Protestants revolted against ceremonial. Other sessions are devoted to worship and education, worship and the evangelism of the masses, and before the conference closes it will consider the reforms needed. The speakers are from many churches, Anglican, Methodist, Congregational; they should be able to survey the whole ground with the thoroughness which comes from experience; and there is much need that the churches should pool their gains one with another, and also their warnings upon this matter of worship.

The United Council of Missionary Education

Of this council, which is a cooperative movement of all the missionary societies, I have written before. We met for our annual conference at Swanwick last week, and were brought face to face with the ever-expanding problems of missionary education. Every day it is becoming more certain that missionary education cannot be dissociated from religious education taken as a whole, and that religious education cannot be separated from education in its widest range. In his massive book on education Mr. Maxwell Garnett definitely claims that the one inclusive interest in all education is to train for world-citizenship with this master-interest. In such a situation it would seem that missionary education has a great part; those who are responsible for it may well lead the way in the church to a new coordination which will unite all the provinces of education into one mighty and ordered kingdom. Once more just as in the political scene, the missionary enthusiast has won a recognition unknown before, so in the educational world the pioneers in world-citizenship have their chance. May they rise to their high calling!

To that council we were able to welcome Dr. Warnshuis, who has now taken up his work at Edinburgh House, headquarters of the international missionary service in this country. He brings to us a first-hand knowledge of American missionary work and from his wise and experienced statesmanship we are expecting great things.

Here is a schoolboy's prayer, given in The Children's Newspaper; it might be a prayer for others than schoolboys.

Give me a healthy body, Lord;
Give me the sense to keep it so;
Give me a heart that is not bored
Whatever work I have to do.

Give me a sense of humor, Lord;
Give me the power to see a joke,
To get some happiness from life,
And pass it on to other folk.

"Soldiers and Plaster Saints"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your December first issue, you have an article entitled "Spoiling the American Legion." One would infer from reading same that the American Legion is already spoiled and that even the leadership is a bunch of rough-necks who care nothing for law and order. I have always been an admirer of your fine editorials, but I confess to a feeling of disappointment in reading this, which is wholly unfair and unjust in face of the existing facts. To say the least, your statements are misleading. To quote a few lines—"Sufficient has been said to indicate that a disorderly element of the organization must be in control. Boisterousness and riotousness characterized the meeting. . . . Along the lines of march hats of citizens were knocked off if they were not taken off quickly enough. At last a young riot developed and policemen were beaten with clubs for discharging their duty."

I realize that it is quite the tendency to form hasty conclusions from newspaper reports of such a big event as the American Legion convention in Kansas City, especially when those same news reports were not altogether true to facts. The truth of the matter is, there never was a representative body of American citizens who conducted themselves in a more orderly and business-like manner than did the delegates in business sessions at the American Legion convention. The leadership represents as high a type of American citizenship as can be found anywhere.

Few people understand the organization of the American Legion. It is a fair cross-section of American young manhood. Its membership is not hand-picked. The only qualification required beyond acceptable character is an honorable discharge from the army, navy or marines who served during the world war. That a man gave his life in service for his country is sufficient recommendation. Gather 60,000 of these men together in one place where they are permitted to renew old associations and revive memories and experiences of the greatest tragedy the world has ever known and you could not expect the conduct to measure up to that of carefully selected delegates at a Christian Endeavor convention.

The war is over and the general public has already largely forgotten the high price paid in moral idealism. For months our young men were taught savagery; how to kill and destroy; how to be hard in the presence of the horrors of war. For more months they were putting into practice what they had learned—hellishness and destruction. The necessary tyranny of the army, the physical discomfort and sordidness of camp life would not be apt to produce model characters. "Soldiers raised in barracks do not grow into plaster saints." The people who stayed at home and who were influenced in no such way by the war, can little appreciate (and would naturally soon forget) what these men passed through. This is attested by the general indifference on the part of the public towards "adjusted compensation" for the ex-service men, or even for the welfare of the thousands of sick and wounded who are still without sufficient care and attention.

Boisterousness did exist in Kansas City, but not riotousness. Groups did gather in hotel lobbies and they shot craps on the floor and they might have used profanity when anyone interfered. Some cow-boy legionaires from Texas, in a spirit of fun, did lead a steer into the lobby of a hotel. I once knew of some students in a Disciples college who led a cow up four flights of stairs and into the chapel where they left her all night. I did not know of any policemen who were beaten with clubs. Neither did I know of any hats that were "yanked from the heads of people before they had time to take them off themselves." I did see hundreds of able-bodied men standing along the streets during the parade with their hands in their pockets and showing no inclination to remove their hats as the United States flag went by. This was naturally a bit galling to some of us who were willing to give our lives that it might wave unsullied over the homes of these very people who show it so little respect.

There was undoubtedly more revelry than there should have been. Sixty thousand live soldiers with perhaps forty thousand guests could not well be expected to deport themselves in a very orderly manner on the streets of a city no larger than Kansas City. The disorderliness that did occur is deplored by those in leadership and authority, and it is hoped that as the years go by and the men become older, they will perhaps become more dignified. But before one condemns too severely and concludes that the "meeting" was made up of "hoodlums," he should at least be fair enough to consider a few of the more important phases of the situation: For instance, the bigness of the occasion. 100,000 ex-service men and their friends gathered together for a good time. Then the tendency of some newspapers to exaggerate the sensational—one paper gave an account of a riot in one of the hotel lobbies and stated that said lobby was "completely demolished." I was in the same hotel that night after the occurrence and saw nothing out of its usual order. Again, the rough element in Kansas City, which has been restricted recently because of a stricter police administration, saw an opportunity to "kick the lid off," knowing that the blame would be placed upon the Legion.

It is unfortunate, Mr. Morrison, that among the reports you read of the convention, you did not have the official report of the secretary of the convention bureau of the Chamber of Commerce in Kansas City, Missouri, Mr. Frank M. Robinson, who made a thorough investigation of all hotels and city conditions after the convention. Had you read this, I am sure your editorial would have had a different tone.

The Resurrection of Faith

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The above was the title of an editorial in a recent number of The Christian Century. What a striking editorial. Like many another reader I look each week for light and leading from the editorial pages of this live journal. "Here surely," I said, "is something to read." I reasoned that it would be the pronouncement of some eagle-eyed prophet looking steadily at the moving panorama of contemporary history and decrying the signs of a revival of faith. So I settled myself down to read the article.

I yielded myself to the writer. I followed him with pencil in hand. I began underlining and making notes. I followed him carefully as he went from point to point analyzing the changing moods of the mind of the world as men and women everywhere have pressed on from the time of the shock that came with war until the hilarious days after the armistice and I found myself pretty much in agreement with him.

"Then came the awful mood of disillusionment and emotional relapse. * * * Not a single moral aim of the war had been accomplished. Disillusionment developed into cynicism," etc., etc. With all of which every thoughtful reader must agree. But—after this, what? I confess I was disappointed. I expected the writer to go on to show how faith was coming into a new resurrection. The title of the editorial had led me to expect as much. The facts seem to me to be plain. But just at this place in the journey he turned off and made in an unexpected direction and began to point out the need of resurrecting faith. Ah, then we are not on the eve of a revival, but we need a revival of faith!

I confess that the writer states the alternative before the world just now most eloquently—it is faith or nothing. Unless there is reality in progress how can we believe in providence? If we cannot believe in brotherhood how can we believe in God? If we cannot believe in public religion, religion for our total corporate life, how can we believe in it for the individual heart? If Christ's kingdom cannot stretch from sea to sea and take in all life, what comfort has it for the individual breast? And so.

But this is not the turn I expected. I do not believe that it is the turn we should make just now. Let us for once and all get out of this alternative business and speak out confidently and with assurance and in the fullness of faith. The facts warrant it.

I have of late been studying the Golden Rule—not in the commentaries, not in the original Greek. But in the latest editions! The newspapers and magazines are telling us of scores of places where it is being tried out! Surely the world is moving rapidly towards industrial democracy and the Gays cut as sorry a figure today as the Ludendorfs yesterday. Our labor leaders as well as our captains of industry in America should wake up and learn that the day of appeal to brute force has set in clouds and that this is the time of spiritual vision and of spiritual instruments.

And why the "ifs" and the "unlesses" and the "either—ors" now? The disarmament conference is meeting not in Europe at Paris or Berlin, but in America, and at Washington! Its eyes are not upon the Mediterranean or the Atlantic, but upon the Pacific. It is made up of yellow men and black men and white men, not of white men only. Why, the world is flowing together and Harding and Hughes and Balfour are not talking like old Pharaoh or Sennacherib or Ghengis Kahn.

Poverty, disease, war must be abolished—that is the way men talk today. I do not say pathetic prophets, but red-blooded men of the world. And religion has broken through the old forms and the old wine-skins and is reinterpreting life everywhere and flooding the hearts of men with new courage everywhere.

At least this is the way I feel. I do not want any one to say to me that religion must be resurrected, that faith must be pulled out of the hole in which it is now for the sake of all concerned. I say the resurrection of faith is already a fact. Out of the spiritual slump of the world following the war men have already emerged and are going forward to build over again what has been shaken down. It is not "we had hoped," but we do hope. Religion is not stranded and struggling to be free,

"Mine eyes have seen the coming of the Glory of the Lord."

JAMES ALLEN GEISSINGER.

Dean Inge's Imagination

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I am a recent subscriber to The Christian Century and I frequently find your articles provocative of thought and a desire to "answer back." I would like to criticise a little the article by Dean Inge in the last issue, on "What is a Liberal Christian?" In his paragraph on early changes in Christianity he says: "In St. Paul we trace the gradual decline of the messianic idea, and the growth of an incarnational theology. And finally, in the author of the fourth gospel, whom we call St. John, who carried the doctrines of St. Paul to their logical conclusion, messianism is practically abandoned, and the incarnation, with the gift of the Holy Spirit, takes the place of the expected second coming. . . . That, I say, is a greater change than has taken place since in the Christian religion."

Now if this were really true it seems to me that the gospel of John would make no allusion to the second coming of Christ, as the expectation of the apostles, since it had been fulfilled, so many years before, on the day of Pentecost. But we find, in about the last statement made, chapter 21:21-23, an incidental reference of the clearest kind, showing plainly in an indirect way, that they were looking for the personal return of the Lord and the translation of the saints, just as it is stated in the earlier writings. The peculiar emphasis and explanation of the writer shows that he still looked for the return of the Lord, because, if that return had already been accomplished, many years before, at Pentecost, his comment would have been quite without sense or reason. It is also evident that he did not understand the Lord's return to mean his coming for his people at death.

Also, if St. Paul had given up this original idea of the Lord's return and the messianic kingdom, and believed the whole thing was fulfilled at Pentecost, how could he possibly have written those words, at the very end of his life, and in the very shadow of approaching death? 2 Timothy 4: "I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom". . . "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord shall give me at that day, and not to me only, but to all them that love his appearing." I can see evidence that, at this time, the apostles had given up their original expectation of the immediate return of the Lord, and really there was nothing in the teaching of the Lord to justify that view; in fact, the Lord taught distinctly in parable that he was going away for a long time, and to a far country, see Matt. 25, 14, 19; and Luke, commenting on this parable says Jesus gave it because "they supposed the kingdom of God was immediately to appear."

In view of these things it seems to me that Dean Inge is not justified in his conclusions and that he has drawn chiefly upon his imagination, or at least those liberal Christians of whom he speaks have done so.

If Baal be God, Follow Him

ELIJAH was a strong, fearless, clear-cut leader. He knew how to state his case. Hear him: "How long go ye limping between two opinions? If Jehovah be God follow him, but if Baal, follow him." That put the situation up to the people straight. It demanded immediate and sharp decision. Joshua did the same thing when he said: "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve, but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." To see the other side helps us to solid conviction. Do you love the United States or Russia? There you have it plain and straight. It was fine business to deport some of our loud-mouthed anarchists to this lovely land of the Bolsheviks. Some of them would like to get back to the good, old U. S. A. You do not know how fine America is until you read the statements of those just back from Russia. If you prefer Lenin and Trotsky to Harding and Hughes, go to it, but do not stay under the Star-spangled banner while you are praising the former. The only way to appreciate the Christian church is to go off somewhere devoid of all churches. Returning from China a noted professor says that he has learned to appreciate the Christian church. He sees now that we in America enjoy the vast backgrounds of the church. We live in an atmosphere charged with Christian principles. Many of the cheap writers, who in magazines are constantly heckling the church, ought to be compelled to live long enough in some heathen land to get the point of view. They will come back to praise the underpaid, bravely struggling preachers that they now take such keen delight in decrying. It is like sitting in a room made warm and comfortable by a coal-stove and at the same time laughing at the stove. An hour in the storm-swept field or a bit of work in the cold barn would help their appreciation. To understand schools and appreciate them one should consider the situation where there are no schools. Having spoken several times recently in high schools I have come to an even higher appreciation of our marvelous school system. It is easy to criticize our schools, but "if Baal be god, follow him"—suppose we did not have our American schools. Thus we come to see the value of our state, our church and our school by looking straight at the opposite conditions.

If you do not like the kind of God we have, try Baal. There were those who did. Baal offered fleshly indulgence, but he was a poor god in time of trouble. Baal was a poor national deity. We see men today choosing other deities. I know men who worship at the shrine of Pleasure or of Wealth, or of Fame, or of Ambition, or of Ease. What we want to do today is to come out plainly and shout to these men and say, "All right, if Wealth be god, follow Wealth, pin your faith to Wealth, let Wealth answer your prayers, let Wealth offer you heaven, let Wealth sit by the bedside of your sick, let Wealth preach your funeral sermons, let Wealth inspire your sons, let Wealth teach your daughters, let Wealth inculcate your morals." If men will have wealth and nothing else, cut them off from the comforts and inspirations of our Christian faith and let them drift upon the high seas in that storm-proof ship named "Wealth." But when you put it to him that way your man will shudder and pause. Does he want to put to sea in such a boat? Will you make Fame your god? It is a fickle god. Today the crowd sings your praise and strews flowers in the streets before your advance; tomorrow the same crowds hiss your name and carry the fagots for the stake upon which you are bound. Surely, you would not build your shrine to Pleasure! This gay goddess is very capricious with her smiles, she only likes you when you have youth and money. She hears laughter but not groans. Only a fool would dismiss Christ to accept Pleasure. Ambition appeals to many of our best. He seems a noble god, but he drinks blood. He takes your best, he demands more and more. He is ruthless, knows no pity. When your hand grows weak, he repudiates you and turns to another. But take your choice, only use some thought about it. If Business is your god, serve him. Give Business your days and nights, give him your youth and energy, give him your friendships and your family; heap high the altar with your most precious treasures and when you are old and friendless and forsaken and sick Business will give you a bag of heavy gold. Lloyd George was right, "It is Christ or chaos." "If Baal be god, follow him"—follow him to hell—take the bitter consequences, but if Jehovah be God, serve him with devotion and passion, giving and receiving the best in the universe.

New Versions of the New Testament

MATTHEW ARNOLD once wrote to Charles Reade, the English novelist: "The old Bible is getting to be to us literary men of England a sealed book. We may think that we know it. we were taught it at home; we heard it read at church; perhaps we can quote some verses, or even passages; but we really know very little of it. I wish, Reade, that you would take up the Old Testament and go through it as though every page were altogether new to you—as though you had never read a line of it before. It will astonish you."

The reason of the wide popularity of the recent versions of the New Testament is simply that they aid the reader in coming to its messages with a sense of freshness. The pages glow with new interest. We recommend as the very best new translations the following:

Moffatt's New Testament, $1.50 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, gilt edges, $1.75, plus 8 cents postage).

Weymouth's New Testament, $2.00 plus 12 cents postage. (Pocket ed., $1.35 plus 8 cts.)

The Shorter New Testament (Kent), $1.00 plus 10 cents postage.

The 20th Century New Testament, $2.00 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, $1.50 plus 8 cents postage).

Plans for Disciples Congress Are Developing

The Disciples Congress promises to be a very interesting affair this year. The real pressing problems of the fellowship will be discussed at this meeting. The Congress will be held at Columbus, O., the week after Easter. Among the addresses scheduled for this meeting will be one by Rev. John Ray Ewers on "Should the Disciples Practice Open Membership?" The parish paper of East End Church of Pittsburgh comments thus upon this appointment: "There was a time when they discussed, 'Should America Practice Prohibition?' or 'Should Women Have the Right to Vote in the United States?' Discussion is a right good thing. We learn by it."

One Million Catholic Women Enrolled for Social Service

The enthusiasm of the members of the Roman Catholic Church for the social service idea may be seen from the fact that one million women of that communion are now enrolled for definite service. It is hoped that during this coming year a school for women's service may be opened in Washington. The program for service in America includes homes for working girls, dramatic guilds for the cultivation of musical and dramatic ability, and study classes in political economy. These Catholic women also hope to do much special work in Poland during the coming year by teaching Polish women to carry on social service activities similar to those which constitute the program in America.

Heresy-Hunters at Work Among Southern Methodists

Just now the most frequent topic of conversation in the circles of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is that of the orthodoxy or heresy of Dr. John A. Rice, a Bible teacher of the Southern Methodist University of Dallas. He has written a book entitled "The Old Testament in the Life of Today." The book states critical results in a conservative and constructive way, and cannot be regarded as being specially advanced in its conclusions. Nevertheless two of the supporting conferences have demanded the resignation of this progressive thinker. The conferences are taking the point of view that the people who pay the bills have a right to dictate the conclusions of a scholarly process in advance of investigation. Large numbers of forward-looking Methodists in the south dissent from the conclusions of these conferences.

Holy Ghost Society Sold Under the Hammer

The sheriff has recently wound up the affairs of one more of the freak religious movements which have been characteristic of American life for the past twenty years. In Durham, Me., the Holy Ghost and Us Society was for many years under the leadership of Frank W. Sanford, a preacher of the revivalistic sort. He declared himself a reincarnation of Elijah and allowed the rumor to spread that he might be a reincarnation of Christ. He took a ship and set out for the Holy Land some years ago "without chart or compass." After many days on the sea, he came back with a number of people dead and many more ill. For this escapade he was given ten years in the penitentiary. He is now living in retirement in Boston, and his former society has been sold out to satisfy a judgment for $2200. Large numbers of people entrusted their all to his partially communistic enterprise, and are, of course, left stranded late in life, which is one of the familiar by-products of this form of religious fanaticism. At one time in his sensational career he had more than a thousand people gathered about him at Durham.

Dr. Fosdick Thinks We Need a New Reformation

On a recent Sunday Dr. Harry E. Fosdick of New York preached on the theme "Does Our Western Christianity Need a New Reformation?" He answered his question decisively in the affirmative. He is strong in the conviction that we are not exporting the right kind of religion to Japan and China. He thinks the intelligent men of those nations will scarcely accept "our denominational divisions, our metaphysical controversies, our left-overs of medieval theology, our belated rituals and ceremonies, rubrics and hymns." He mentions with some mirth the possibility of an American Dutch Reformed Chinese church. The western world not only needs a new reformation, but it is the observation of a good many men that that reformation is actually on the way.

Dr. Grenfell Is Back in America

Dr. William T. Grenfell, well-known missionary on the Labrador coast, has returned to America, and he spent the Christmas holidays in Boston. During the past six months he has visited every part of the Labrador coast in his hospital ship, the Strathcona. Considerable progress has been made toward providing the $1,500,000 endowment which he has asked for his work, but the goal is still distant. Dr. Grenfell hopes to respond to invitations this winter, which for lack of time last winter were refused.

Disciples Promote Evangelism

Rev. Jesse M. Bader, the Disciples secretary of evangelism, was responsible for bringing together in Chicago during the Christmas week a conference on evangelism with which the National Evangelistic Association of the denomination cooperated. About a hundred men from outside Chicago attended, most of them pastors of the middle west. Rev. Charles Reign Scoville, an evangelist of wide repute, presided over the sessions. Many evangelists appeared on the program with the usual denunciation of the steady-going, every-day methods of local church work. Other speakers, however, emphasized two ideas that have

Church Affiliations of Present Congress

THE percentage of church membership of congressmen is very much higher than it is for the general population of the country. This indicates that one of the elements of success in life is the possession of religious convictions. Mr. Deets Pickett, research secretary of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church has provided the following statistics on the religious preferences of the members of the present congress:

not previously had much favor in the Disciples camp. One is educational evangelism among the children of the church through classes, and the other is careful methods of Christian nurture after the new converts are received. Mr. Bader, who is a relatively young minister, startled his hearers by saying that the Disciples had practically stood still in their numerical strength during the whole period of his ministry. He has a program of a million new members in five years. He has secured a place for evangelistic results in the annual year-book. One of his plans is to get the secretaries and college professors to hold evangelistic meetings during the coming five years. He told some interesting stories of evangelistic success achieved by these men in quiet teaching campaigns. The close of the sessions was a banquet in the Association building given by the Disciples club of the city, which was attended by about 150 people. Out of the meetings has come renewed enthusiasm for the recruiting of new members for the church.

Four Kinds of Baptists in China

Four different kinds of Baptists are at work in China, and after many years of labor, there are about a thousand churches. These have widely varying customs, as might be guessed from the fact that both northern and southern Baptists of the United States have worked by the side of English and Swedish Baptists. It is now proposed that these four varieties of Baptists shall unite to form a native Chinese Baptist church. The denominational press speaks of this obvious thing as though it were attended with great difficulty. Were the matter put in the hands of the Chinese and they allowed to settle matters, doubtless the difficulties would become much fewer.

State Federation Will Bring Pastors Together

The Ohio State Federation of Churches has a unique custom in bringing together the pastors of the various denominations into a single mass convention once a year. The third of these conventions will be held at Columbus, January 23-26. Noted leaders from various denominations have been secured to interpret to these ministers the opportunities of the church in this age. Among the speakers are: Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Rev. John Timothy Stone, Prof. Alva W. Taylor and Dean Shailer Mathews. By meeting at Columbus, it is possible to secure the assistance of a number of the professors of the state university, who assist particularly in setting forth the functions of the rural church.

Promises Automobiles for Two Missionaries

Mrs. W. B. Taylor, widow of a Disciples minister, has set herself to the voluntary task of providing an automobile for two veteran missionaries of India. The Disciples mission work in India is in Central province, and large areas must be covered. Rev. and Mrs. C. G. Elsam are stationed twenty-four miles from a railroad, and they must cover long distances in their evangelistic work. Mrs. Taylor has already secured a considerable sum, and hopes to be able before the spring season opens up to provide one of the cheaper models of touring cars for service in central India. Already many automobiles are in operation there.

St. Louis Leaders Hear Dr. Shannon

The annual meeting of the St. Louis Church Federation was held on December 6. At this meeting Dr. Frederick F. Shannon of Chicago was the chief speaker. The sessions were held at the City Club. Dr. Shannon was once a circuit rider in the southern Methodist church and has unusual power of adaptation in meeting different groups of Christian people.

Methodist Board of Hospitals and Homes

The Methodists in the administration of their hospitals and homes now coordinate their work through the Board of Hospitals and Homes. This board met in Chicago December 11, and Bishop W. O. Shepard presided over the meeting. The Methodists now have seventy hospitals in sixty-seven cities. Their total bed capacity is 6,340. About 135,000 patients are received each year. The executives and student nurses form a total of 2,500. The church also has thirty-eight homes for the aged. The bed capacity of these homes is 1,714. The value of the houses and land equipment of these institutions is $3,630,000, while the value of the hospital equipment is $23,260,000. In the care of children the Methodists have built forty-two homes, with a bed capacity of 2,624. About 3,000 children pass through these homes each year. The value of the land and houses is $3,036,532.

Bible Goes into Public Schools at Ft. Worth

The school board at Ft. Worth, Tex., decided that the King James version of the Bible should be used in the public schools of the city. This action was contested as it usually is wherever the issue is raised. After the case was tried before the Supreme Court of the state, a decision was rendered that such use of the Bible is legal. The school board in its resolutions called attention to the fact that the United States government is founded upon principles to be found in the Bible, and that the study of the Bible has been made compulsory at Harvard and some other great universities of the land.

One of the greatest crosses a missionary has to bear is the lack of family fellowship. This is well illustrated in the case of Rev. William Remfry Hunt, veteran missionary of the Disciples of Christ, who has spent thirty years in China. He is an Englishman, and part of his family are now living there. Two sons live in Wisconsin. The entire Hunt family has never been together at one time to have a family group picture taken. Mr. Hunt is supported on the field by Seventh Street Church of Disciples, Richmond, Va. He is now in this country recuperating his health, but expects to go back to the foreign field to finish out his life.

Church Federation Advertises Good Movies

The Religious Education Department of the Sacramento Church Federation has taken a new tack with the movie problem in that city. Volunteer workers visit each theater the first time a new film is put on. The committee votes at the close of the performance whether the film shall be publicly commended or whether the attitude of the committee shall be silence. The movie men have quickly sensed the value of the commendation of the church people, and the result has been a notable improvement in the quality of pictures shown in Sacramento.

Minister of the Same Church Fifty Years

In this land where many churches change ministers once a year, it is hard to understand the state of mind of English and Scottish churches whose ministers often spend most of their lives serving a single congregation. The Congregational church at Brentwood, England, has heard 4,635 sermons by Rev. William Legerton, who has served this church for fifty years. He perhaps holds the record for pastoral service in a single church. Two generations have been taken into the church, and now some of the people of the third generation are being received.

Miss Royden Will Visit America

The visit of Miss Maude Royden to America in the spring will be one of the most interesting features of the ecclesiastical calendar. Miss Royden is the daughter of a shipbuilder who was given a baronetcy late in life. She grew up in the luxury of the upper middle classes and had time to reflect deeply on the problems of her nation. After she gained a vote in the civil affairs, she turned her attention to the disabilities under which women suffer in the church. She was permitted to address selected audiences from the chancel steps in the Anglican Church, but this was not enough. She became the evening preacher at the City Temple in London. Since then she has been associated with Rev. Percy Dearmer in the Fellowship Guild. While she is claimed by many parties and sects, she has kept her mind singularly open to new ideas, and is by no means orthodox in

Many Nations Meet in Chicago "Y" Meeting

THE ends of the earth met at the Chicago Y. M. C. A. on December 28. The students' department of the Association for the seventh year provided a good old-fashioned American Christmas dinner with turkey and pumpkin pie for the foreign students who were in the city. Over three hundred students sat down together, a few of them women, but for the most part men. The dinner was provided by the gracious hospitality of Cyrus H. McCormick. Mr. W. F. Hypes, president of the Chicago Young Men's Christian Association, presided at the dinner.

The roll of countries was called, and then one realized what a cosmopolitan group it was. The following countries were named as the roll was called: Africa, Argentina, Armenia, Australia, the Barbadoes, Brazil, Bolivia, British West Indies, Peru, China, French Guiana, Egypt, France, Greece, Guatamala, Hawaii, India, Jamaica, Japan, Corea, Norway, the Philippines, Porto Rico, Russia, San Domingo, Costa Rica, Siam, Ukrania, and Germany. The German students were two young women recently arrived, and they were given a special ovation. Of all the national groups, the largest by far was the group of young Filipinos.

When the list of schools was called, there was also an astonishing diversity. The few native Chicagoans realized for the first time probably that they live in the leading educational city of America. The University of Chicago led, with Northwestern a close second. In the list were students of the fine arts, and of the Lindloff College of Applied Therapeutics. Several were students of the Greer College of Motoring. The various professional schools had a liberal showing of students, including the theological seminaries. Nor was the list of schools confined to those under Protestant auspices. Loyola University and DePaul University were among the institutions named.

There was no attempt to make any discriminations on the basis of religion. Students from Catholic countries were there, and were unembarrassed. Among the Hindus were many who are still loyal to their native religions. They hold every religion to be true, and Jesus to be one of the great prophets of religion. They deny to the founder of the Christian religion, however, any unique place among these teachers. Evangelical fervor was more manifest among Chinese students than among some other national groups. Large numbers of the students are loyal Protestant Christians.

The students had a good talk fest consisting of nine five minute addresses by men of different nationalities. Jose Carios of the Philippines could hardly be gaveled down, for his blood was hot with the cause of national independence. A man from Korea spoke who insisted that world peace might be born in just such an international group as this assembly of students. Ivan Yaroslvtzeff from Russia insisted that the way to settle radicalism is to give the people something to eat. M. Guzman of Bolivia called the period we are now living in humanity's Christmas, for in this time the whole world thinks of the Christmas song, "Gloria in Excelsis." Masuo Kato brought greetings from Japan and said, "We accept with you the responsibility of creating a better future." One of the keenest and most discriminating addresses was that by T. J. Cornelius of Indiana. He contrasted Lenin, the realist, and Ghandi, the idealist, as typical of eastern and western points of view, greatly to the advantage of the western. He insisted that the position of Ghandi was more Christian than that of many so-called Christian statesmen.

Mr. McCormick spoke briefly and gave the young men a good motto: "If you want to get on, get honor and then get honest." This needs to be repeated aloud to appreciate its alliteration. The closing address was by Bishop Nicholson, who with his characteristic love of research brought a handful of newspaper clippings to prove that the city in spite of its commercialism had much of the real Christmas spirit in its heart. The bishop spoke of the new appreciation on the part of Christians of the truths in other religions, and he then interpreted Jesus Christ as the fulfillment of the hopes of all religious groups in the world.

any particular school of opinion. Though a member of the Anglican church, she has friends in many communions. She is described as a "small, sallow, lame spinster past forty, whose garment of beauty is her art, her vivacious audacity and her magnetism." Her itinerary in America has not yet been announced, but it is thought she will visit many of the leading cities of the country.

The Christian Century Is Repudiated

A "congress" of those Disciples of Christ represented by the Christian Standard was recently held in Louisville, Ky. Among other resolutions it adopted the following: "Be it resolved that this congress repudiate the position and propaganda of The Christian Century and protests that it in no way represents the brethren here assembled. Furthermore, we make request of the United Christian Missionary Society that it also repudiate the position and propaganda of The Christian Century."

Y. M. C. A. Succeeds in the Philippines

The wonderful versatility of the Y. M. C. A. is seen in its ability to adapt itself to conditions in the various foreign lands. Going to the Philippine Islands ten years ago, the Association had to face in the early days of its work there the natural conservatism of a people toward a novel method of religious work. At the end of the ten years there are 3558 members in the three branches of the work. The student branch has been entirely taken over by native Filipinos, while the other departments are in a period of rapid change. A training school is now in operation to train Filipino secretaries. Up to the present time it has seemed necessary to keep the direction of the physical activities in American hands and the general secretary for the islands is an American.

John Wanamaker's Message Given Wings

Rev. Percival H. Barker recently secured from John Wanamaker a statement of his life principles. Mr. Parker then preached a sermon on Mr. Wanamaker in the Point Breeze Presbyterian Church of Pittsburgh, which was sent out into the air by the Westinghouse Electric Co., by wireless. Mr. Wanamaker has a wireless set in his own home. He sat at home in Philadelphia, and listened to the sermon. It is estimated that over 200,000 people heard Mr. Barker. Mr. Wanamaker emphasizes the place the daily reading of the Bible has had in building up for him a successful career.

Methodism Has an Independent Journal

In the Methodist denomination, most of the newspapers are published by the book committee of the church and are therefore under direct control of the general conference. The one outstanding exception is Zion's Herald, a journal which recently completed 99 years of history. Zion's Herald is controlled by the Wesleyan Association. It has in times gone by been conspicuous in advocating innovations in the church and in opposing positions taken by the bishops. Bishop Blake credits the Zion's Herald with being responsible for the new plan of area jurisdiction for the bishops of the church. Plans are being made for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the paper one year hence.

Drew Theological Seminary Offers Special Lectures

Drew Theological Seminary, a leading theological institution of the Methodist Episcopal church, located at Madison, N. J., recently offered a course of lectures by Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, pastor of Central Methodist church of Detroit, on "The Preacher in His Study." The lectures given by Dr. Hough were: "The Preacher as Student," "The Preacher as Scholar," "The Preacher as a Man of Letters," and "The Preacher and His Message."

Episcopalian Editor Justifies Methodists in Rejecting Lambeth Appeal

The editor of the Churchman has committed the major heresy in publishing recently an editorial in which he justifies the Methodists in rejecting the Lambeth appeal. The Churchman said in a recent issue: "For a great communion like the Methodist Episcopal church, with its abundant evidence of God's gift of grace, to question the validity of the orders of

Preaching and Paganism

By ALBERT PARKER FITCH,

Professor of the History of Religion in Amherst College.

THIS volume contains the Lyman Beecher Lectures on Preaching for 1920, which were delivered by Dr. Fitch this year, under the auspices of Yale University. In this book the author "asserts the eternal and objective reality of that Presence, the consciousness of Whom is alike the beginning and the end, the motive and the reward of religious experience."

The Fruits of Victory

By NORMAN ANGELL

Author of "The Great Illusion."

NO ONE is really prepared to face the questions which the discussion of disarmament is bringing to the fore unless he is informed of the economic facts underlying such discussion. Norman Angell has furnished just this information in his new volume, "The Fruits of Victory." The argument of the book is that from an economic viewpoint war is utterly futile. Every minister who plans to take his part in the coming campaign for disarmament should have this volume and master its contents.

its clergy, even if church unity could be furthered or even accomplished by so doing, would be, as it seems to us, an event of most tragic consequence to Christendom." The Rt. Rev. Chauncey B. Brewster, Bishop of Connecticut, has challenged the editor to show how the Lambeth appeal makes such a demand on Methodists. This challenge is accepted and is easily disposed of by the Churchman which quote large sections from Headlam's recent book "The Doctrine of the Church and Christian Reunion." The editor of the Churchman issues this further challenge: "Church unity will not get beyond the dead point until, under the propulsion of the Holy Spirit, the doctrine of apostolic succession, elevated to a disproportionate importance in the doctrine of the church, sinks to the place it occupied in the early centuries."

Mission Worker Killed by Automobile

Miss Bertha Merrill, mission worker on the east side in New York in the employ of the United Christian Missionary Society, was struck by an automobile on Christmas day and killed. Her girlhood home was Springfield, Ill. She attended Eureka college, and made the beginnings of city mission work in connection with the Russian mission conducted by the Disciples in Chicago, on Union street, near Fourteenth. She was frequently employed to interpret city missions at conventions in various parts of the country.

Aberammergau Will Not Sell Out

The American movie producers have at last found some people they cannot buy. Various concerns have been making a desperate effort to secure the film rights for the 1922 exhibition of the Passion Play. One offer running to 70,000,000 marks has been considered, but has been refused. The villagers are standing firm in their resolution not to "play Judas to our tradition, despite our poverty." The giving of the Passion Play is a custom that grew out of a religious vow, and is not a commercial scheme as some may have imagined.

Christian Mayor Is a Success

The success of Prof. E. R. Cockrell the college professor who became mayor of Ft. Worth, is now an admitted fact. He was a teacher of economics in Texas Christian University for many years. He has shown himself a man who could face out the practical details of an administration. The Ft. Worth Record speaks thus of him: "Inaugurating an innovation in the form of periodic public meetings where he has reported in person to the citizens, and asked questions and criticisms, Mayor Cockrell has shown that he considers himself the servant of the people and that the city administration should be an open book for the people who have created it and who pay the bills. With department commissioners who are making new records in modern and efficient city management, and a mayor who is the servant of the people as well as the leader in civic affairs and who has shown the courage to break precedents and move forward for a better Fort Worth, this city is rapidly moving toward its destiny—leadership among the municipalities of the great Southwest."

Prayer Book Revision is Proceeding

The growing demand for a revision of the Book of Common Prayer of the Anglican church has brought renewed activity on the part of the committee. Some of the scripture selections which have long been regarded as inappropriate have been changed, and the prayers for rain and fine weather are greatly abridged. Bishop Welldon has asked for the privilege of ex tempore prayers, but it seems unlikely that this will be granted. The Athanasian creed will be used only once a year, on Trinity Sunday. The new Book of Common Prayer will contain a harvest thanksgiving service. An effort is being made for more variety in the morning and evening services of the church.

Cannot Tell Christmas Story in New York Schools

Canon William Seafe Chase, of the Episcopal communion, is making an investigation of the rules of the Board of Education of Brooklyn, which at present forbid the telling of the Christmas story in the public schools. A kindergarten teacher who told the Christmas story last year was notified that she would be removed from her position if she repeats this story at any subsequent Christmas. The objection to the Christian story comes from the large Jewish population, of course. Canon William Seafe Chase takes the position that this is a Christian country, having been so declared by the Supreme Court, and that Christianity is the common law of the state according to the courts of New York state. His position is that the Board of Education has exceeded its rights.

Movies in the Hands of Timber Wolves

The Watertown clericus of the Episcopal church listened recently to a paper by Rev. Louis T. Scofield, of Pierrepont Manor, on the moving picture industry. Mr. Scofield is himself the author of scenarios. He referred to a report that the life of Christ is to be filmed. Commenting on this, he said: "The movie people have capitalized crime, the uncleanness of sex, the bestialities of the underworld: now for the same reason they wish to capitalize the gospel." Mr. Scofield is opposed to censorship. His objection to this process is stated thus: "I do not want a committee to tell me what books I may read or what food I may eat or what clothes I may wear. Reliable criticism is one thing, censorship is another. Such censorship as already exists can boast of ineptitudes fully as great as those of the movie magnates."

Episcopalian Hospitality Most Cordial

The Massachusetts Federation of Churches is holding follow-up conferences on rural problems in various sections of the state. The conference at Concord, Mass., was entertained at Trinity Episcopal church. Rev. Smith A. Dexter, rector of this church, provided a complimentary luncheon for his guests, and at the close of the day proposed that a communion service be held. This invitation was accepted, and members of the various communions, including the Baptist, received the sacred emblems at the hands of an Episcopal priest. The quality of the hospitality was so generous that the secretary of the church federation wrote a letter of appreciation to the bishop.

Head of Orthodox Church Has Been Selected

Meletias, metropolitan of Athens, who is now touring the United States, has been selected as the ecumenical patriarch of the Eastern Orthodox church in an election held in Constantinople on Dec. 4. This is the first time in centuries that such an election has been held free from the control of the Turkish Sultan, who had always had the privilege of striking from the list the eligibles. There are 3,000,000 members of this communion in the United States who have interest in this election. These come from various countries, but are likely now to be organized into a single denomination in this country instead of being governed by various national ecclesiastical officers.

Public Opinion and the Steel Strike

By the Commission of Inquiry of
the Interchurch World Movement

Of no other book published in the troubled days since the war can one more truly say, "Here is something every American citizen should read." No matter what he thinks of industrial relations, no matter what his politics, his social position or his creed, every American, in simple duty to his country and himself, ought to read "Public Opinion and the Steel Strike."

Though limited in scope, the report is of more importance to Americans generally than the first and more comprehensive book was. It strikes deeper. It goes beyond the steel strike, in implications if not in facts. It studies, in the light of the western Pennsylvania phases of a single industrial conflict, sets of circumstances which are neither local nor temporary.

Propaganda is the theme. Presuming that public opinion often is the decisive factor in industrial war, what feeds public opinion? When an army of workmen walked out of steel mills throughout the country, stopping a great basic industry, how accurately was the interested public informed?

Public opinion was misdirected systematically, according to the commission of inquiry. Pulpit and press, unions and companies, public officials and welfare organizations—all failed, for one reason or another, to provide the public with accurate information.

Trained students of social phenomena, indorsed by a commission of which Bishop Francis J. McConnell is chairman, here present detailed evidence in support of their contention that public opinion was scientifically poisoned and American law was brazenly betrayed by press, church and government in order that strikers might be beaten—all with the implication that the same thing may be expected elsewhere in America tomorrow.

Prof. Alva W. Taylor commends this new book as one of the most challenging published in many years.

The Prophetic Ministry For Today

By BISHOP CHARLES D. WILLIAMS
The Lyman Beecher Yale Lectures for 1920

FOR years Bishop Williams has tried hard to do the work of a prophet to his own times. He has practiced a persistent faith in the power of the spoken word to keep before men the high and unwelcome standards that alone save a people from perishing.

He talks here most intimately of the calling and work of the ministry, so understood, in the hope of aiding his colleagues and himself to stand fast in their allegiance to this great Commission to the end.

Genuineness, earnestness, courage, intellectual honesty, spiritual passion—these are some of the fundamental characteristics of Bishop Williams, according to Dr. Joseph Fort Newton. An outstanding preacher-prophet, he is well able to discuss "The Prophetic Ministry for Today."

New Books by ROGER W. BABSON

Author of "Religion and Business."

Enduring Investments

Raising the large sums required to finance non-money making organizations like the churches and colleges, which do so much for human welfare, has always been their most difficult task. Perhaps this is because the soliciting has been done by those who were (literally) good at spending other people's money, who had never even tried to make any money themselves. Mr. Babson has been consulted on the making of money by the wealthiest interests of America. When he writes a book to prove that it is the best business wisdom to go into these more enduring investments that never pay back even the principal, and do so on a larger scale than the world has ever seen—well, business men will all want to look at the proof.

"Enduring Investments" is the semi-miracle working opener of blind financial eyes that over-burdened ministers, trustees and administrative Boards have been hoping would come to their rescue. ($1.50).

Making Good in Business

The famous Business Expert here applies a fundamental knowledge of business principles to daily business life. The latest work by the author of "Fundamentals of Prosperity" is crammed with the most valuable sort of hints and suggestions for the attainment of a well-balanced, normal, successful, business career. ($1.25).

The Future of the Churches

Mr. Babson shows in a constructive way how the future prosperity and achievement of the church are dependent on its ability to enter fully into the manifold life of the people, and stand as firmly for social and civic righteousness as for the meeting and supplying distinctly spiritual needs. ($1.00).

THE third Lord's Day in January is set apart in the missionary calendar of Disciples churches as Education Day. On this day the attention of the whole church should be called to the importance of Christian education and the necessity for the church to maintain institutions of higher learning, where a leadership for the church can be adequately trained. On this day the whole church should be informed, and made aware, of the excellent work which the various Disciples Universities, Colleges, Schools of Religion, Bible Colleges and Chairs are doing, in building the Kingdom of God. On this day the whole church should be challenged to a generous support—through the budget or by special offering—of the holy cause of Christian education. Money given for Christian education will be used to assist the institution for which it was intended. Send all Education Day offerings to the Board of Education, 222 Downey Avenue, Indianapolis, Indiana.

The Life of Christ

By REGINALD J. CAMPBELL, D. D.

Vicar of Christ Church, Westminster, and formerly Minister of City Temple, London

A record of all that modern scholarship can tell of the life of Jesus, written by a world-famous preacher, who has brought to his task years of study, a striking felicity of style, and a deep understanding of the expression of a great religious philosophy in an actual life.

“THEOLOGIES may come and go, but the Jesus of Christian faith and worship possesses an immediacy independent of all theorizing about its nature, an intimacy indissolubly one with the life of the church he indwells.” Such is the viewpoint of Dr. Campbell in this new work. He continues: “Every reader knows the impossibility of conveying a complete pen picture of any personality whatsoever. You may describe minutely the appearance, manners, voice, and other peculiarities of a new acquaintance, but you do not succeed in giving to any one at a distance your own impression of the man himself, his spiritual idiom, so to speak; the thing which constituted that man’s special individuality and differentiates him from all the rest of the world is the indescribable. No matter how much you may have heard beforehand about a person or read of him and his doings, it is only when you come into actual contact with him that you receive a true idea of what he is. It is the present writer’s conviction that this has been largely overlooked in recent years in the criticism of New Testament literature. The only right method of approach to the Jesus of the New Testament is through the living witness, the witness of his continued presence with his church. No other method can yield any but misleading results.”

“We cannot regard what Jesus was,” the author concludes, “as an open question; we must assume that to be settled by nineteen centuries of Christian witness. Hence when critics of the gospel records of his ministry diverge from the accepted view of the church on this point we can only reply that they are not in a position to determine it; we know Jesus, not from criticism of literary sources, but from the unimpeachable fact that there is a continuity of Christian life which claims to derive historically from him and to be immediately dependent upon fellowship with him in the ordinances of the church and the ministry of the word.”

When Dr. Campbell went from the City Temple to the vicarage of Christ Church, Westminster, he told of his changed point of view in “A Spiritual Pilgrimage.” He really continues his story in this latest work. This is not simply another Life of Christ, but a different Life of Christ.

Price of the book $3.00, plus 20 cents postage.

No Time to Revive the Old Revivalism

AT this moment in the church year evangelism always assumes large proportions in Christian thinking. During the holiday several conferences of evangelists were held. A wholesome evangelistic spirit is of the very essence of Christian experience and passion. But the very name evangelism has suffered through the perversions to which the fine art of soul saving has been subjected. In this period of reaction following the war it is easier to follow old-time custom than to blaze new paths, and church leaders are in danger these days of attempting to revive certain discarded methods of Christian recruiting. To repeat former errors only sets back the great task of bringing men and women of good-will everywhere into the church of Christ. The professional revivalism of the past stands indicted on several counts. Its sordid commercialism robbed it of spiritual power. Big fees to well-known spellbinders became a scandal. Another count against it was its irreverence. The most holy things were phrased in the cheapest slang for the sake of the sensational shock. If the church is wise, she will no longer allow the holy things of the altar to be pawed over with profane hands. The recruiting work of the past labored with a partly wrong psychology. It emphasized the self-regarding motives. Often enough no motives were presented, but an unethical use of mob psychology, which induced men and women to act without depth of conviction characterized the revival meeting. Under the stress of pseudo-emotion, thousands were swept forward to an altar while but few among them had any root of moral purpose. This is no time to countenance the revival of past errors. The church's recruiting activities need reformation. Probably the evangelism for the new age must be carried on by modest and unselfish people whose reward is not all in this world. It must use the teaching method and appeal to the great motives to which Jesus appealed. It will not judge itself by results this year or next. To make America Christian and the world Christian requires more than an amiable spasm. What is needed is statesmanship and pedagogy, all motivated by powerful spiritual conviction.

Government Votes Supplemental Gift to Russian Relief

THE voting of $20,000,000 for Russian famine relief by the United States government is an act of first rank moral significance. The representatives and senators who voted for this bill are all men who have conceived the greatest abhorrence for the government under which Russians live. They might have said, Overthrow your bolshevist czar, and we will feed you! But they did not. While the sum is relatively small for a great people like ours to give, it should be remembered that such grants are seldom voted. Most famines throughout the world have been met by private charity. Yet with both public and private charity at work, many millions must perish in Russia before spring. Sir Philip Gibbs, the widely-known journalist, writing about the conditions in Russia, gives the following picture: "Thousands of people are swallowing a blue clay to give themselves a sense of being filled, though at the cost of horrible internal pains. There is nothing else for food in the houses of the peasants I visited but that handful of hard clay and a small bowlful of apple leaves ground up into power as flour. In Samara and Saratof and Simoirsk, and Kazan and hundreds of other places, children are left by their parents who can not feed them any more. In the Ufa district there are 22,080 abandoned children; in the Samara district 28,000, and most of them are picked up with but a few rags about them, and as starved as birds who fall from the nest to the frozen ground." The government's action is purely supplemental to voluntary charity and is in no sense a substitute for it. Through the American Relief Association, the Friends' organization and the Red Cross the gifts of those who cannot keep faith with their own consciences while such wretchedness obtains should continue to be sent.

Let Mr. Debs Go To Russia—and Come Back!

MR. DEBS desires to go to Russia. He is a great admirer of Lenin. He should be given every facility to go and to come back again. The American workingman should know from all angles of interpretation exactly what is going on over there. The Russian situation is too big for any single interpreter to tell the whole truth. From the mouth of just such a man as Debs most important truth might be learned as to the collapse of bolshevist rule. Mr. Debs would not expect to find that collapse. But he is fair enough to tell on his return just what he did find. Meanwhile the American people continue to profess the creed of their fathers about the freedom of the press and freedom of speech. They are not children in their mentality to be protected from hurtful ideas by some officious postmaster general or some attorney general. The people of this nation may not be infallible, but they consider themselves sufficiently grown up to face the problems of the world as they are. After the first newspaper publicity of Mr. Debs' release, the public has quickly forgotten his case. The conservatives ought to have been able to see during the past three years that by their actions they were giving Mr. Debs and his ideas a vogue which they could hardly achieve in the normal course. The sons of revolutionary fathers instinctively listen to the man who pays in the coin of suffering for his convictions. The socialist leader free will make more speeches, but to smaller audiences. A trip to Russia would be an educational discipline for Mr. Debs as well as a source of information for American intelligence.

Marcus Garvey and the American Negro

THE American Negro has long waited for a leader who would help him assert his racial pride. No down-trodden people has endured oppression forever. Either they have risen against their oppressors or they have perished. Last August there came to New York a West Indian by the name of Marcus Garvey. It was not long until the whole Negro colony was filled with new emotions. The cry had been raised, "Africa for the Africans." Plans for a continental republic of black men were expounded in public meetings to gaping crowds. An international organization was created called the Universal Negro Improvement Association which claims a membership of 4,500,000, half of whom live in the United States. This organization already holds the majority of the stock in the Black Star Line which is reported to own three vessels. There is no thought of racial amalgation in the movement. On the contrary there is such a stiffening of racial consciousness that the mulattos and octoroons of this country will find themselves in bad standing in an organization which emphasizes the value of a black skin quite as much as some groups would assert the desirability of being white. The Garvey movement is not a secret society, though it has a gorgeous ceremonial with robes and ritual. White men love to parade in robes, as do most other races. It is not to be wondered at that a Negro organization should find use for such devices. The leadership of the new Negro organization is not religious, and religious leaders may well question whether the American Negro is safe if he is tempted to turn aside from the faith of a hundred years under the spell of the new watchwords. Negro bishops and churchmen are not enthusiastic for the Garvey movement. There can be no doubt, however, that whatever civil disabilities still remain for the American Negro must be removed or there will be increasing friction between the white and black races in various communities all over the nation.

Erecting Criticism Into a Dogma

REFORMS of one age tend to become the dogmas of succeeding centuries. Certain critical views of ancient literatures that were once heretical have taken on in some circles the attributes of dogma. Just now many old questions are being reopened. Dr. John Scott of Northwestern University has discredited some of the work of former students of Homer by bringing forth new evidence tending to show that both the Odyssey and the Iliad are the work of a single author rather than anthologies of a whole people. The sneer of Huxley that the Gadarene swine could never have run down a slope into the sea of Galilee because there is no such slope, is disproved by better geographic information. The Old Testament reference to Ethiopia as a great and strong country was in the nineteenth century regarded as hyperbole. Now comes an opinion of certain Harvard scholars to the contrary. Ethiopia really was a mighty country in antiquity and a good deal is being unearthed with regard to its history. Such reversals of opinion are used by those who hold to eighteenth century ways of understanding the Bible as proving that the Bible is to be taken in the literalistic way. But such an inference is by no means valid. What such reversals of opinion in the field of antiquarian study indicate is that the task is by no means completed. It is still possible to hold an open mind with regard to many biblical questions. The tendency of modern research seems to confirm the historical reliability of the biblical books rather than to weaken it. While the dogmatist of the critical view and the dogmatist of the reactionary view of the Bible may be willing to let investigation cease, the honest searcher for the truth will welcome all new light. With Palestine out of the hands of the Turk, the next two decades may contribute more to biblical knowledge than the past hundred years. Buried under the soil of Palestine there yet lie treasures of great value to the student of religion.

The Jews and Christian Liberties

OURS is one of the few countries of the world where Jews have complete religious liberty. What effect this liberty has had is shown by the fact that hardly more than ten per cent of the Jews of great cities belong to the synagogue. What persecution failed to do through over two thousand years of history, toleration seems about to accomplish in the brief space of a hundred years. The Jews are intermarrying in almost every neighborhood, and the children of these unions nearly always come up in the Christian faith, if they learn any religion at all. These defections have lately brought about quite a stiffening of racial and religious consciousness among certain leading Jews. Grown suspicious of all public institutions they are indulging in unwarranted interference with the work of many public servants. Recently a teacher in Brooklyn was reprimanded for telling the Christmas story. If every casual reference to Christian history is to be excised from the teaching of the schools, how shall we teach either history or geography? Meanwhile the references to Jewish history are unchallenged by anyone. The use of the Bible in public schools has its most vehement opponents among the Jews. Over one-fourth of the states have outlawed the Bible and declared it to be a sectarian book, a legal decision that on the face of it is absurd. A fair-minded Christian will certainly admit that the public school is no place for proselytism. But when Jewish prejudice even raises objection to a Christian minister praying in the senate, it betrays a narrowness of mind that is deplorable. Let rabbis pray there also in their turn, for if prayer is efficacious at all it is not limited to Christian ministers alone. In America, with our great tradition of liberty, the religious organizations should not pursue nagging tactics toward each other, but rather find in Gamaliel's principle the suggestion for a spirit of toleration.

Americanization Program Goes Forward

RIGHT after the world war everybody was interested in something called Americanization, and then we all speedily forgot. Has anything come of the movement? The University of Minnesota in the heart of a great immigrant state established a department for the training of Americanization workers. More than fifty of these specially equipped men and women have been sent out to take positions with churches, associations, boards of education and other organizations. Meanwhile the upstart worker with no training has gradually been eliminated. Under the term Americanization a good deal of coercion was practiced on foreigners. This kind of thing had to stop. Others sought to exploit the immigrant under guise of the popular movement. The word was the cover for sectarian propaganda in more than one instance. Meanwhile the "lunatic fringe of reformers" has moved on to fatter pastures, but the real job is still to be done. The various immigrant groups have much to contribute to our American life. The educated worker appreciates this fact and seeks to conserve the value of it to the full. At the same time the good old American tradition is vital to the immigrant as a citizen. The picture of Abraham Lincoln adorns the cottage of more than one Russian peasant to-day and the immigrant in this country may easily be invested with the idealism associated with the fathers of our republic. Into all these uplift tasks a new spirit has come in recent years. We seek to work with people instead of for them. At Brotherhood House in Chicago, conducted by the Disciples denomination, no lodger is ever put out without a house meeting and action by a majority of the residents. This is far different from the old-time idea of Lady Bountiful who descended into the slums occasionally to astonish the neighborhood with the magnanimity of her gifts.

Our Young Intellectuals

A BOOK was published the other day describing and discussing "Civilization in the United States," by thirty writers of the younger set. It is described as "an adventure in intellectual cooperation," not a haphazard compilation or conventional symposium, but a deliberate and organized effort of like-minded men and women "to see the problem of American civilization as a whole, and to speak the truth about it as they see it." The book, we are told, grew out of actual meetings of the group, and the result is "a reinterpretation of American life that has no exact equivalent since the work of the eighteenth century French encyclopedists." To which is added three essays on American civilization from the foreign point of view, English, Irish, Italian.

Turning to the table of contents we find essays on the City, Politics, Journalism, Law, Education, Science, Philosophy, Music, Art, the Theater, Radicalism, the Small Town, History, Sex, the Family, the Alien, Advertising, Business, Nerves, Sport, Humor, and so forth. Religion is omitted. Apparently it has no place in American civilization; no influence, no meaning. It is ignored as a thing that does not signify. A deliberate effort to see American life "as a whole" does not discover the existence of religion as one of the forces at work. One would have thought that at least one of the group of writers might have detected the presence of religion; as an obstruction, if nothing else; but it is entirely overlooked. In a recent issue of the New York Evening Post there appeared a review of "The Truths We Live By," by J. W. Hudson, in which we may perhaps find one reason for so strange a lapse of memory:

I may as well confess that I approached the book with all the misgivings usually aroused in a so-called "modern young man" by the title, and all the prejudices certain to be touched by the author's announcement that these eternal verities are none other than our classic theological pillars of faith: God, immortality, and freedom of choice. Upon the further declaration of the world as a moral order, I was indeed prepared for the worst. Why? Clearly because I was a typical modern university passman, who, like the rest of us, had exultingly absorbed the main generalizations of nineteenth century materialism in college, poisoned the joy of life in as many innocent young illiterati as we could for a while, become bored by it all in a year or two, and, finally, settled down to our trades and professions, feeling that the ultimate questions of life—God (imagine!), immortality (the very idea!) and freedom (could any thing be more absurd?)—were hopeless enigmas which stern logic drove up to view with extreme pessimism, and which were best met with a joyous Rabelaisian cynicism.

I believe that this is an accurate picture of a young man's philosophical outlook today. He looks upon God as a discredited hypothesis, upon immortality as a dual mask of vanity and terror to hide the horrid face of death, and upon free will as a contradiction of all science. As for morality—which he conceives of only in terms of the bourgeois virtues—it inspires him with loathing and nausea (if he is a young intellectual), and with a certain perfunctory hypocrisy (if he is in the bond business). A religious education based on Tom Paine and Ingersoll, a conception of the social sciences founded on the great English evolutionists, and a view of philosophy and morality fathered by Nietzsche and vulgarized by H. L. Mencken, comprise the main articles of his intellectual equipment. As counter-agents to this depressing view of life, the Young Intellectuals have evolved a conception of the "pure artist" and the "pure humorist," while the young business men have evolved a fetish of success, expressed in some such slogan of hard-boiled elegance as "I'm gonna get mine, see!"

Here is the new style; we are getting along. George Eliot, as Myers tells us, renounced God, immortality, and duty, as they walked together in Trinity garden, Cambridge. But she did so sadly and with such infinite regret, as one might yield a scroll of prophecy. Nor did she actually surrender the sovereign obligation of moral law. God, how inconceivable, she said; immortality, how unbelievable; duty, how peremptory and commanding. But that was long ago. Besides, George Eliot was a "Victorian," and to a Young Intellectual that is taboo—the one thing about all others to avoid. The times have changed. A great war has divided history into before and after. Today the renunciation of God is not a bereavement, but a "stunt" performed by "typical young men" dancing on the graves of a "wasted generation" to the accomplishment of jazz music. It is done, as this writer tells us frankly, with "the cocksureness and sardonic cleverness of the modern gospel of futility, tempered by vulgar hedonism."

Exactly; at last we have found the words to describe the new style. What strikes us in the attitude of the Young Intellectual of today is not its flippancy, its comic logic, its casual omniscience, but its incredible vulgarity. A "religious education" based on Tom Paine, Bob Ingersoll, and the Mencken version of Nietzsche—what a background for a modern university man! What is to be said of our institutions of higher learning, if they leave "typical" young men not morally bankrupt, but spiritually illiterate. It is a queer outcome of our education when it ends by making men regard morality with "loathing," or else with "perfunctory hypocrisy," and the eternal verities that make us men as sentimental fictions to be tossed aside. Something has gone wrong when a "modern young man" mistakes cleverness for culture and futility for wisdom. Whatever "the bourgeois virtues" may be, they do seem to move on a level a little higher than the ethics of the thug, "I'm gonna get mine, see!" There was once a man named James Russell Lowell. True, he was a "Victorian," but he was reputed to be a man of intellect, and, though not a devotee of "free verse," he had some fame as a poet. He wrote two sentences pertinent to the matter in hand:

The worst kind of religion is no religion at all, and these men, living in ease and luxury, indulging themselves in the amusement of going without a religion, may be thankful that they live in lands where the gospel they neglect has tamed the beastliness and ferocity of the men who, but for Christianity, might long ago have eaten their carcasses like the South Sea Islanders, or cut off their heads, and tanned their hides, like the monsters of the French Revolution. When the microscopic search of skepticism, which has hunted the heavens and sounded the seas to disprove the existence of a Creator, has turned its attention to human society, and has founded a place on this planet ten miles square where a man may live in decency, comfort and security, supporting and educating his children unspoiled and unpolluted—a place where age is revered, infancy respected, womanhood honored, and human life held in due regard—when skeptics can find such a place ten miles square on this globe, where the gospel has not gone and cleared the way and laid the foundations and made decency and security possible, it will then be in order for the skeptical literati to move thither and ventilate their views.

What should be the attitude of the church toward the Young Intellectuals with their smug conceit and garish smartness? It must be patient with the young who, since ever time began, have been wont to fill their belly with the east wind and blow the twisted bugle of revolt. It must keep covenant with truth and the advance of the human mind, remembering the epigram of Erasmus when he said, "By identifying the new learning with heresy, you make orthodoxy synonymous with ignorance." But it dare not compromise with a superficial, artificial, paprika cleverness, devoid of the refinements of the intellect and the amenities of the heart. When Jesus stood before Herod he said not a word. Where there was no moral earnestness, no sense of spiritual need, even he was helpless. He faced cheap vulgarity with the silence of divine scorn, going "the way of dominion in pitiful, high-hearted fashion," and Herod is known to us only because he stood for a moment, unseeing, in the Light of the World—and vanished!

John Gerson Redivivus

EVERY era of progress and every great social issue has its Gerson. Like the prototype of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries he is scholarly, zealous in good works, of the highest personal character, grieves over the evils of his times and the institutions of his society, offends mildly by his rebuke of blatant simony, and still defends the established order and its corrupt institutions with a vigor and determination which insures them a comfortable security, while he pounces upon those who would root out the evil at its source with a zeal which surpasses his onslaughts upon the corruptionists themselves. John Hus and Jerome of Prague, certain historians intimate, would probably never have been burned at the stake had it not been for the insistence upon that policy by John Gerson, the foremost scholar and "reformer" of his age. He himself became in the end a fugitive and died teaching little children to join him in the prayer, "Lord, have mercy on thy poor servant Gerson." Yet he had written, in the height of his influence, to the Archbishop of Prague, anent the issues raised by Hus and Jerome, imploring him to "cut off the heresies, with their authors, and burn them."

How familiarly the old fellow lives again today, and has revived to muddle every great issue of every age! He grieves the reactionaries and stand-patters and corruptionists by stealing their lamb, and then becomes their most serviceable protagonist in executing him who has stolen their sheep. None could write and speak more eloquently and convincingly than he against the abuses of that age when the popes had reached the lowest abysses of corruption and degeneracy which the papacy has ever sounded, and yet none probably had more to do with determining the fate of poor Hus and Jerome, whose crime was the attempt to dig out at their root the evils against which he himself so fervently declaimed. Gerson and his group succeeded in delaying the Protestant Reformation by one hundred years, and insured that degree of violence and intemperance when it did come, from which modern civilization has suffered in every pore of its being. Historians are accustomed to remark that the world was not prepared for the reforms advocated by Hus and his associates; the generations must wait for Luther a century later. In more exact statement they mean that John Gerson and his following were not prepared. In similar fashion it is often asserted that "the people" or "the country" are not ready for this or that thoroughly logical and necessary move of statesmanship, when the fact is rather that a particularly stubborn senatorial or commercial bloc is determined to stay the natural and inevitable course of events as long as possible. In the end the event is usually attended with more or less violence and extreme radicalism. The heavier the body "sitting on the lid," and the longer it holds the lid down, the more noisy is the explosion when it is finally blown off.

The Gersons today are busy preserving our religious denominational order. None is louder in denouncing the evils of the system. None "hates" sectarianism more cordially. None can say bad words with more unction about the viciousness of the factional, divisive spirit in religion. They are wholly and eloquently committed to "Christian unity," especially if all the others will come over and join their denomination. But straightforward proposals for the abolition of the system are censured as premature, and such intemperance is piously deplored. "Reckless radicals" are warned against the unwisdom of "throwing out the baby with the bath." Those who conceive of methods and programs which set the denominational order aside are afflicted with a diseased imagination. They even outdo their historical prototype in conceding the eventual dispossession of the system, but now is not the right time. Comfortable and smooth-running programs of today would be too seriously disturbed by attempts to re-order affairs. Wait. Cut the dog's tail off gradually. No surgery has yet been developed which will keep the dog in good humor while his offending caudal appendage is being removed an inch at a time, but our zealous Gersons do not despair of developing such an art.

The uses of the Gersons is an interesting speculation. They should be taken dispassionately, though they do not take themselves so. It is of their nature to grow vehement, if not violent, when their darling papacy is attacked by others. The deeds of the papacy are pernicious enough; they are themselves the most eloquent witnesses to its iniquity. But heresies which aim at the abolition of the evil thing itself may be meetly atoned for only by anathema and the torch. The sectarian spirit is a terrible sin, but the attempt tightly and finally to choke the vent whence that sin issues as water from the spring, is even more to be condemned. We must preserve the machine and keep it well oiled and running, while we gratify our passion for righteousness by denouncing its product. None can gainsay Gerson's zeal. The comfortable timidity of his doctrine should not too blatantly impugn his sincerity. He knows not what he does. He cannot see ahead a hundred years to witness the civilized world in the throes of a violent and all too futile revolution. He only thinks it easy and comfortable to rebuke "radicalism" in his own day. He dies even before the Hussite wars, which his stubborn caution instigated, have drenched his Europe in their full torrents of blood. He does not know and will never know.

Yet he has his uses. It must needs be that such offences come. A higher, braver intelligence than his might order affairs with more beneficence. Steady progress without the shock of revolution is demonstrated to conserve the larger human values, but the violent redemptive processes which his obstinacy compels are still redemptive. Gerson's contribution to the degree of thoroughness and the sweep attained by the sixteenth century reformation was very considerable. The explosion resounded farther round the world when it did break out, because of the determination with which Gerson caulked the lid.

And it may be possible to discover even now the value of the service which his successors of today are rendering. The timidity which insists on preserving and even polishing up for a seemly continuance our denominational system may be working to larger ends than we quite understand. This timidity demands that something be found to take its place before it is discarded. Hard words are spoken about radical and "destructive" criticism. Perhaps it is wisely designed that these Gersons shall have their way, and their timidity shall be permitted to prevail until the cup of their despair is full. Perhaps even they must be convinced that the highest, most permanent construction consists in putting just nothing in the place of the system without which they timidly conceive that the cause of religion must perish. The worse than uselessness of the sectarian scheme of religious organization may need to be fully revealed before our redemption can be achieved. Perhaps the interposition of intermediate steps would be only tedious and painful to no worthy purpose. Perhaps the substitutions they demand would prove so flimsy as to be scarcely less unworthy than the decadent system which they cherish.

The banalities of religious institutionalism the Gersons never will comprehend. With all of the eloquence of their declamations they are easy reformers. They are not necessarily insincere. They are simply too deeply implicit in the conventional order of things to see clearly. To humor them by accepting substitutes guaranteed to be just as good at all points and a little better in some, does not meet the supreme issue. What will be satisfactory to them will not satisfy that issue at all. One could wish them more open-minded, more brave, less comfortable in their easy compromises. But since they are they, and their ease is immovable, their timidity invincible, their clinging to the dear status quo so stubborn, a few cycles of confusion and progressive deterioration are a relatively small price to pay for the redemption which they shall delay only to make more thorough.

"Princes of the Church"

FOR thirty-three years Dr. Robertson Nicoll, as editor of the British Weekly, has written sketches and interpretations of the great leaders, scholars, and preachers of the church, as one by one they passed off the stage of action. Thirty-three of these tributes are now gathered into a stately volume, entitled, "Princes of the Church," which is appropriately published in celebration of the seventieth birthday of the author. From 1889 to 1921 a panorama of genius passes before us, touched by the soft light of memory and the sweet and awful pathos of the grave, a kind of Westminster Abbey of the British pulpit for a generation, and the names there written are among the greatest of the modern church.

Such a book is an honor to its author, no less than to the men to whom he pays tribute. It shows a catholicity of insight and appreciation hardly to be matched on this side of the water, where the walls of sect have, until recently, been so high that even giants were unable to see each other. At least, from no religious journal in America could a like series of sketches be assembled as a treasure for the whole church. The first sketch has the same qualities of insight and understanding that mark the tribute to Dr. Alexander Whyte with which the volume closes; the style, too, has the same grace, ease and beauty on the first page as on the last—so much so that, but for the dates stretching over a long period, one might infer that the whole book was written during the year just ended. That is to say, Dr. Nicoll found his unique and winsome style early, and has kept it through the years.

Most though not all of the men to whom the great editor pays farewell tribute were dear personal friends, whose passing meant a disabling bereavement. None the less they are studied with detachment, with full knowledge, and with discriminative judgment, and, we need hardly add, with that genius for the details of personal touches—the best kind of gossip—which makes all that Dr. Nicoll writes such a delight. Of Dr. Marcus Dods, whom he knew intimately for thirty years, he writes with a warmth and glow of love hardly found in any other sketch. Dr. Maclaren he regards as out of sight the most brilliant man all round he has ever known, a tribute which, in a galaxy such as this book describes, is notable indeed. For ourselves, we like to think of Maclaren as the Tenny-son of the modern pulpit—as Brooks was its Browning, and Beecher its Shakespeare—his marvelous finish and music of style dedicated, with single-hearted devotion, to the exposition of the Bible. Next to Maclaren the preachers of whom Dr. Nicoll writes with most enthusiasm are Spurgeon, Joseph Parker, and Father Stanton, the glorious evangelical high churchman of St. Albans. A passage descriptive of the preaching of Dr. Parker is memorable:

It was a spiritual wonder. There was about it the touch of miracle. Apparently free from rule, it was unconsciously obedient to the great principles of art. As you listened you saw deeper meanings. The horizon lifted, widened, broadened—the preacher had thrust his hand among your heart strings. You heard the cry of life, and the Christ preached as the answer to that cry. The preacher had every gift. He was mystical, poetical, ironical, consoling, rebuking by turns. Sometimes

As from an infinitely distant land,
Come airs and floating echoes that convey
A melancholy into all our day.

The next moment you could not help smiling at some keen witticism. Then he was ironical, and you remembered Heine, and saw that he knew how much irony is mingled by God in the order of his creation. Then tears sprang to your eyes as he pictured the failure of success, and told of the long, triumphant struggle, and the victory turned into mourning by the death of the only child.

Spurgeon was a towering figure, and perhaps no one—not even Beecher—had so wide and firm a hold upon the popular heart in his generation. Dr. Nicoll thinks the two orators of the first rank in his time were John Bright and Spurgeon. His sturdy figure, his voice of many keys and tones, his air of composed mastery, his simply Saxon style, his compassionate understanding of the life of the people, and, more than all, his yearning for their salvation—all made him the master preacher. Little folk in school, servants in the kitchen, cottars in the highlands, old women in wretched garrets, no less than the learned and famous, knew, understood and loved Spurgeon. No other English preacher has ever had such wide and enduring fame in America, and his sermons are still loved and read by our people.

Dale and Dean Church, Matheson and Ian Maclaren, Liddon and Westcott, Price Hughes and Silvester Horne, two white knights of Christian chivalry, the shining figure of Henry Drummond—these and others live for us in these pages. The two least satisfactory sketches are those of Newman and Martineau, not because one was a Catholic and the other a Unitarian, but because Dr. Nicoll writes of them, apparently, without any personal contact—though he is one of the few who have paid due tribute to the style of Martineau, subtle, strong, varied, precise, and incredibly brilliant. One misses the tribute to Dr. Denney, and Nicoll might have included at least one of the princes of the church in America; but where there is so much for which to be grateful, it seems ungracious to ask for more.

Shall we ever see preachers and teachers such as these again? Yes, like them, yet different, since each age has its own insight and method of expressing the one eternal Message; each in its own tongue speaking of the wonder-ul works of God. But in the authentic voices of our day one hears a new note in Christianity, a note not heard at all in any of the mighty preachers to whom Dr. Nicoll pays tribute—the discovery of the gospel of the kingdom of God as a Beloved Community, in which the truth as it is in Jesus is wrought into the industrial, political and social life of humanity. It is for us to preach the gospel of the kingdom with human passion and prophetic power, as the princes of the church of yesterday preached the word of God for their day.

The Smoke Consumer

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came to me a man who was Down on his Luck. And he got busy with this line of patter, saying:

The world has used me very sadly and I am a much abused man.

And he felt Very Sorry for Himself. And he desired that he might back up the dray of his over-loaded Self-Pity, and dump his misfortune upon me. And I have troubles of mine own, and some besides. For the burdens that I bear for myself are light in comparison to those that I bear for others; yea, and I willingly bear them when there is need. But this man had no need of anything except a little more stiffening in his Spine.

And I pointed out of the window, and we beheld two tall smoke-stacks. And one of them poured forth a Great Black Cloud of Smoke. And the other poured forth little or none. And I directed his gaze to the one that smoked, and said, It is a Mirror, Behold thyself.

And he was displeased:

And I said, Oh, my brother, learn to burn thine own Smoke. Waste not its carbon nor make of it a poison for the very air which thou thyself must consume.

And he said, I understand thee not.

And I said, Then come to, and understand. The man who indulgeth in Self-Pity is a defeated man before the fight beginneth. There is no exercise of the human mind that is so debilitating, so fatal to heroic resolution, as that of nourishing the feeling that thou hast an impossible job, and art of all men most miserable. Hast thou an hard duty to perform? Perform it with resolution, and get it done, and encourage thy soul with the glow of triumph. Who promised unto thee an easy life? And who but a coward and a weakling careth for an easy life? Put on a smoke consumer and get out and get busy in the sunlight. So shalt thou conquer the evils that distress thee; yea, and what is more, thou shalt be the master of thine own soul.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

How Far is it to Childhood Town?

“HOW far is it to Childhood Town?”

A small child asked of me,
Not knowing the pain she gave—
My heart she could not see;
For, as I sought, in simple words,
To please her simple ears,
A tear broke past unwilling eyes,
That looked on other years.

How far is it to Childhood Town?
Oh, many miles, my child—
Beyond the Mountains of Defeat,
Where blasted hopes are piled;
Beyond the Vale of Sorrow, where
The trees with blight are brown.
Far, far away that happy place
We once called Childhood Town.

How far is it to Childhood Town?
Far past the sun-scorched plain,
Where thronging men, with hearts inflamed,
Wage war for sordid gain;
Far o'er the Sea, where many ships
Have stranded and gone down.
Oh, far away that happy realm
We once called Childhood Town.

And yet your heart, my happy child,
Feels naught of human woe;

No mount, no vale, no stormy sea,
Your simple life can know;
For you a river, passing fair,
Flows evermore adown
By that rare realm, sweet Fairyland,
Your own dear Childhood Town.

The Day Breaks!

MAN-MADE laws and doctrines pass;
Statesmanship is withered grass;
They who spake as sovereign gods
Now are mute as lifeless clods;
Some sure voice the world must seek—
Let the Gentle Teacher speak.

Thrones are fallen; wisdom rules;
Foolish kings are kingly fools;
Royal pomp, which craved the sun,
Prostrate is as Babylon;
Love has come to power again;
Lo, the Christ stands—Let Him reign!

Dead is every king and czar—
Dead as all the millions are Whom they slew in fiendish pride,
Slew to swell war's bloody tide:
Righteous God, the past forgive!
Kings are dead: O King Christ, live!

The Galilean Psychology

By Lloyd C. Douglas

EAVESDROPPING, in this instance, was a sin of omission. I merely omitted leaving my office. A group of high school girls were chatting, animatedly, in an adjoining room. The conversation was interestingly informative. I remained. Besides, it was my office, and I had a right to be there.

The subject of discussion was the Latin teacher. All agreed that he was a very good fellow; all agreed that they despised Latin. Had they a thirst for his knowledge it was clear they had the desire under perfect control. I gathered that he was a well-favored youth, goodly to look upon. Many adjectives, pitched to the superlative degree, were bestowed upon him. As a man, then, he left nothing to be desired; as a prince of good fellows he passed the examination with flying colors; as a teacher he was wise and good—but his line of business was beyond understanding. They were resolved—all of them—that the way to win good marks lay in giving him perfect attention when he talked; in rewarding his slightest attempt at humor with responsive smiles; and sundry other canny arts and wiles to intrigue his friendship. But no one of them had any use for Latin; and they confessed that they were taking it because it was a requirement for college entrance.

I am certain this is the prevailing attitude of many people who refer to Jesus as Nazareth as the greatest of all teachers. They are willing to express their devotion to him, as a person, in laudatory terms: they feel obliged to sit at his feet and listen to his words: they say and sing and think of him in eulogistic phrases—but his doctrines are as difficult as they were to those who, long, long ago, shook their heads, dazedly, and muttered: "It is a hard saying: who can hear it?"

CHURCH AND GOSPEL

At the present hour there seems to be a concerted yelp at the wailing-place to the effect that our churches are mostly in a bad way. Nobody has hinted, yet, that there is anything the matter with the Galilean gospel; but almost everybody is agreed that something is ailing the churches which serve as its custodians. There appear to be plenty of diagnosticians, defining the maladies of which the churches suffer; but few confident of a prescription beyond the general advice to "Get back to Christ!"—undeniably excellent admonition, but requiring specific directions to make the dose safe and effective.

It is just possible that we need, today, to make a more thorough study of what might properly be called The Galilean Psychology—meaning the processes by which Jesus dealt with the public mind, and the minds of individuals. That we have given very little attention to this subject is attested in almost every point of contact the churches attempt to establish with the present-day public. Let the bill of charges be considered seriatim.

Considerable study is being made today of church advertising, with a view to calling the general public's attention to its need of religion, and the churches' willingness and ability to supply that need. Not infrequently a group of churches organize a campaign of publicity to announce a "Go to Church Sunday," and hawk the slogan for whatever it will fetch in street cars, hotel lobbies, shop windows, newspapers, and on the billboards.

It would be an unworthy thing to say that the intention back of all this is not the very best in the world; but even a casual examination of it is sufficient to show that it is an unpsychological appeal. It is only a frank and flamboyant confession of defeat. It is equivalent to saying: "The churches have become depopulated. Whereas they used to be able to assume the public's interest in them, and the cause for which they stand, the time has come when they must institute desperate measures to perpetuate themselves."

BAD PUBLICITY

The junior deacon—bless him, there are no better!—says the churches must jump in, and advertise, if they would hold their place in an age gone dippy over advertising. He says, "If it's good business to spend money telling the people about the superior merits of soap, collars, breakfast food and cutlery, it's just as good business for Christianity to give its wares publicity." The agreement sounds plausible enough; but it fails to pass the test of the Galilean psychology.

The soap manufacturer is not handling a unique product; nor does he enjoy a monopoly. If castile soap were the only soap on the market, with none other to be had, it is doubtful whether advertising would be of value. Indeed—to advertise it, under such circumstances, might only make the public uneasy about the quality of this commodity; and would the public not suspect that, if they only knew it, there was somewhere a substitute—perhaps cheaper, perhaps better?

Christianity is unique. In civilization it has no competition worth mentioning. One remembers present-day Judaism; but that is distinctly a racial proposition and only negligibly affect this statement. Christianity has no competitors. To keep the quality of Christianity up to grade needs be the only concern of those who have the care of it. To hawk it about; to peddle it; to paint it on fences, and declaim about it in 48-point caps, only makes the public wonder what ails it!

JOHN BAPTIST, ADVERTISER

When Jesus, the Galilean, is ready to speak it is important that he shall have an audience. John the Baptist goes out to gather up a crowd and prepare the public for the impending ministry of the Master. Does he run about with a bucket of red paint and a broom posting lurid announcements of great things to come? (You are saying "Softly, brother; all this was nineteen centuries ago!") Well; does John do the nineteen-centuries-ago equivalent of red paint? He does not. He rambles out into the Jeshimon Wilderness and shouts his message up and down the sun-parched ravines of that desolated country. A pass ing caravan, en route from Engedi to Joppa, perhaps, hears what he has to say. The news breaks. Before long a vast crowd is coming out at terrific cost to themselves in energy and endurance to hear this hermit speak. What does he say? "One cometh whose shoes I am not fit to lace! Hear ye him!"

Good publicity? I wonder if any of our up-to-datest young advertising specialist could think of a publicity campaign quite so effective as one that would bring thousands of people, on foot, two days' journey into a desert just to hear that, presently, what he had to offer would be accessible. This was an example of the Galilean psychology in action. Its thesis seemed to be as follows: Don't go out and hound the public to take an interest in this cause; but practice methods that will intrigue the public into demanding to be told what the cause is and how it operates.

GALILEAN PUBLICITY

When Jesus is prepared to begin his work he appears one day in John's audience and is introduced. If this story were not genuine and written of The Lord it would have said he then did the usual, the customary, the conventional thing: recognized John as chairman and began with "My friends, I am deeply moved by this fine evidence of your interest in our new undertaking!" These would have been gracious words. No one could have found any fault with them. The people would have smiled and felt flattered; and then they would have yawned and wondered if it wasn't about time they were getting back to Jericho, or wherever they lived. They had waited a long time for a sight of him; and, now that they had seen him, and heard him saying the usual things, they could go home satisfied.

It is almost incredible—but Jesus never spoke one word to that crowd! He never said so much as "I'm glad to see you!" He turned and left without a sign or a syllable. Can anybody's imagination encompass the effect this must have had on that crowd? No; I didn't hint that it was done for effect. I simply say that, according to the record it was done: it is left to us to imagine the effect. Think of our silly little programs of publicity as compared to the keen psychology back of this procedure along the bank of the Jordan!

After awhile Jesus comes back from six weeks leave. Nobody knew what had become of him. When he returned he did not go back to John's crowd at all. He went up into Galilee and made friends with a few fishermen. They followed him home. Next day they came back, bringing neighbors. The news spread. John's crowd heard about it and sped to the point of interest.

BEGGING OR GRIPPING

Never once in the whole of his ministry did Jesus make the slightest attempt to secure a crowd by processes which they could understand. Had he gone about with his disciples, ringing a bell and carrying a banner, only a handful would have followed; mostly because that was the usual, the ubiquitous way of trying to attract the public's attention. Jesus made them come to him. Instead of announcing, at the close of a service, "Now, tomorrow afternoon and tomorrow evening out here on this beautiful hillside, where you can be so comfortable and happy, we will meet again. Do come; bring your neighbors; let nothing keep you away!"—the Master would bring his gripping, binding, lifting address to an abrupt end and leave them standing there dazed while he walked away with his disciples. They would scurry away to find something to eat resolved that they would find him next day wherever he was. Once five thousand of them trailed him for miles into a desert east of Lake Gennessaret. You say, "Yes; but remember this was the Lord." To be sure; this was the Lord, and this was the Galilean psychology, namely, if you desire the public's interest in your cause don't beg the public to accept it; but make them exert themselves to find out about it.

No; I freely admit that this is not the way to sell soap, or candy, or washing machines, or automobiles. Those things are fighting for life in the midst of scrambling competition. Their producers couldn't possibly assume an attitude of dignified reserve and wait for the public to come and beg to be sold these products. If you are in the soap business you must get out with the red paint and the red fire. Christianity isn't anything like the soap business. It is positively unique.

And if today organized Christianity had the spiritual vision to understand the elementary principles of this Galilean psychology it could make the gospel mean to the general public exactly what it meant when Jesus of Nazareth walked with men and preached to crowds so vast that the people trod upon one another. We have been very blind. We have announced short, snappy sermons; spiffy music; tea and cookies; cushioned seats; do come! Is it much wonder we see such small results accruing from our efforts? We have a unique proposition: we have been shown exactly what attitude we should assume toward the public: we have done precisely the opposite thing.

GALILEAN INDEPENDENCE

Sometimes Jesus challenged his public in terms that made them temporarily peevish and indignant. They would get over it. So soon as they had time to think it through they would recover, and come back for more. Once he made some remarks that set them all murmuring. The crowd began to thin out. He did nothing to stop them. He just stopped talking to them and turned to his disciples. He knew they were displeased also. He might have said, "I sincerely hope, brethren, that you are not too seriously disturbed to stay by me!" I am sure I would have said that. Jesus seemed to know that if he besought them to stay it would only be bidding for an argument. They would begin, then, to explain to him how serious a blunder he had made. He never appeared on the defensive—never! In this case he turned to his disciples and said, "Well; are you going?" This puts them on the defensive at once. No!—they are not going! Indeed, before they were through protesting that they wouldn't leave him they had become more thoroughly committed to him than ever before. But one can easily imagine him losing them had he done any supplicating for their favor.

Line all this up alongside organized Christianity's present process of dealing with its own interested constituency in moments when to face the truth is a bit trying! Perhaps some words really ought to be said on the general subject of social justice: maybe somebody in the audience is going to get a wallop that will feel like the pointed end of a tornado: maybe somebody can't stand the bombardment and leaves. His uncle and his aunt, his wife and her father, his mother and his brother, and his brother's wife—all leave. And the board of deacons—shall it be besought to stay by the works; and please! oh please! Bad psychology that—according to the Galilean estimate. The Galilean psychology says, "Hew to the line! Tell the truth! The public likes it! Everybody likes it! Momentarily annoyed by it, of course: how could it be otherwise? But—they like it! And; mind!—no whimpering! no supplicating! no beseeching! no truckling!"

GALILEAN RECRUITING

Here is where we have missed it all alone the line. The reason so many churches are forever up to their ears in some kind of a brawl is because of the abominably bad psychology practiced by their leadership. How comes it that the Catholics contrive to get along without rackets? Because they have the good sense to adhere to the Galilean psychology in their dealings with the public: because their leadership understands that it must respect itself to the point of never appearing on the defensive!

Not simply for the purpose of being disagreeable, but in a spirit of fraternal candor, may one inquire exactly how you go about it to win men into an alliance with Christianity, if you happen to be in a position exacting such service of you? You needn't humiliate yourself to reply: I can tell you how you do it. You go to the house and call, explaining how nice it would be if she and John would make up their minds to join the church, where so many of their best friends are; where they will feel so much "at home"; where they will be able to exert a stronger influence over other people so that they, too, may wish to join the church (where, presumably, they, also, will associate with friends, and feel "at home"), etc., etc.

Now that is positively anti-Galilean! And the reason we have such poor success securing recruits in our churches can be easily explained on the ground that Christianity, in this case, gets out and peddles its goods, instead of assuming its right to be the benefactor rather than the beneficiary!

NO SUPPLICATING

Does anybody recall a recorded instance of Jesus begging a man to accept his gospel? How did he win Zacchæus? By going around some afternoon to talk him into it? Did he go to Nicodemus ben Gorion's office on some fictitious errand to attempt a little campaign of recruiting? I am not now insisting that it would have been the wrong thing for him to take the initiative in such matters; or for you! I am simply sitting here, with the New Testament open at my elbow, reporting that I cannot find one instance of his supplicating anybody to do anything! People come to him on their own initiative; ask him all manner of questions; he answers them with sympathetic interest; he tells them everything they wish to know—but they are always the suppliants. The rich young nobleman wants to know what he will be expected to do if he joins. (I hate to think what I would have said to him!) I can imagine this flashily-dressed youngster, with every pocket full of money, telling me in his superior manner that he might possibly be persuaded to come in if it didn't mortgage too much of his time.

THE RICH YOUNG RULER

Jesus made a suppliant of this fellow, too. Yes; I know. He lost him. That is to say, the nobleman failed to come through at that moment. But he must have done some tall thinking about it later. (Somehow I can't get it out of my head that this "young ruler" was Joseph of Arimathæa, There was only one "rich ruler" mixed up with Jesus' story. We see him on the road, a suppliant. Later we see him lending his costly sepulchre. It pleases me to believe that Joseph, unable to insure his immortality by his deeds, decided to achieve a relative immortality in stone. But he never forgot; and when his Ideal was dead Joseph was ready to vouchsafe to his Ideal the modicum of perpetuity he had sought for himself. But this is off the subject.) Jesus did not say, "Yes, yes; oh, dear me, friend, we need you almost on your own terms!" Jesus said, "Your stuff is too high for you to see over! Get rid of it! It has become a burden! Sell it; give the money to charity; and then come, follow me!"

Of course, everybody in the house rises up and says in concert, "That is hopelessly impractical. If one were to do a thing like that the man would leave!" Well, perhaps he would. Indeed, that was exactly what happened when Jesus did it. But I still think that the rich young ruler had better chances of the kingdom, as he went away sorrowfully, than he would have had if he had been accepted on his own conditions.

GALILEAN AUDACITY

Perhaps "audacity" isn't precisely the word I want here. Now that I have written it I rather disfavor its appearance. I hope it will be read to mean something other than impertinence: it doesn't mean that here. Jesus is in Pilate's court. "What is truth?" No reply.

"Are you a king?"

"Do you ask me that of your own accord or did somebody else suggest it?"

It is commonly believed that Jesus was on trial. As a matter of sober fact, he was not! He was trying Pilate; and Pilate knew it! Pilate showed, later in the day, that he was entirely aware of that fact when he was asked to alter the writing which was to be tacked above the head of the martyr.

"See!" whined the priests. "See!—a mistake! It says 'King!' You should change it to read 'He said he was king!'" Pilate let it stand. Jesus was "king."

Whenever Christianity gets ready to practice the Galilean psychology of self-respect, conscious of its high commissions, fearless, exultant in its strength, it may recover the ground it has lost "through the drugged and doubting years."

Is Europe Convalescing?

By Charles W. Gilkey

IN the most effective sermon which I heard during six months in Europe from May to October last, Miss Maude Royden, speaking from her own new pulpit in the Eccleston Guild House, London, put into one extraordinarily accurate and vivid metaphor the state of mind and heart from which the world has suffered since the war. With a woman's sure and sensitive hand she drew for us a scene which she herself had once personally witnessed: a dangerously sick child tossing in a high fever, and in its delirium calling wildly for its mother; while over its flushed face and unrecognizing eyes the mother herself bent, anxious and heartsick, but almost helpless to do the very things which the child's distorted mind most wanted and needed. Just long enough she dwelt on the pathos of the situation to make us realize its poignancy. Then, without any gesture or effort after dramatic effect, but with a quiet simplicity far more impressive and memorable than emphasis of delivery could ever be, she said, "So lies our sick world in the arms of God."

WEST OF THE RHINE

To one American traveler in western Europe last summer her illustration both revealed and stated with remarkable insight the double aspect of the sickness from which Europe has suffered acutely, and America also to a less degree, since the armistice. One does not need to go east of the Rhine, where the symptoms are of course much the most serious, to realize that Europe is very sick. A stay in London long enough to sense the ominousness of its growing unemployment, especially among ex-service men who have learned violence as well as discipline in the rough school of war, and have grown bitter amid the disillusionments and deprivations of the peace from which they were led to expect so much, a look below the surface into the social and economic precariousness of present Italian conditions, or into the accumulating difficulties of French public finance, will suffice, even without a visit to distracted central Europe or paralyzed and starving Russia, to make the observant visitor realize how serious are the ills of the entire European body politic. The bloodstream of its trade has become much more sluggish and less nutritive than even last year and threatens still further impoverishment. The nervous system of its foreign exchange has suffered a succession of violent shocks which have unbalanced or deranged all its coordinations. Its political as well as its industrial habits have become so entirely dependent upon the strong stimulants of government propaganda and promises in the one case, and government subsidies in the other, that any sudden withdrawal now of these powerful but dangerous incentives that were first used to survive a crisis and then could not easily be given up when the situation continued critical, might well result in a complete collapse. From the contagion of this serious sickness in the economic and social life of Europe, America has not escaped, and cannot hope to escape.

But the sickness of Europe and of the whole world since the war has not been confined to the structure of its economic life, the processes of its body politic. Its mind and soul have been affected as well: it has been and still is in delirium. Signor Nitti, ex-prime minister of Italy, speaks in his recent book, "Italy Without Peace," of "the war mentality which still endures and overthrows all feelings of generosity and solidarity." Millions of people have been completely blinded by the passion of hate to any fair and clear view of the character and attitude of millions of other people with whom nevertheless they must get along somehow in the same region, the same continent—or at least the same small world. It is hard to say whether this blindness and distortion of hate is more prevalent among the allied nations in their attitude toward Germany, or in Germany toward the allies: the writer has personally encountered rather more of it in the two months since he returned to America, than he chanced to meet during six months in Europe.

OBSESSION OF FEAR

France is literally obsessed with the fear of what Germany may do to her when she recovers her strength; and this fear, some of the reasons for which all the world can understand and sympathize with, has become an idée fixée to such an extent that, like some other obsessions, it tends to produce the very result which it dreads. Megalomania, jealousy, and suspicion have poisoned where they have not brutalized the relationships of near neighbors and adjacent, even sometimes intermingled races. The harvest of illusions and delusions sown by war propaganda on both sides has proved to be peculiarly widespread and dangerous, springing up now as a cynical distrust of even accredited information, and again as an unwillingness to look squarely in the face hard facts like the Russian famine and German incapacity to pay a huge indemnity. After the terrific overstrain of the war, human nature everywhere has relaxed into an orgy of frivolity and social irresponsibility in which standards that were slow to build up have been quickly broken down; and instead of a religious revival in our midst there is a moral slump.

Along with these worldwide psychological perversions, there have been observed in some quarters pathological phenomena not altogether without a certain humor: some countries which it is not necessary now to name have suddenly turned their backs for a season on all their former protectors, friends and allies; and sitting with faces to the wall of an imaginary isolation, not wholly unlike ostriches with heads in the sand, have thanked God that they were not as other nations, while they loudly declared to all who might chance to hear, their economic self-sufficiency and moral irresponsibility. Fortunately, these complacent boasts were among the first post-war illusions to shatter on the hard realities of actual experience.

CAN EUROPE SURVIVE?

Can Europe survive so serious a sickness? Mr. H. G. Wells has faced his recent American readers squarely with the fact that it is a real question whether civilization can be saved from the perils that threaten to engulf it. It is significant of the difficulty which we Americans have in realizing the true state of the case, that those of us who travel abroad are often told over there that our outlook is altogether too optimistic to suit the facts; and then when we return home to report these facts as we have seen them, we are charged with being unduly pessimistic and told to cheer up. The truth is perhaps that, as in all critical cases, no one can surely foretell the outcome. It is clear, however, that a change for the better in the patient's mental and spiritual state would be an encouraging symptom which would be likely to show its effects later in a corresponding outward improvement. No matter how weak the fever and delirium may leave him, we instinctively recognize in his recovery of clear eyes and a quiet mind, hopeful signs of steady even though necessarily slow improvement and ultimate recuperation. If the child in Miss Royden's story can only come to himself sufficiently to recognize his mother, a cooperation and companionship are at once possible between them which will hasten as well as ease the long road back to health.

It is the purpose of this article to consider some such hopeful symptoms in the state of mind and heart of western Europe, as they have been observed during recent travel and residence in Italy, Switzerland, France, and Britain. The first of these is: a dawning sense of the futility of force.

FUTILITY OF FORCE

The social experience of Italy since the armistice is of great interest and significance for all students of the processes of democratic, self-government. It seems to be matter of common consent among natives and residents in Italy, that she came nearer to a social revolution and the possible establishment of a bolshevist regime, than any other of the western democracies at least. Credit for her deliverance from this fate is generally given to the Facisti, a party composed at first largely of ex-service and even younger men, who organized to oppose the communists by every possible means. In their defense of "law and order" the Facisti never hesitated to take the law into their own hands and fight fire with fire. This determined opposition gave the communists pause for the moment, and there was no revolution. But presently the quick resort of the Facisti to force produced its inevitable result. Their opponents also began to organize armed bands; the doubtful line between defense and offense soon disappeared; and before long city after city became the battleground of armed factions who fought at sight. Italy relapsed within a few weeks into a mediæval state of feudal warfare which the government, either weak or timid, seemed helpless to prevent.

During my own Italian visit it was reported in a certain town that an armed party of Facisti was about to invade it in automobiles. The communists gathered on the walls to defend themselves. A single car approached, containing a British lady and her two sons, touring Italy together, entirely ignorant of this situation. A volley from the walls at the supposed invaders, and one son was killed, the other seriously wounded. Events like this began to give sober Italian opinion pause, as it realized the dangers inevitable in the use of force by private persons or parties for whatever ends. Thoughtful men saw that the Facisti were becoming a peril rather than a bulwark to their country. The leader of the party presently resigned on the ground that the movement had lost its ideal and fallen into the hands of violent men. Its future is now more than doubtful, if not indeed dangerous. Some of us who watched this development at close range began to read the news from home about private warfare in West Virginia, and the too frequent attempts of Legion posts to maintain "law and order" by illegal means, with a new foreboding. The realization is slowly spreading in the world that force is a dangerously two-edged weapon which is never safe except in the hands of a resolutely impartial government.

SETTLEMENT BY CONSENT

And even there it may be worse than futile. We who saw British public opinion do belated penance for the Amritsar massacre as it realized its disastrous consequences in the tense Indian situation, and turn slowly but resolutely against the government's Irish policy with its "black and tans" and reprisals, until it was overturned and gave place to a settlement by consent, find here real encouragement for the future. If the Irish problem, aggravated through 700 years of racial misunderstanding, religious bigotry, and futile oppression, until it became one of the great open sores of the world, can now at last begin to heal through mutual conference and consent, then sanity is returning to human counsels, and even the tangled relationships of central Europe are not utterly hopeless.

Granted at once that such sanity has thus far shown itself only here and there and for brief moments. When one wanders through the palace of Versailles in 1921, and senses its dominating atmosphere of military splendor and supremacy, its cherished memories of one does not wonder that a treaty which took shape amid such scenes and secrecies should rest squarely upon the supremacy of force. "France's state of mind," as Nitti mildly puts it, and as all the world has seen again at the Washington conference, "is a cause of real preoccupation." But "the conviction appears to be growing that the treaties are incapable of being enforced not only because they paralyze every activity on the part of the vanquished, but are a menace for the victors, in that, the economic unity of continental Europe once broken, depression must result." And when the inevitable revision comes, the hope of the world will depend upon the sanity which recognizes the limits of force and the possibilities of consent.

"Old, unhappy, far-off things, and battles long ago"—

READINESS TO FACE FACTS

"The truth penetrates slowly. The clouds are now too thick, but they will shortly clear away. The crisis now overwhelming Europe has sounded the alarm even to the most excited minds. Europe is still in the phase of doubt; but after the cries of hate and fury, doubt is a great progress. After the doubt the truth will come." The real significance of the Rathenau-Loucheur agreement providing for the payment of reparations in kind by Germany to France, lies in its tacit recognition of the realities of the reparations situation. That recognition began to be explicit in British public opinion as well as official policy some time ago, and in this fact lay the occasion of no small part of recent Anglo-French tension. The British realized first that the politicians' promises of 1918 to "hang the Kaiser" and "make the Germans pay to the last farthing" can never be redeemed in the present state of Europe. Gold to pay with is simply not there; payment in other forms of money raises havoc with the exchanges and consequently with foreign trade; and payment in kind inevitably means business depression at home. So too Britain discovered that her Russian policy was costing too much in taxes, more in foreign trade, and most of all perhaps in Russian lives. France, with more at stake perhaps in both regards, has been more reluctant to admit the hard facts, and in the face of them, is uncertain what to do. But sooner or later the inexorable pressure of events will force the abandonment of dreams for realities; and then (if only it be not too late) both policies and prospects will turn markedly for the better.

THE DEEPER SOLIDARITY

Miss Jane Addams has told on both sides the Atlantic the moving story of the Belgian woman carried over into Germany during the war and forced to labor there, who when she returned to Belgium after the armistice took up a collection and carried it back herself to feed the hungry German children in whom she had become personally interested. Those who know what Italy in spite of her own poverty has done for Austrian children, and Switzerland for many of her neighbors, and now Germany herself for the Russian famine, will recognize that under all the passions and divisions of war new ties of human kindness have actually been established. In the presence of great common necessities, lesser differences tend to fade into the background. A man who knew Europe well said in London last summer that the real peace-makers had not been diplomats and conferences at all (too often quite the contrary), but such enterprises of good will and mercy as the Friends' Relief and the Student Friendship Fund; and Mr. Hoover himself showed himself a statesman as well as a Christian when he said that he would rather plant the American flag in the hearts of hungry children than in any citadel of Europe.

For as Lord Haldane has pointed out, the discovery that Britain cannot prosper while Germany suffers, has been one of the most expensive lessons in applied Christianity in all human history. Christian charity quickly recognizes what common sense discovers more slowly, and business experience finally confirms; "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." Theodore Roosevelt's saying that this country would not be a good place for any of us to live in unless it is a good place for all of us to live in, applies hardly less to our modern world. And in the spreading recognition of this fact even in America (closely related as it is to what Mr. Asquith has called the one great lesson of the war—that no nation liveth to itself alone) lies one sign of hope and promise for the future.

THE NATIONAL CONSCIENCE

It is a moving experience for a visitor to Great Britain to watch through several months the strong moral sense of the British people facing up to and sitting in judgment upon its own policy during and since the war. Discussing with a well-known Scotchman the question of responsibility for the war itself, I had remarked that it seemed more and more to me not a question of black and white, but of darker and lighter gray. To my surprise he answered, "I do not believe you can find an intelligent Britisher who will disagree with that statement." A little later, I heard Dean Inge of St. Paul's say from a London platform that he was ready to leave to history the precise apportionment of the blame for the outbreak of the war; but that he was also ready to do penance now for his own country's share of the blame. "We used to think," he went on, "that the war was caused by an abstract demon whom we called Germany, and the Germans called Russia or France. Now we are beginning to realize that we were all stark mad together."

In that reawakened moral sense, coupled as it always is in Britain with a keen and up-to-date intelligence about political and international questions, lies the best hope of the world today. In pulpit and platform and press all over Britain I found the government's Irish policy denounced with a fearless courage which I am not at all sure we Americans could match in similar case: and presently under that increasing pressure the Irish policy was reversed, and now peace is in sight after 700 years of war. That same public opinion began then to demand justice for Germany in Silesia, and a restraint upon France's more militant moods. It has long been well nigh unanimous and decidedly emphatic in its moral verdict on the Versailles treaty: "No just person any longer doubts the profound injustice of the treaty of Versailles and all the treaties derived from it." I had to return to America to hear a good word for the treaty and the peace.

FRANCE'S PRESENT ISOLATION

It was this partly moralized public opinion of the civilized world that found increasingly explicit expression at the Geneva assembly of the league of nations, and is still more obviously the driving force behind the Washington conference. A nAmerican professor who was at Geneva throughout the assembly, spoke of its sessions as a platform on which the white light of the world's opinion was focussed; and there, as now again so plainly at Washington, it is France that, in Nitti's phrase, "has never been so spiritually isolated as since the peace of Paris."

Why is it that the national conscience seems so much more sensitive and strong to the visitor in Britain than in France? Is the anæsthetic of the war's intense patriotism, or the shell-shock of its imminent terror, still too potent? Is the French press too largely spoon-fed by the foreign office, or have the French people too largely left their foreign policy to professional politicians and traditional diplomats of the old school. Or is it that France seems so largely to lack the organized agencies for moral and religious discussion and expression which England has in her churches and her "non-conformist conscience"? The casual visitor cannot explain, but only remark, the obvious contrast: but he comes home more convinced than ever of the responsibility of the church for the edging and tempering of the national conscience; and more eager than ever that the public opinion of America, no less intelligent and no less moralized, may take its place as one of the two most hopeful and powerful forces in shaping the future of the world.

In the light of Miss Royden's moving parable of the world's present spiritual state, it is surely significant to find all over Europe signs of the quickening of religious life. From Germany and Russia come reports of the vitalizing of religion that had before been conventional or institutional. In Italy, writers like Pappini and Borsi, both recent converts to Christian faith, are recalling men to the secret places of the soul's communion with God. In Switzerland, a group of young pastors and theologians who, like Dr. Orchard of London, have passed through and beyond the liberalism of the new theology, are making new discoveries in the Christian experience of God and the treasures of the promised kingdom of heaven. And in Britain, where the four best sermons that I heard all dealt with this same fundamental theme, the outstanding fact of contemporary religious life seemed to me to be the intimate fusion of a sensitive and truly prophetic social conscience, with a fresh and deepened consciousness of the living God. "It is one and the same spiritual experience," said A. H. Gray in a truly prophetic sermon, "that has convinced me anew of the reality of God, and has turned me into an ardent social revolutionary." There are men in many lands who know whereof he spoke. And so long as that is true, our generation will not altogether look up into emptiness, and ahead into despair.

The Liberal Movement In Japan*

By D. Tagawa

SINCE arriving in America I have been frequently asked about the Liberal Movement in Japan. That there is a large development of liberal thought in my country seems to be the common opinion among Americans. This is far from the truth. The number of liberals is few, their power is small, and the movement has not advanced to the stage where we can believe it has changed the policies of the nation. Liberalism is as yet only a germ or reed. Whether the reed grows to a big tree depends upon the future. That you may know, however, of the reality of this liberal germ in Japan I will mention a few evidences:

1. The visit of the crown prince to Europe. During the more than 2,000 years of Japanese history this is the first time a crown prince ever set foot on foreign soil. The full meaning of his voyage half way around the world it is still too soon to estimate. At present the attitude of the imperial family to the people and the attitude of the people to the imperial family is in the midst of a change. If our prince had only visited America the results would have been even greater.

2. Progressive advisers. The regency of the crown prince, by which he assumes the duties of the emperor, has been accompanied by a change in the imperial adviser, from an extreme conservative to a Christian liberal. Furthermore one of the persons closest to the crown is a Christian naval officer. These two Christian progressives occupying positions so close to our young regent is a sign of real hope.

3. Universal manhood suffrage. The movement for universal suffrage is another sign which is full of meaning. We have hopes that the extension may be put into effect within a few years. The very fact, however, of this desire for the vote is a sign of the growth of liberalism in the empire.

4. The Disarmament Association. This organization was formed in September a few weeks before I left Japan. The movement started last spring, but the association has resulted from the unsuccessful presentation of a disarmament bill in the last parliament. Because of the loss of the bill one liberal leader, Mr. Ozaki, appealed to the people, lectured to audiences of more than 100,000 and asked their vote on the question. Of his hearers, 93 per cent favored substantial reductions, 5 per cent opposed, and only 2 per cent were neutral. This public activity of Mr. Ozaki gave a great impulse to the liberals, and resulted in the formation of a permanent association. This society has for its purpose (1) the reduction of the army and navy, (2) the removal of all causes which may disturb the peace of the far east, (3) the overthrow of militarism, and (4) the promotion of industrial, economic and political democracy in Japan.

5. Strikes. The occurrence of many and frequent strikes is another sign. These are not as large or as frequent as in Europe and America, but during the past year their number was over 500. For Japanese laborers trained to obedience, as our people are, to rebel so frequently against their employers is a new thing in our country. The workers are waking up to their rights as individuals.

6. University professors. Even prominent educators have joined the association for reduction of armaments and have expressed sympathy with the strikers. For university professors to attend meetings of strikers and join their voices on the platform with labor leaders is another new thing in Japan. Especially for those occupying chairs in the imperial university to take part in such activities is certainly a sign of the new liberalism.

7. Imprisonment of liberals. Four years ago I was imprisoned for attacking the action of the elder statesmen. Their selfishness and unconstitutional despotic attitude were the objects of my opposition. Since then not a few university professors have suffered imprisonment for similar liberal activities. One of them was dismissed from his professorship and imprisoned for translating a Russian book. Another received similar punishment for possessing and lending a book on bolshevism. Still another for a magazine article entitled "From Suppression to Emancipation," received a prison sentence. Another is now on trial for a published essay on the question whether the claim of an unbroken imperial line is true, and even if true whether the fact is of any pride in the face of the powers of the world. Many other court trials of the same nature have occurred. These reveal both the conservatism of the present government and the stirring among the people of liberal ideas.

8. The government policies of the liberals. (1) We desire home rule for Korea. A few favor independence for that land. (2) We desire to return to China Shantung without condition, to withdraw our soldiers, and to remove the hindrances to good feeling with that new republic. (3) We emphasize the historical friendship with America and wish to obviate all that hampers good will between the two countries. (4) We desire to withdraw the Japanese soldiers from Siberia. (5) We stand for universal manhood suffrage. (6) We believe in reduction of armaments both on land and sea. (7) We propose opening of all cabinet posts to civilians.

The above is the general movement of liberalism in Japan today. While, however, there are many evidences of a rising movement, it is very hard to know just how real and strong it is. It is my belief, true liberalism is a product of Christianity and rests on Christian foundations. It depends on vital Christian faith for its own vitality. But the Christian movement in Japan is still very young and very crude and very weak. We number scarcely more than 200,000 all told. Even so-called Christians, multitudes of them, neither understand it nor really practice it. Not until millions of Japanese have been transformed by a vital Christianity shall we have, in my opinion, a really strong and a vital liberal movement. If we are to make a free Japan we must make a Christian Japan. But the average Japanese is a hater of Christianity. How to lead the people to Christ is our pressing problem.

Two great hindrances are holding up the Christian movement:

1. Japanese visitors return to our country and report that there is little Christianity in this broad land. Their observation is, I know, erroneous. But is there not a reason for their mistake? Has not Christianity failed thus far to make its force appear as a dominant power in your national, municipal, social and industrial life? When our Japanese non-Christian visitors walk down your streets, sit in the lobbies of your hotels or read of your bloody strikes and municipal corruption, how can they know that religion is the moving power in the nation? I long to see Christianity so vital in American life that even a casual visitor shall feel its reality.

2. Missionaries who come to Japan should make a deeper study of our old religions, of the national history and ideals and of the social system. Regarding the good in old Japan both missionaries and Japanese Christian leaders have been negligent. If one is ignorant of the very essence of the people's inner life how can one expect to evangelize a country? This ignorance of old Japanese foundations has been one cause of slow Christian progress. The speeding up and the social functioning of Christianity by religious workers in Japan will both contribute to the evangelization of our empire. Not until millions of Japanese have been transferred by a vital Christianity shall we have, in my opinion, a really strong and vital liberal movement.

For the development also of right relations with China there is need of establishing in both countries solid liberalism based on Christian foundations. To save these two nations they must be Christianized.

As a Christian speaking to Christians, let me urge you to join with our little band in Japan in winning increasing numbers of our brothers to Jesus Christ. Only as we make his personality and his principles operative in individual, national and international life shall we see true democracy established in the orient.

The New Year

A FLOWER unblown; a book unread;
A tree with fruit unharvested;
A path untrod; a house whose rooms
Lack yet the heart's divine perfumes;
A landscape whose wide border lies
In silent shade, 'neath silent skies;
A wondrous fountain yet unsealed;
A casket with its gifts concealed—
This is the year that for you waits
Beyond Tomorrow's mystic gates.

Oh, may this flower unfold to you
Visions of beauty sweet and new;
This book on golden pages trace
Your sacred joys and deeds of grace.
May all the fruit of this strange tree
Luscious and rosy tinted be;
This path through fields of knowledge go;
This house with love's content o'erflow;
This landscape glitter with the dew
Of blessed hopes and friendships true,
This fountain's living crystal cheer,
As fail the springs that once were dear,
This casket with such gems be strewed
As shine in lives that love the Lord.

Why Advocate Labor's Cause

BUSINESS men frequently write to me asking why there is so apparent a bias toward labor in these articles. They usually delineate the wrongs done in some local strike and ascribe violence to the unions. They enlarge much on Brindelism, such incidents as the Chicago bomb squad and the frequent overt demands of labor. These letters usually say a good deal between the lines and a little inquiry generally reveals the fact that the writers know much more about capital's side of the case than they do about labor's.

It is difficult for one to disentangle his judgment from his personal affairs. Thus bias unconsciously runs through opinions that the bearer fondly thinks fair. If a man reads only his trade journals and the daily press, and suffers a good many petty annoyances from labor friction he will find it difficult to see labor's side. He will protest that labor is radical when it is doing exactly what he is doing in giving partisan advocacy to its cause.

Capital is on top. Lincoln once said "it is billions of money against millions of men"; and money is power. Because money is power is the reason men so desire it. It has always taken advantage of the weak and ignorant except where it was in the hands of men of rare humanitarian principles. That means that wealth tends to use its power for its own ends, for most men live by the conventions instead of by those ethical principles which are illustrated in exceptional cases where men have acted in an original manner.

The public that stands on the side lines will sympathize with labor if its cause is incontrovertibly just, provided it is made to understand the issue, but it will desert it when the controversy begets great inconvenience for itself and a big campaign against labor's cause is put on through the newspapers. And when newspapers are themselves big business concerns and live by advertising, the inherent probability is that they will put on the campaigns.

Labor's Shortcomings

We make no apologies for labor's shortcomings. They are many and deplorable. They often make labor its own worst enemy. On last Armistice Day in a certain English city a procession of the unemployed refused either to observe the two minutes' silence at high noon or to leave others unmolested to observe it. That single act provided anti-labor advocates with an illustration that obscures all labor's virtues and created in the mind of the non-partisan public an enduring prejudice against the decency and good judgment of the labor movement. Unemployment is a bitter wrong against men who are willing to work, and when those men have battled for their country and civilization and belong perhaps to an uneducated stratum of society it is not strange that such unreasoned and radical action will be taken occasionally.

There are always men of shallow minds, uneducated men who earn only by the sweat of their brows, city bums and hangers-on who make labor's cause their own only when there is trouble on. It is from this class that most of the regrettable actions spring. Rarely is it true that violence is practiced by unions as such, or directed by leaders of labor. They know all too well what prejudice it creates against their cause. Of course the rough-neck will sometimes get a position of petty leadership in the local union. The difference between him and the employer or manager who hires gunmen and thugs is that he is low-browed and shallow-minded and acts on animal impulse, while the other fellow is usually an intelligent tyrant who loftily despises labor and deliberately arranges for the violent suppression of men who oppose him.

The human equation is about the same on both sides of the battleline. There are selfish and partisan men on both sides. Each camp has its radicals. On one side they turn "red" or communist, and on the other they oppose all labor organization and defend the twelve-hour day and the seven-day week.

Labor is at a disadvantage in the struggle of selfish men because it is under the handicap of the greater ignorance, must carry the handicap of those "born-short," the shiftless, the ambitionless and the age-long prejudices against the less successful classes.

The Age Long Ascent of Labor

The history of civilization could be written as the story of labor's progress. At the beginning of our Christian era labor was largely in slavery. In Rome there were 60,000,000 slaves—white men largely whose only misfortune was that they were hand workers. When a senator proposed that all slaves should wear a coarse garment of one color, the proposal was immediately hushed up with the warning that should the slaves of the city of Rome thus be made aware of their numbers they would burn and sack the city before nightfall. In Attica and Athens, seats of culture, only one man in four was a freeman. And the slave had no legal rights to home, religion or country. Even in these days the Roman coloni found it more advantageous to bind their slaves to the land and leave them responsible, on a share system, to provide for themselves while also providing wealth, power and luxury for their masters. Thus serfdom grew up. The man and the land alike were owned but with less personal responsibility by the master for the man's daily upkeep. Gradually a body of law for the protection of the man grew up and he gained a semi-legal status, but without citizenship. Then came industry and the parting of the man from the land. This with the desire of the employer to be free to "hire and fire" without having the responsibility of caring for laborers in times when they were not needed gave them the status of servants. But this brought no citizenship and there were more laws by far providing for the control of the master than for the freedom of the servant.

In the French Revolution the term "employee" came along with that of "citizen" and the terms "servant" and "subject" were banished from legal nomenclature. America adopted that nomenclature, but the old terms stuck for a century in England though both are now bereft of their one-time legal bondage. Even yet English law puts the ban upon labor's right to organize, and within the memory of living men wage-earners were imprisoned for attempting to organize their fellows for collective bargaining. They were allowed to bury one another in death and provide for one another in sickness—and that is all radical labor opponents in America would allow them to do today could they have their way.

It would be absurd to say our present wage-system is final. Nothing is ever final this side the fiat of Almighty God, and it is quite as presumptuous for employer princes to assume that the present system is final and infallible as it is for kaisers to presume upon the divine right of kings.

Labor's Just Cause

Labor has not yet reached the level of other social classes and until it does he who charts his course by the sermon on the mount and seeks to promote democracy and social progress must advocate labor's fundamental cause. Thus we can at once dismiss the personal equation and retire from major consideration the passing wrongs done in the midst of conflict. There is never conflict without wrong-doing, and both sides are likely to be guilty. In the labor conflict the wrongs done by labor are usually of that violent variety upon which culture and law both frown, while on capital's side the wrongs are those cunningly devised in the lack of law or under the protection of law as manipulated by highly paid lawyers.

Through organization labor has won practically all the gains registered to its good. Hours have been reduced from fourteen and even sixteen to eight and ten. Wages have been steadily raised and comforts thus brought to the home. Children have been released from grinding toil and working women safeguarded as the mothers of the race. Machinery has been covered with safety devices and accidents decreased. The wage-earner has been lifted from dependency to free right, and the ballot has been given him as a real member of society, instead of being denied him because he was not a possessor of property. His children now have the privileges of education. He is a free man.

An Incomplete Story

There is no more tragical picture in modern history than that told of labor in the rise of machine industry. Against that pathetic picture of misery and sordid inhumanity the story of industrial reform stands out as a heartening thing. But the story is not yet completed, nor will it be until the great, toiling laboring class come fully into all the rights and privileges of the more favored classes. The child of the wage earner has exactly the same inherent right to education and a chance in life as has the child of the wage payer. The workingman's family has just as good a right to a steady income with hours of leisure as have the families of his employers. The wage earning class must be given security of life and limb and income to a degree equal to any other's class. Labor has the same rights to organize and work collectively as have investors and managers, and it will use its rights quite as much for the public advantage once it is guaranteed. The wrongs labor does are not an abuse of the privileges it possesses; they are wrongs that arise in the quest of those privileges which are wrongfully denied them.

There is a vast inequality in the distribution of wealth. Money draws a disproportionate share of the common profits. Labor troubles will abide with us until there is a more equitable division of the common product, a more adequate distribution of leisure and a better division of management. We cannot maintain religious, social and political democracy and deny industrial democracy. Nor can we continue to educate our masters, the masses, and deny them rights and powers we possess ourselves. The only way to defeat labor's cause is to stop the public schools. That New York city councilman was right, from his viewpoint, when he said all the trouble began in the mistake we made by giving the public an education.

London, December 20, 1921.

THERE is not much table talk this week; we are far too busy in the Christmas procession with parcels in our hands and mysteries in our hearts to talk. Once more the miracle of Christmas is repeated. The children of men are being swept almost without knowing it into the place called Bethlehem with its strange revelations of the heart of all things. The poets have been busy, as they should be at such a time; but I have seen nothing more beautiful than Mrs. Katherin Tynan Hinkson's lines, "She Asks for New Earth." They are in that fine quarterly, The Country Heart. Three verses will show the meaning of the poem. The desire which it sets forth must have come to us when we read about Paradise and its earthly joys.

Set thou a mist upon thy glorious sun;
Lest we should faint for night and be undone;
Give us the high clean wind and the wild rain,
Lest that we faint with thirst and go in pain.

Let there be Winter there, and joy of Spring,
Summer and Autumn and the harvesting;
Give us all things we loved on earth of old,
Never to slip from out our clinging hold.

Give me a little house for my desire,
The man and the children to sit beside my fire,
And friends crowding in to our lit hearth,
For Thy new Heaven, Lord, give me new earth!

When the door is shut at Christmastide and the warmth and joy of home are with us, we have some thoughts like these, and we need not fear that we are cherishing thoughts unworthy of our faith. We are not loyal to heaven, until we are loyal to earth; we cannot be loyal to God, unless we are loyal to man.

A Great Preacher and His Son

The same week which has seen the publication of the life of Dr. John Hunter has brought also the news of the appointment of his son, the Rev. Leslie Hunter, to be Canon of Newcastle. Canon Hunter has written the life of his father with great distinction and power and it is a life worthy of a place among those which moved the hearts and shaped the thoughts of men in England and Scotland. John Hunter, in his youth, succeeded

James Parsons of York, one of the giants among our Congregational divines. Hunter was young, daring, eloquent, with a passion for preaching; he matured early and probably changed as little as any preacher of his time. He lived and died a liberal Christian. In York, Hull, Glasgow, and for a short time in London, he exercised his ministry. No man of his time was more in demand for special services. He must have preached at the opening of more churches than any other preacher.

As a boy in Lancashire I was ready to go miles to hear John Hunter. There was something in his passionate eloquence, unlike anything else I had heard; the spirit of freedom which he breathed commended him to the soul of a boy. Towards the end he lived in Hampstead, where I sometimes met him and had a chat. He was always kindly toward me, and I can still remember his round and ruddy face in the congregation at Lyndhurst Road. He was not one of those great preachers who only attend church when they themselves are preaching. The men of his time, his friends and associates, are nearly all passed over; they were brave men and loyal to the truth at all costs. In the present age, though we can no longer look at the faith and the needs of the hour from their angle, we owe to them a debt for the freedom which they vindicated.

The Church and Washington

A public meeting was held last week prompted by the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship Through the Churches. Many strong words were spoken in support of the resolution moved by Viscountess Gladstone; the significant words in the resolution were these: "It believes, however, that the conference will not achieve its object nor can real peace be attained unless there be created in the hearts of men a spirit of peace, and it therefore appeals to the Christian churches to foster by every means in their power sentiments of international friendship, tolerance and goodwill."

It was left to Dr. Orchard to say, as he commonly does say, the most relevant words: "Today war rested only upon the endeavor to give it a Christian sanction. We must withdraw that sanction. The church of Christ must face the issue. And only the church could face it, because it alone believed that the Person who showed us the way of the cross was the Person who was on the throne of the universe. They would not get rid of war till they had ceased to be afraid of it. The world's present plan of 'safety first' would lead to Armageddon." There is a certain feeling abroad here that the church is doing more in America to give a backing to peace than it is doing here. It may be we are more tired than you are; but there are signs that the churches are awakening.

Dr. Peake on the Historical Christ

Much criticism has been directed against Dr. Peake by those who are waging war against "modernism." Dr. Peake is one of our greatest scholars. For a time he taught at Mansfield College, Oxford, but most of his life as a preacher and teacher has been given to the Primitive Methodists. He has had a remarkable influence upon their ministry. He belongs to the school of modern scholars who exercise a large freedom in their criticism of the Bible, but withal he is an earnest evangelist and a great believer, and in spite of the attacks upon him, he enjoys the entire confidence of the free churches. This is a preface to the fact that he has been lecturing in Manchester upon "Jesus Christ Our Lord." In the course of his lecture he used these words, which should reveal where he stands; they are words worth recording for their own sake:

"For good or for evil, we must stand beside the historical facts. Christianity would be something it never had been in history if we were to regard these facts as irrelevant to the value of the religion. It was not, of course, all facts that were recorded about Jesus that were vital to them; but there were crucial facts which could not be surrendered without making a grievous and, indeed, fatal wound in the whole structure of Christian truth. It makes all the difference, when thinking of principles or character, if we can say, "This was a personality who really lived, whose life and character attested the truth of his message, and whose teaching had behind it all the weight of his personal authority." The truest and most vivid thoughts of God, Dr. Peake went on to say, came to Christians as they familiarized themselves, not with the teaching merely, but even more with the personality and character and actions of Jesus. The ultimate question was, "Is he God's word to man, or man's word to God?" Christian faith answered that question with the assured conviction that Jesus ultimately belonged to the side of God and not to the side of man."

Brevities

As I write, Ireland has still to decide whether it will ratify the treaty. We hope that our dreams of last week will not be frustrated. . . . Mr. Basil Mathews has been lecturing in Belfast on The Goal of a New World Order. I have not had a chance of talking over with him his Irish experiences, but it is clear, from the reports, that he made a deep impression; indeed the original place of meeting had to be changed and a hall three times as large engaged. "Outward Bound," the monthly magazine which Mr. Mathews edits, has weathered its first year, a feat as difficult as that which the "Olympic" achieved on the Atlantic; it will now go ahead on its great voyage. . . . No reputation has gained more in recent days than that of Lord Birkenhead, the Lord Chancellor. We rub our eyes when we remember our F. E. Smith of other days; none the less his splendid courage has been a great asset in these days. . . . The Rev. W. R. Mathews, Dean of King's College, has been speaking wise words: "In the church itself the two attributes of power and a sound mind are tending to fall apart. Extreme liberal theologians seem to reduce Christianity to a system of morals; while, on the other hand, much popular religion which has power over the multitude is little better than a return to magic and unreason. We need to keep before ourselves the New Testament synthesis—power and a sound mind." . . . There comes from Scotland news of revivals in the fishing villages. It seems as if in such a time we have need of power and a sound mind. A sound mind will be needed no less by the ecclesiastical leaders who have begun to discuss from the beginning the problem of religious instruction in schools. In fact it will be needed always and by everyone in this critical year.

The Cure for Discouragement*

WE DO not marvel that Elijah was discouraged; it was a natural reaction. He had just performed a difficult and bold deed at Carmel, he had raced ahead of Ahab's chariot for miles, he reached a peak of emotional victory—and then Jezebel! He could face Ahab, but this power behind the throne, this female devil, this most willful and deadly queen, he could not face her. He ran away. It looked to him as if his God was not powerful enough to overcome Jezebel. How he ran—clear to the south country and then on and on in his mad flight, his desperate panic, far into the desert. He forgot to eat. He prayed to die. He hid in a cave. What a contrast to the prophet at Carmel! We seem to be a strange mixture of bravery and cowardice, of good and evil, of trust and distrust. But the giants have been the same. They say that after every victory Napoleon suffered a reaction that expressed itself in the deepest and most abject melancholy. We are accustomed to think of John Knox as a granite mountain, as stout and brave as one of those solid hills near Edinburgh, and yet he became discouraged and cried out, "I cannot win Scotland, let me die." Good Phillips Brooks, so big, so indomitable, once became so depressed over his noble work at Trinity that he ran to the dock to catch a Cunarder for the old world. Had it not left before he reached the pier, he declares that he would have run away. Elijah was human, very human. There were hours in his life when he could carry his nation on his back, then there came an hour under the juniper when he prayed to die. John Knox could ding the pulpit and defy the sobbing queen in one hour; he could suffer the feeling of crushing defeat at another.

There is a cure that Elijah found and that we may have—a new hold on God. We are told that the personal God is coming back in philosophy—this must be a huge relief to some distressed souls. Oriel College, Oxford, has just established a new chair, that of "Philosophy of the Christian Religion," and C. J. Webb has been called to this chair. His new book, which gives us his point of view, bears the title: "Divine Personality and Human Life." He gives us a personal God again. After various Absolutes, cosmic elan vitals, and man-made deities, Webb gives us a personal God again. Hocking of Harvard holds to the personal God. We like to think that in Oxford and in Harvard a real, live, personal God who thinks, wills, loves, acts, is once more enthroned. Thus what one generation lays on the shelf, the next finds essential. It may be then that the coming generation will lay God on the shelf for a few years while various vague words seek to account for realities. During the rest of our short lives, however, we can enjoy the companionship of a genuine, personal God and that with the philosopher's consent. This is fine. But some of us had never abandoned the rich and full conception of a personal God. It is when we touch God that our strength returns. You remember the rather attractive Grecian legend of the fighter who always regained his full strength when his heel touched the earth? Thus we regain power when we touch God.

Elijah made a retreat. In his cave he began to meditate. He got his bearings. A mighty storm rolled over the mountains but God was not in the storm; the lightnings flashed, but his God was not there; the winds howled but God's voice was not in the wind. Then the storm passed and as the quaint Hebrew puts it there was the sound of gentle stillness. There were golden clouds, dews as of diamonds, cooling breezes, thrilling bird notes and—God in his heart. The lonely Elijah gripped God again.

But it was too late, a man cannot undo his mistakes. His flight had ruined his career. The prophet's robe must no longer hang from his unworthy shoulders. He should have known God better, he should have stood up to the test with greater bravery. No mere woman, not even a wild queen should have been able to frighten the Lord's anointed. It is pathetic to think how Elijah shattered his life by that panic, by that lack of trust—yet that is the story of human life. He is compelled to go and place the robe upon the shoulders of a braver and worthier man. Yet he is not forsaken. God has not forgotten his life of sacrifice and service. His work is done, but there is rest in heaven. It is a story of human interest. We see ourselves in this ancient servant of God. We win a great reform, we bow before some mere man, we find God again, we stand up and go on, we are humbler, more dependent. God grant we may not ruin our careers.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Cathedral at Rheims

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: With the general drift of Dr. Alva W. Taylor's article on Propaganda Poison, in your number for December 22, I think nearly everybody, certainly nearly every Christian, would be in accord. But I fear that my judgment would not go with him with regard to the Rheims Cathedral. In the first place, are there not some slight errors of fact in his statement? He speaks as though the Big Berthas were used against Rheims. But were they not directed against Paris only? He says, "Much damage was done the cathedral and many a gorgon head is missing from the towers." It seems to me that is misleading. As a matter of fact the whole structure at the choir end (the part toward the German lines) was perforated with countless artillery shots, and that portion made so dangerous that walking under it is not permitted. And as for "gorgon heads," the whole exterior walls of the cathedral were once covered with innumerable statues of the most interesting and often exquisite character, and every one of them was battered to pieces, except on the front of the cathedral, which was the side away from the German lines.

He speaks of the ruin of the residences and other structures of the city, and of a "great fort of concrete, reinforced by steel, that is ground to powder," while the cathedral's towers still stand, the inference being that there was an intention to spare the cathedral. In my opinion that supposition is impossible. The fort he speaks of was that known as de la Pompelle. It was at the end of the French lines, two miles outside the city, was on the edge of both French and German entrenchments, and was fiercely fought for, naturally, so that it changed hands repeatedly during the war. There was every reason why it should be battered to pieces. But Rheims was an unfortified city and the residences, etc., were destroyed in order to make the place uninhabitable and to break down the morale of the citizens. The cathedral played no part in the matter, and when the Germans excused their attack upon it, on the ground that its towers were being used as observation posts, the archbishop denied that that had ever been the case and gave his word that the towers should not be used so, and he was the personal custodian of the structure. What was the sense of the Germans putting up a defence if they had committed no offense? In fact, not a day went by that shells did not alight upon the cathedral, and an elderly man, who remained in Rheims throughout the siege, and who conducted a party, including myself, through the lower part of the nave, the only safe part of the structure, said that at midnight every night the Germans exhibited their idea of a joke by marking the hour with twelve shells fired into the roof of the choir. It is true that the Germans did not completely destroy the walls and towers. They could have done worse than they did. But the general proposition that they tried to spare the cathedral hasn't a leg to stand on.

And when Dr. Taylor says, "It seems to the writer a much more heinous thing to destroy the homes of 130,000 people than to ruin the towers of any church," I confess that his sense of human values in material things is a thousand miles away from mine. Homes can be rebuilt; the Rhimes cathedral never can be, though the Germans, with their chemical sense of values, agreed to build it, and more beautifully than ever! Not only did that venerable structure carry the exquisite and unreplaceable handiwork of hundreds of dead artisans who put their lives and hearts into it and left is as their sole tangible contribution to the world's resources of beauty and inspiration, but in the civil and religious life of a great people it symbolized a thousand gracious and moving things. There is no need to emphasize this, for, if Dr. Taylor doesn't see it, he doesn't, and that is all.

From all this please do not infer that I believe in a propaganda of hateful memories today, on any side. Neither do I believe in a propaganda of false impressions and inferences, in the interest of peace. That is quite too Jesuitical a method for my mind. I am inclined rather under all circumstances to follow the advice of the philosopher, Mark Twain, "when in doubt, tell the truth."

The Towner-Sterling Bill

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have recently received a copy of a bill, known as the Towner-Sterling bill, and also a pamphlet entitled "Facts About the Educational Bill," prepared in Boston, Mass., by a "National Committee for a Department of Education." I have long been familiar with the movement to create a department of education, with a secretary in the President's cabinet, and am strongly opposed to it. Will you allow me to present some of the reasons for my opposition?

For twenty-seven years I have been President of Whitman College, a non-sectarian but Christian institution of higher education. During this time I have taught the history and principles of education and have studied education broadly and minutely, both in the northwest and in the country at large. I am by birth and upbringing a Pennsylvania Republican, born in Philadelphia, and therefore I might be expected to favor the centralization of power in the hands of the government; nevertheless, I believe that the Towner-Sterling bill is inexpedient, unnecessary, and prejudicial to the best interest of education and the nation.

First: It is inexpedient. The bill proposes the annual expenditure, for an indefinite time, of one hundred million, five hundred thousand dollars. This expenditure is not for one year or for a term of years, but runs on without limitation as a permanent feature of our national life. It seems to me that, in the present juncture of immense national indebtedness and extraordinary taxation necessary for carrying our war debt and the increased cost of government, it is unwise to burden the nation with such an expenditure unless it can be proven to be absolutely necessary.

Second: The proposed expenditure is unnecessary. From the beginning of our history education has been a function first of the locality and then of the state. The advocates of the bill assume that all functions of the national life, including education, must be directed by the national government from Washington, and that a government department of education is necessary to create a proper interest in education. But education has been a primary interest of the American people from the earliest days, and has not waited for the national government to call it into being. The interest of the people has been widespread and generous to an unparalleled degree. The burden of proof must rest upon supporters of the bill.

It is true that several educational activities, chiefly of research, are carried on at present by several departments of the federal government, and that wasteful overlapping is a result. But it is not necessary to organize a department of education in order to unify these activities. Let the disposition to unify such activities appear, and the problem can be solved economically and effectively.

Third: The proposed bill is dangerous in its tendencies. (a) Local initiative has heretofore characterized education in the United States. This bill will teach the states and their normal schools to look to the national government for yearly support. It will stimulate a feeling of dependence rather than of independence and thus tend to pauperize the people of the weaker states.

(b) It places the responsibility for education development upon the wrong shoulders. Make the people of each district and of each state feel that they must manage their own affairs as best they can, and they will manage them better than if they expect continual relief from a benevolent and paternal government.

(c) The independence of the states is undermined by the proposed measure. Money in large amounts is offered to them for unnecessary objects. Their normal schools need no aid from the United States government. The problem of illiteracy should be met at its source; namely, Ellis Island and the gates which admit immigrants, rather than thus tardily. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." Moreover, the present efforts of the states to Americanize their foreign element do not require the vast scheme of aid proposed in this bill.

Arouse the states to the problems which are involved by the presence of an ignorant body of foreigners within their borders; when they realize their danger, they will find adequate means to overcome it. At present they are often unaware of the economic and moral loss which they sustain by the presence of this unassimilated element. They need enlightenment rather than government bounty. Unnecessary and lavish expenditure on the part of the general government is a danger to the republic.

The Railroads

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I am very much in sympathy with the fundamental policy of The Christian Century, to clear away the brush of superstition, ignorance and fetish traditions from our ecclesiastical so called orthodox Christian doctrines. I have for thirty years past deeply felt the need of a publication that would discuss these problems in a free, candid and courageous manner and I appreciate the efforts you are making to discover and interpret the real truth of the Christian gospel which undoubtedly will convince and unify all sincere followers of Jesus if persistently pursued. I have to confess, however, that I have felt a discordant conviction against some of your articles in which you have discussed the practical application of the truth, and I cannot help feeling that I ought to express my disapproval of the spirit of your article published November 17 on "The New Turn in the Railroad Conflict."

In the first place I have a strong interest in the faith that all practical problems should be settled by the principles expounded in the sermon on the mount, the foundation of the first one of which is "justice through fellowship," so ably interpreted in a recent article in The Christian Century by Richard Roberts.

In the second place I have worked in the employ of railroad companies for many years and have also (I suppose wickedly) invested a considerable amount of my industrial savings in railroad stocks which I certainly should not have done if I had thought they were evil institutions, unless my motive had been to use my influence in reforming them. I think, Mr. Editor, to judge lightly, that you are too much imbued with a spirit of "zeal—not according to knowledge" on the industrial question and if you would consistently apply Christian principles to the railroad problem it would lead you to discover that some of the things implied and inferred by your statements are absurd and unjust. They clearly manifest a one-sided prejudice with malicious antipathy against windmills and whatever or whoever it may be on the other side. I admit of course that our railroads do not perfectly exemplify God's law, but we must first pull the beam out of our own eye before we are competent to condemn them. Besides, my observations during the last forty years convince me that the railroad systems have proved to be one of God's most powerful instruments in developing, civilizing and Christianizing our own country and the world. As for railroad stockholders being selfish and rapacious I think they have been about the most patient, courageous, self-sacrificing and unjustly abused class of industrial factors in this country, although their enterprise has been of incalculable benefit to the public welfare. About twenty-five years ago it was commonly reported that more than half the railroad systems were bankrupt and the probabilities are that most of the stockholders lost the money they had invested in them, or have since died before they could realize any profits on their investment. The term "watered stock" is an expression which may perhaps have been applicable forty years ago to some systems organized by speculative promoters but which today under our government system of supervision and regulation is a matter of absolutely no concern to a stockholder, but in fact recent government valuation of railroads shows that most of them are undercapitalized rather than inflated. If a farmer bought land in Illinois fifty years ago at $5 per acre, the value of which has since been increased to $500 per acre by railroad service, why should not the railroad investor be entitled to 6 per cent dividend on his invested capital, which is as much as the average railroad stocks yield. There is no principle in the sermon on the mount or in the law of any civilized nation that would justify the government or the public or the labor unions or any other power in confiscating these properties without recompensing their present legal holders. The labor unions or the Christian people could very easily contribute enough money to purchase them outright, if they were not so selfishly indulgent and extravagant in living and besides unwilling to assume great responsibility. The difficulty is that so many agitators, including preachers and professed Christians, want to force those who have assumed greater responsibilities than themselves to do what they would be the last ones who would be willing to undertake or to cooperate in doing themselves. One of the cardinal principles of Christian law is the policy of pacification, its virtue is patience. Moses enunciated it in the decalogue first as a command to keep the Sabbath day holy; second, thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor. Jesus expounded it as self-sacrifice, long-suffering, forbearance, meekness. If a man compel thee to go a mile, cheerfully go with him two miles if necessary. God's truth is governing things in this world and man can cooperate with him to the best advantage by exercising patience and gentleness rather than by calling fire down from heaven to destroy his imaginary enemies.

Shakespeare in the Psalms

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I was interested in your news item in the issue of December 15th, "Methodist Tries His Hand at Cryptic Interpretation." For many years I have used this proof that Shakespear wrote the 46th Psalm to pour gentle ridicule upon certain methods of interpreting the Book of Daniel. Your readers may be interested in the form of this proof which I obtained, I think, some ten years ago from some English periodical. It is as follows:

Spell Shakespear. There are forty ways of doing this but any sensible person knows that s-h-a-k-e spells "shake," and s-p-e-a-r spells "spear." So we spell it "S-h-a-k-e-s-p-e-a-r." Count the vowels in his name. Four. Count the consonants. Six. Put these numbers together and you get 46. Turn to the 46th Psalm. Count 46 words from the beginning and you get the word "Shake." Count 46 words from the end, and you get "spear." All right, that gives the clue, "Shakespear." This proves not only that Shakespear wrote the 46th Psalm but that this is the correct way to spell his name. The only thing that might upset this proof is the word "Selah" which we skipped in making the count. But this is no part of the text. It is only a musical note. And anyway if you think I am going to allow my theory to be upset for a "selah" you don't know me.

The Church and Community Interests

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your article, "The Balance of Power in Religion," challenges a measure of contradiction as to some of its sweeping indictments. Charles C. Merrill, secretary of the Vermont Congregational Conference, would modestly decline to be considered a "statesman," denominational or otherwise. However, he is something of a Christian statesman. In his work in Vermont he approaches all communities, with the "community interests," although this is a vague term, "first and foremost in every consideration." He has a marked zeal in every case for a true "community church" if one must use this wholly inadequate term to designate a single church ministering to all the people of a single neighborhood.

He does not care to tag the name of his denomination upon it. Obviously it has certain uses to designate the historic and spiritual continuity which "federated church," or "united church," or "community church" can not suggest. He cares nothing about a "balance of power" nor for "capturing community churches for the denomination." He has simply and sincerely tried to bring, and in large measure has succeeded in bringing, relief to intolerable situations in overchurched communities, by making the only possible arrangement.

This has admittedly not been the ideal arrangement, but it looks toward the ideal. And it is a preposterous characterization to call such work as done by Mr. Merrill an "impertinent intrusion of outside overhead organization." The people of these communities have control of their religion, and they exercise that control, sometimes indeed quite inadequately and quite foolishly. But they could hardly do anything more foolish than to accept the theory that a so-called "community church" isolated, attached, and proudly local, is the solution of our religious problem.

The Uncommon Commonplace

By Bishop W. A. Quayle

A GROUP OF ESSAYS that go to the very soul of things human, a gathering of poems, a sheaf of tender tributes to "Some Friends of Mine in Paradise," and "The Story of Margaret." The sort of book to break open the hard shell of ecclesiasticism that the spirit of vital religion may be manifest. Dr. Quayle is essentially a poet, as was his Master. The single essay entitled "The Uncommon Commonplace," is worth more than a dozen books of hard-shelled theology.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Y. W. C. A. Brings Miss Royden to America

The Y. W. C. A. national officers have prevailed upon Miss Maude Royden to visit America soon. She will speak at the national convention of that organization, which will be held at Hot Springs, Ark., April 20-26. It is expected that 1,500 women will be in attendance at this convention. Various sectional meetings will be held including conferences on students, industrial workers, business and professional women, the colored, the foreign born and the younger girls. Reactionary influences are at work in both Associations seeking to divert the activities of the organizations back again into traditional channels, and being specially opposed to the industrial attitude taken by both Associations. Miss Royden will bring the international point of view to the meeting, and will also interpret the more advanced social attitudes held by industrial students in England.

Bishop Warns Labor Party of Enmity

The bane of various radical movements has been that they have been fed more upon hatred than love. The anarchist or the bolshevist ordinarily thinks far less about the dear people they seek to emancipate than about the privileged classes they propose to dispossess. Bishop Temple recently addressed an assembly in Manchester. As a member of the Labor party he is able to sense its perils. He said: "The positive work of the Labor party ought always to be the actual practice of fellowship and its bond of unity, independent and free from all kinds of enmity and antagonism must be to get people to think mainly of the boons of existence that are not material—knowledge, beauty, courage, loyalty, love, joy and peace, however much they have to occupy themselves with the material needs of life." The Church Socialist League of England is strong enough to make public demonstrations and recently it assembled a large crowd in order to demand work for the unemployed of the nation.

Boston Unitarians Pay Sunday School Teachers

The question of paying Sunday school teachers has often been discussed, but in evangelical circles it has usually been decided that such a plan would not raise the standards in religious education. Boston Unitarians think otherwise, however, and they have been experimenting for some time with this idea. A school was opened for the training of paid teachers recently, and prospective teachers must pay tuition to attend the school. The reason for opening this school has been stated by Rev. William I. Lawrence, Th. D., who says: "For it should be evident enough that when one receives compensation for teaching in the Sunday school, he undertakes a professional task. Equally, churches and church committees should see that when they offer compensation to teachers they have not only the right but the duty laid upon them to demand at least a definite minimum of preliminary equipment and a definite standard of efficiency in the work done. To do less than this while paying teachers is merely to offer a monetary prize for being present, and that lowers rather than raises the level of religious work."

Freedom From Political Control Means Unity

The various national churches of the orthodox group have during the past century often been out of communion with one another on account of the complications of worldly politics. Traditionally the patriarch of Constantinople was the head of this communion, but for a long time the Sultan has had a hand in bringing about his election which meant a weakening of authority. In Russia, owing to the influence of the Czar's government the patriarch of Moscow did not cooperate with the patriarch of Constantinople. The recently elected patriarch of Constantinople, Meletios, is now in the United States, and his influence here is being used to bring about the unity of the American representatives of the orthodox family. His efforts have been ably seconded by various ecclesiastics of the Episcopal fellowship. The Rt. Rev. James H. Darlington, bishop of Harrisburg, recently preached in the Russian cathedral of New York, advocating not only the union of the various orthodox communions, but also the union of orthodox and Episcopal communions. A service has also been held in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine which brought together Episcopalian and orthodox for the purpose of common worship.

Disciples Churches Lack Money to Build

The Church Erection department of the United Christian Missionary Society reports an unusual number of requests for loans with which to erect new buildings for Disciples churches. The requests pending at the present time aggregate $871,000, which is a very considerable sum. The department has been compelled to quit granting loans on account of the lack of funds. The outstanding appropriations in this department total more than a third of a million dollars.

Comity in Chicago Is Complex Matter

The comity of the churches in Chicago is in a sorry state of complexity. The Cooperative Council of City missions coordinates the city mission work of six leading denominations. Denominations too small to have a city society are not included, and their churches are left out of account in the church extension work of the city societies. These smaller denominations are represented, however, in the Chicago Church Federation which includes thirteen different denominations. The Federation has been quite willing to refer all comity matters to the Cooperative Council, but to this there has been the obvious objection that less than half the denominations in the Federation could secure redress from the Cooperative Council in case of overlapping of territory. Furthermore the denominations of congregational polity could not control their self-supporting churches through the city mission society and the Cooperative Council. Some of the worst cases of friction in the city have arisen in this way. The obvious solution would have been a merging of the two organizations, but this has been resisted by many of the city superintendents because it increased the number of denominations with which they must practice comity. The Church Federation is now seeking to establish rules which will govern comity cases in which the Cooperative Council refuses to take jurisdiction. Among these rules is a statement of principle: "With such large areas of responsibility and opportunity untouched, it is to be regarded as unchristian to permit undue overlapping and long overloading."

Faith Healer Sentenced to Death

The outbreak of a new faith healing movement among the natives on the Congo has been previously noted by the religious press. More recently the government there adopted very severe measures sentencing to death the leader of the movement, Kimbangu, on the ground that he was the leader of an insurrectionary movement. Several of his followers were given long periods of penal servitude. Through the activity of the missionaries, Kimbangu's sentence has been commuted. It is charged by the Baptist Mission House in London that the handling of the case has been motivated by a desire to discredit Protestant mission work on the Congo.

Churchless Village Gets the Headline

Secular papers all over the country have taken up the story of Walcott, Ia., which recently boasted that for fifty years it has had no church and no jail. Correspondence has ensued, and people of neighboring villages have been asked for their opinion of this unusual town. A neighbor tells the story of this town in the following words published in the Continent: "The Walcotters came to America in 1858 in revolt against German oppression. They were disaffected against the church as being in their homeland a creature of the state. They threw off religion as one symbol of their bondage. Walcott is a fairly decent community. Its people booze, but they don't commit highway robbery nor violate one another's wives and daughters. They make money and salt it in the bank, but they have few concepts beyond 'Let us eat, drink and be merry.' The true, the beautiful and the good, the love of humanity, the reading of good books, the appreciation of art in any form—all receive but scant notice in that community. The morality they have is ancestral impulse or is sponged from the surrounding standards of adjacent communities. Various attempts to organize churches there have failed. Just now there is a Sunday school of which the principal of the high school is superintendent. How long it will flourish is problematical."

Indian Mystic Goes to Thibet

Sadhu Sundar Singh, the well-known Hindu mystic and expounder of Christianity to the oriental mind is now in the midst of a very interesting adventure. He has crossed the Himalayan mountains at an altitude of 13,500 feet, suffering greatly from the cold, and is now going down on the other side into the forbidden land of Thibet. He describes certain hot springs he found on the way where the natives boiled their rice with nature's heat. In his mission, he goes on his way praying and distributing copies of the gospels.

New Missionaries Appointed for Jamaica

The United Christian Missionary Society of the Disciples of Christ have recently appointed Rev. and Mrs. S. H. Bartlett as missionaries to Jamaica. Mr. Bartlett was for eight years secretary of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society and is a man of middle age. The appointment is important in view of the alleged heretical practices of the Jamaica churches. The society defines the function of these new missionaries as follows: "They are going for the purpose of instructing and setting in order our churches on the island." Mr. Bartlett has been a successful pastor and a competent evangelist.

Federal Council Has Larger Income

The annual report of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America shows a steadily growing interest on the part of the constituent bodies in the financial support of the organization. Although in theory the denominations constituting the council are supposed fully to assume all financial budgets, thus far they have not found it possible to do so, and the Board of Finance has found it necessary to rely upon individual contributions. However, the gifts from denominational sources for 1921 aggregate four times the amount of similar gifts received in 1920, and it is confidently believed that the returns from such sources in 1922 will be double those of 1921. The Disciples of Christ are among those bodies that have given least to the support of the council, but in the light of the action of the Winona convention, approving $20,000 for the council, it is expected that a large group of the churches of this communion will be stimulated to make contributions toward the support of this cooperative instrumentality of Protestantism.

More Lawsuits in Christian Science Circles

The various Christian Science publications have come to be a losing proposition while the directors of the mother church and the trustees of the publication society continue to air their troubles in the courts. In a recent legal document it is alleged that the loss in subscriptions in a period of a little less than three years to the various journals has been as follows: Christian Science Sentinel, 70 per cent; Christian Science Journal, 75 per cent; the Christian Science Monitor, 80 per cent. The publishing company was formerly making profits of $500,000 per year. These have been wiped out, and at the present time a loss of $20,000 a month is being incurred.

Hard to Collect Big Funds

The representatives of the various denominational promotional organizations met at the offices of the Federal council on November 9. Twelve organizations were represented, and there was general discussion of the problems involved in the nation-wide method of carrying on

Social Program of Local Churches

IN LINE with its policy to conduct investigations and publish them rather than to engage very largely in propaganda, the Commission on the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council through its secretary, Rev. Worth M. Tippy, has made a study of the social programs of a number of successful churches throughout the land. It is interesting to note that among the churches there is a very wide diversity of view-point with regard to the usefulness of the various methods of social uplift.

Collingwood Avenue Presbyterian church of Toledo encourages the forum method of discussion, not shrinking from tackling the most sensitive subjects such as spiritualism, denominational differences, creeds and church history. Pilgrim church of Cleveland, O., is avowedly opposed to the use of the building for any controversial purpose. It specifically mentions the fact that it "steers clear of antagonizing Catholics, Jews, Lutherans by refusing to be sectarian." In place of this attitude is one of cordial fellowship.

The recreational program of the church is also one in which the very greatest differences appear. Pilgrim church, above mentioned, has a new gymnasium, bowling alleys and shower bath. They mention having dances in the parish house. Trinity M. E. church, of Kansas City, has no gymnasium because it has been advised by other churches to omit this feature from its program. The dance problem is made easier in the Congregational church at Winnetka, by having a community organization take over all of the recreational features of the parish. This absolves the church proper from responsibility, though it holds a deed to the property.

It is interesting to note that many of the large churches which replied to the questionnaire had several Boy Scout organizations, but there was nothing for the girls. Government Street Presbyterian church of Mobile has a rest room and a business girls' lunch room for the older girls. An interesting feature in Central Methodist church of Detroit is a Sunday afternoon club for servant girls and girls employed in hotels and restaurants. In the Episcopal churches an almost invariable feature is the excellent organization known as the Girl's Friendly Society which exalts the ideals of chastity and of social service.

In this list of large and influential churches with social outlook, the moving picture does not bulk as large as one would think. First Presbyterian church of Portland, Ore., reports using the pictures on week-day evenings occasionally with good results. First Christian church of Kansas City, Mo., reports the Sunday evening use of motion pictures along with evangelistic sermons. In the summer this church holds out-door services with good results.

The churches that now conduct educational classes in the evening are probably not as numerous as formerly owing to the rapid increase of facilities for evening study provided by the public school and by commercial business colleges. The Christian Associations are also doing much educational work in larger cities. Plymouth church of Brooklyn is foremost among churches with a program of secular education. Classes are held in accounting, book-keeping, business English, economics, French, physical education, public speaking, stenography and other subjects. This work is of sufficient merit as to secure credit at New York University.

Unique experiments are being carried on by various churches which will doubtless provide suggestions for religious workers in the future. Grace Congregational church of Holyoke, Mass., has a two thousand dollar printing plant which is used for propaganda, and which is in continual operation. More than one Methodist church reports "graded instruction of converts." The leaders of this denomination have turned deliberately away from some of the more characteristic features of nineteenth century evangelism. This study of contemporaneous church methodology is related to the kind of neighborhood in which the church is located. The Commission in presenting its limited report recognizes that it is the neighborhood that gives significance to the methods employed by the local church.

campaigns for church funds. One fact brought out quite prominently was that five year pledges are hard to collect. The Disciples reported eighty per cent collection on their pledges which had been taken only from a very select class of givers. The Baptist fund is much newer, and on this fund ninety-two per cent collections were reported. The Methodists pledged the largest fund, and at the same time face the most difficult problems in the matter of collections. They report a percentage of seventy-two. The failure of the Interchurch World Movement made the representatives wary about setting up anything like a general program in this work, but it was agreed that it is highly desirable to pool information for the purpose of avoiding pitfalls. The relation of the promotional organizations to the administrative boards proved to be a difficult problem and it is something which will be given further study. The committee appointed to study this phase of the work is composed of Rev. A. E. Cory, Rev. Hugh A. Heath, Rev. William Hiram Foulkes, Rev. R. J. Wade, Rev. W. E. Lampe, and Rev. S. M. Cavert. Another meeting of the group will be called some time either in March or April at which time further study will be given to the common problems.

Independency Creates Problems for Disciples

The historic independency of the Disciples of Christ is bringing results among their churches that give grave concern to the leaders. Rev. J. B. Holmes, state secretary of Texas, has analyzed the facts in his state with unusual thoroughness. He puts forth the following statistical study which will speak for itself: "Organized churches, 409; unorganized groups, 74; total number of congregations, 485; churches supporting full time preaching, 162; vacant pulpits in full time churches, 18; churches having part time, 94; vacant pulpits in part time churches, 155; preachers being sought by full time churches, 14; preachers required to supply demand in part time churches, 15; total number of preachers necessary to supply present demand, 29; total number of preachers including professors and students employed, 170. Pastors within the state open for engagement, 18. Pastors outside the state who desire to come to Texas, 26; preachers now devoting full time to business in the state, 56, most of these are available when a 'living salary' is offered. One church with a vacant pulpit may pay a maximum salary of $3,000. Three will pay as much as $2,400. Three will pay as much as $2,000. One will pay as much as $1,800. For the other 21 men desired, the offer is $1,500. All of these places demand a 'strong, capable' man. Additional places that in our judgment could pay $1,500, 51. Places needing help of Texas State missions at once, 197. New fields offering fine openings number more than 100. The employees of the Texas Missions State Board now number 30. Balance due from Disciples pledges for last year more than $20,000. About 150 Texas Disciples of Christ churches pay between 75 per cent and 80 per cent of all that is sent in for all kinds of missions, benevolences and Christian education within the state. It is the task of Texas missions to develop more than 300 other churches now nearly dormant, in the interest of the world-wide task; on Texas missions also is the responsibility of teaching Christian stewardship, of evangelizing new fields and of developing work now begun."

Episcopalians Will Not Go to Washington

The Presiding Bishop and Council of the Protestant Episcopal church met in New York recently. In addition to routine business, consideration was given to a proposed change of location for the national organization. An invitation had been received from the Bishop of Washington to establish in that city national headquarters for the church. The council decided not to accept this invitation for the present. The reasons given were the loss of banking facilities in New York, and the loss of the important merchandising and shipping facilities of the latter city in the work of foreign missions. One of the gratifying announcements at this meeting was the fact that ten new missionaries had been sent out, a total of seventy toward the goal of a hundred set by the centennial committee.

Unitarians Boom Church Attendance

Through the Unitarian Laymen's League something of the tang of evangelicalism is being imported into the dignified ranks of the Unitarians. The latest thing is a church attendance campaign. The churches of the denomination are grouped into three classes, those with more than a hundred in the average morning audience, those with less than a hundred and more than fifty, and those with less than fifty. The six churches in each class making the largest attendance gain will be entitled to send a delegate to Anniversary week in 1922 at the expense of the league. The American Unitarian Association is co-operating in this campaign by circulating a lay sermon by George F. Hoar on church-going.

Insurgency in Southern Methodism

As the time approaches for the next General Assembly of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the issues of the denomination come into sharper consciousness. The perennial question of reunion with northern Methodism will not down, and some new developments may come from the discussion of this question. A group of insurgents are demanding that a new hymn book be created to supersede the present book which was created by a joint commission of northern and southern Methodists. These insurgents insist that the present book was created "by high-brows and doctors of divinity." The budget system of the church is also under attack. A Methodist in the southland cannot contribute to foreign missions, for instance, without contributing to every other cause. The possibility of an increase in the number of bishops is being vigorously opposed by some. A commission has spent many months working on a new constitution for the church and has finally published its draft. Constitution-makers in every state of the southland are now offering amendments to the commission's report. The controversy over the orthodoxy of teachers in church colleges and of missionaries in foreign lands, which was brought to a lull by the death of Bishop Lambuth, has broken out again. The Southwest Missouri conference has demanded that a committee should be appointed to smell out heresy in suspected quarters.

Faith Healing Catches On in London

The American interest in faith healing is taking hold across the water. In London, Pastor Stephen Jeffreys is much in the public eye. Converted in the Welsh revival he is preaching a message in which there is much brimstone and free predictions of the speedy coming of Jesus Christ to this earth. Many cases of cures by faith are reported as features of his meetings. British writers are more canny than ours, however, in the presence of such phenomena, and the failures are getting their share of attention also.

Australian Investigator Views Operations of Prohibition

The British empire has been filled with perverted reports of the operation of the prohibition laws of the United States. The Anti-Liquor League of Australia recently sent to the United States Rev. Gifford Gordon to secure first hand facts about prohibition in this country. Mr. Gifford has been for many years pastor of a Disciples church in Melbourne. In the course of his tour in this country he is speaking in many churches on Australia and her problems. He carries credentials from some very prominent ministers of this country as an interpreter of the idea of Christian internationalism.

Churches of Indianapolis Have Good Membership Gain

Rev. C. H. Winders, secretary of the Church Federation in Indianapolis, recently made a report of church progress in the Indiana city for 1921. While confessing the difficulty of securing accurate statistics on church membership, he asserted that the gain in membership in Indianapolis churches for the year was about 7,500. In the erection of new church edifices the capital city of Hoosierland showed remarkable progress. The new buildings in process of construction during the year have a value of about a million dollars. The churches have met the new financial burdens created by the various denominational world movements and by the advance of salaries for ministers. A marked feature of the church life in Indianapolis the past year was a series of gospel meetings conducted by Gypsy Smith. Mr. Winders says with regard to this enterprise: "The money to meet the expenses of the meeting, totaling more than $35,000, came from the regular offerings, it being unnecessary to make any special appeals. The meeting was a great blessing to the city; its chief value consisted of stimulating and deepening the religious life of the church people, making it easy for them to think and talk in terms of religion and the church. The preaching was sane, wholesome and practical, and from this meeting there have been no unfavorable reactions."

Unitarians Hope to Grow in the Southland

A recent session of the Unitarian ministers' meeting of Boston was devoted to the subject of missionary work in the southern states. Three men were present who had recently spent time campaigning in Virginia. These were: Rev. Marion F. Ham, Rev. Arthur W. Middlefield and Rev. Miles Hanson. These three reported favorably on their adventure, and further work will be undertaken in carrying the Unitarian message to the people below the Mason and Dixon line.

Minister Takes a Referendum on Sermon Topics

The task of finding popular sermon themes is a difficult one for any minister. Rev. B. C. Preston, a Congregational minister of Los Angeles, believes that the sermons should arise out of popular demand, and he recently took a referendum on the subjects of his preaching. The list of proposed sermon subjects was presented to his people and he was thus able to discern their preferences. The physicians voted almost unanimously for a sermon on "The Best Medicine—a Merry Heart." The young people voted for a sermon on "Cultivating Purity in Thought and Speech." The series of sermons called "Straight Sermons" received more votes than any other group.

The Story of the American Hymn

By EDWARD S. NINDE

This is the first attempt that has ever been made to throw into popular form the history of our American hymns and their authors. The narrative covers a period of three hundred years, from the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers on these western shores, down to our own time. The writers of the past hundred years are taken up in regular order, and so much of their life-story is told as to provide a suitable background for the study of their hymns. The book is illustrated with the finest collection of portraits of American hymn-writers ever brought together.

by a cablegram received from the Union church in Peking, asking him to supply the church for three months. This church is attended by both British and American foreigners living in the city of Peking. Dr. Boynton is naturally influenced by the fact that his eldest daughter is teaching in the Woman's College in Peking. In August of the coming summer, Dr. Boynton expects to be in Stockholm at which time he will attend the interdenominational meetings there in which he is particularly interested.

President of Chile Reads the Bible

President Alessandri of Chile is one of the most forward-looking national leaders to be found in South America. He has seen the importance of religious idealism in the carrying out of great reforms. Speaking to a visitor the other day, he revealed in some measure the secret of his success as an administrator. He said: "I may tell you that the only book I have in my bed chamber is the Bible. I read it every day, and try to make it my guide. Don't understand that I am a Protestant, for I am not. Neither am I a Catholic. But I believe I am a true Christian. And for this reason I believe that I will succeed in my reform movement."

Women May Now Be Presbyterian Deacons

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian church at Winona Lake last year was cautious on the subject of woman's official relationship to the church and referred to the Presbyteries for final action the question of making women deacons. The majority of the vote of the Presbyteries has now been secured for the innovation and women may sit in the sessions of the local church in the northern states. The measure was regarded as of special importance in small churches where the men were so few in numbers.

Northern Methodism Makes a Good Gain

The various religious denominations of America are encouraged by recent reports of the work for the past year. After a period during the war when church growth disappeared, it is encouraging to find the tendency changing. The Methodist Episcopal Church reports a net gain in membership for the past year of 90,404. The total membership is now given as 3,938,655 in the United States and 542,087 in foreign lands. Benevolent enterprises received during the year $19,472,423.87. The Methodist Episcopal Church has 40,198 churches and 34,500 preachers.

Greek Government Opposes Meletios

The newly elected patriarch of Constantinople will have no easy task. He has been notified by the Sultan of Turkey that the Turkish government will refuse to recognize him or any other Greek as head of the Orthodox church. He is opposed by the King of Greece also because he was a supporter of Venizelos until the latter was driven from the country. Now the King of Greece takes the position that Meletios is usurping power in separating the Greek Orthodox from the organization in Greece. Meletios is a very vigorous man of fifty, and is supported by a great majority of the bishops of the Orthodox church at the present time. Whether the hostile rulers will succeed in dethroning him remains to be seen.

Chaplains Force Truly Representative

In former days the tradition was for an army chaplain to be either a Roman Catholic or an Episcopalian. One of the achievements of the war was to make the chaplains force truly representative of the religious life of the country. There are 185 chaplains in the United States army, divided as follows among different denominations: Baptist, 26; Baptist (colored), 2; Congregational, 9; Disciples of Christ, 10; Lutheran, 12; Methodist Episcopal and Methodist Episcopal, South, 41; Methodist Episcopal (colored), 2; Methodist Protestant, 1; Presbyterian, 15; Protestant Episcopal, 17; Cumberland Presbyterian, 1; Reformed, 2; Roman Catholic, 42; Universalist, 2; Unitarian, 2; United Evangelical, 1.

Children Contest in Bible Knowledge

Nose-counting contests are familiar in the Sunday school work of the middle west, but Brooklyn has recently developed a plan for a competitive study of the Bible by the children of the Sunday schools. The Brooklyn Sunday School Union publishes ten Bible questions in the Brooklyn Eagle every day, with references to look up. Borough will contest against borough in the answering of the questions. A silver cup will be given to the school of which the winner of these inter-borough contests is a member.

Unitarian Ministers Have a National Organization

The mother church of Christian Science is in a certain sense the only church. Christian Scientists who have "demonstrated" unite with the church in Boston though belonging to local congregations. Unitarian ministers now have the unique privilege of belonging to the Boston ministerial association, though living in some distant part of the country. Ballots will be taken by mail upon important questions, and any man may make a motion and bring it to ballot by the simple expedient of securing the endorsement of five other ministers to the motion. Several hundred men widely scattered throughout the country will thus be brought into a vital fellowship.

Catholic Missioner Reaches Large Number of People

Roman Catholics have no Billy Sunday, but they have a man who has probably made more permanent converts to Catholicism than any evangelist has ever made to the Protestant churches. The Rev. Fr. Bertrand L. Conway belongs to order known as Paulist fathers, and this organization of priests who are specially interested in converting non-Catholics is now operating largely in connection with the Knights of Columbus. Father Conway has written a book called "Questions and Answers" in which the questions of non-Catholics receive an answer. Three million copies of the book have been circulated. He also conducts a question-box in connection with all the missions which he holds in which he meets the queries of troubled minds. He avoids controversy with other sects, and by a spirit of tolerance wins friends for the Roman Catholic church in every city where he goes.

What Denominationalism Does to the Home

One of the great obstacles to a religious home in America is the fact of denominational division. With no great family tradition in religion, the children tend to wander far away from the fold. The Texas Sunday School Association, headed by William Nehemiah Wiggins, recently made an interesting find in Dallas. In a certain home in that city the father is a Gentile unbeliever, the mother is a Jewess, the eldest son is a Unitarian, the daughter is a Christian Scientist, and the younger son attends the Baptist Sunday school. Family conversations on religion in this home would be rather difficult.

United Society Officials Confer With Canton, O., Church

A number of small churches have withdrawn their support to the United Christian Missionary Society because of the action of the Winona Lake convention with regard to the China mission. When the largest of the conservative churches, that at Canton, O., of which Rev. P. H. Welshimer is minister, pulled away, four secretaries got on the train determined to face the issue out with the official board, that a general clearing of the atmosphere might result. The official board of the Canton church has formulated a set of demands upon the United Society which will have consideration in a board meeting not far hence. Until that time the minister in the parish papers urges his members to continue making their contributions just as they have been making them.

Puritan Spirit Takes Up Abode in the South

The Puritan spirit, which was formerly supposed to have its habitat in New England, must have migrated for there are evidences of a very virile sabbatarian conviction in the South. Recently a Methodist conference in Arkansas met and discussed the question of sabbath observance. It was voted to seek from Congress a law forbidding the railroads to operate trains on Sunday, and forbidding publishers from issuing newspapers on that day. The proposed law would also require all business houses to be closed on the Lord's day.

Social Rebuilders

By Charles R. Brown

THIS book by the dean of the Divinity School of Yale University contains the lectures delivered by him at DePauw University in 1921 upon the Mendenhall Foundation, and constitutes the seventh in that series of lectures. The five lectures are a study in reconstruction with certain ancient leaders of biblical history as the outstanding figures, and the present situation of the world, as an aftermath of the war, as the chief point of application. The book is distinctly a message for the day.

"The chief distinction of this little book is that it is a voice crying in the present wilderness of confusion and disorder showing the way out."—President Grose, DePauw University.

MOFFATT'S Translation of the New Testament

THE author is recognized as one of the most distinguished living scholars of the Greek new Testament. His translation is notable for its apt usage of words as well as for its originality of thought. A new meaning is given to the old version which is supplemented and not supplanted. It is the only version which makes use of the recent discoveries in Egypt and the Holy Land. No Bible student's library is complete without this marvelous translation. It will elucidate difficult passages and call forth expressions of surprise, delight and gratitude. Its every phrase is a new text for the preacher and a new idea for the Christian layman.

Public Opinion and the Steel Strike

By the Commission of Inquiry of
the Interchurch World Movement

Of no other book published in the troubled days since the war can one more truly say, "Here is something every American citizen should read." No matter what he thinks of industrial relations, no matter what his politics, his social position or his creed, every American, in simple duty to his country and himself, ought to read "Public Opinion and the Steel Strike."

Though limited in scope, the report is of more importance to Americans generally than the first and more comprehensive book was. It strikes deeper. It goes beyond the steel strike, in implications if not in facts. It studies, in the light of the western Pennsylvania phases of a single industrial conflict, sets of circumstances which are neither local nor temporary.

Propaganda is the theme. Presuming that public opinion often is the decisive factor in industrial war, what feeds public opinion? When an army of workmen walked out of steel mills throughout the country, stopping a great basic industry, how accurately was the interested public informed?

Public opinion was misdirected systematically, according to the commission of inquiry. Pulpit and press, unions and companies, public officials and welfare organizations—all failed, for one reason or another, to provide the public with accurate information.

Trained students of social phenomena, indorsed by a commission of which Bishop Francis J. McConnell is chairman, here present detailed evidence in support of their contention that public opinion was scientifically poisoned and American law was brazenly betrayed by press, church and government in order that strikers might be beaten—all with the implication that the same thing may be expected elsewhere in America tomorrow.

Prof. Alva W. Taylor commends this new book as one of the most challenging published in many years.

Price of the book $1.50, plus 10 cents postage.

Wanted—A Congregation

By LLOYD C. DOUGLAS

Press Opinions of the Book

The Christian Advocate: "The preacher who reads this book will get many valuable pointers on how to do it; and it is hoped there will be many official members of the churches who will read the story and be profited thereby, coming away from the reading wiser, even though sadder, men."

The Continent: "In this remarkable story by a minister two college chums and a successful surgeon help a discouraged preacher to catch the vision that transformed an empty church into one crowded to overflowing—that changed a lifeless church into a living church."

The Churchman: "Dr. Douglas gives a realistic story of the transformation of a conventional ministerial career into a vital ministry. He tells the minister that he must be born again."

The Christian Endeavor World: "The story is cleverly told. Let us hope that it will put new courage into many a weary pastor."

The United Presbyterian: "The problem here presented for consideration is not how to get an audience, but how to get a congregation—a dependable body of Christian worshippers."

The Presbyterian Banner: "The book is very modern. It deals, not with the materials of preaching, but with methods."

The Christian Standard: "At the age of forty Rev. D. Preston Blue is discouraged; he does not know how to secure a large attendance at regular services. By accident he converses with a manufacturer, a physician and an editor. These conversations brace him up and remake the preacher in him. He at once becomes a man of authority and his officers and people respond quickly and with enthusiasm to the propositions he submits. A great and permanent audience materializes and the preacher is happy."

Unity: "The reading of this book is a stimulus and will cause the reader to arise in his own new strength."

Lutheran Church Herald: "No preacher, even the most successful, will waste the time he spends in reading the book. But thoughtful laymen also who desire to help their pastors and do their own share toward raising a congregation, will be stimulated by the reading."

The Intelligencer: "Dr. Douglas is to be heartily commended for presenting such a 'way out' to those who have felt the need of improvement but have hitherto been ignorant of a method of relief."

The Epworth Era: "The book is constructive. The story shows how the discouraged minister crowded his church merely by taking human nature as it is and appealing to it, just as Jesus did."

The Herald of Gospel Liberty: "We do not see how any minister can read the book without a genuine and conscientious inventory of himself and his methods."

If you are a minister you must have this book. If you are a layman, why not buy a copy for your minister and one for yourself?

Jessie Brown Pounds

THE memorial collection of the literary work of Jessie Brown Pounds is being greeted with an almost sacred enthusiasm, as revealing in a marvelous way the spirit which was Jessie Brown Pounds. To those who knew her, it will be a cherished possession through the years; to those who did not know her personally but were acquainted with her work, it will bring delight and satisfaction; and for those who may not have known much of her writing but who have a liking for literature, the volume will bring with its reading the pleasure one has in a new and significant discovery.

SOME will like best the poems of Jessie Brown Pounds, with their beauty and charm, and with their revelation of her unusual personality. Some will care more for her hymns, of which "Beautiful Isle of Somewhere," which was sung at President McKinley's funeral, was perhaps the most popular. Others will find in her essays not only a philosophy of life which satisfies, but also an atmosphere of humor which sets Jessie Brown Pounds far outside the class of dry essayists. It was as a story-writer that Mrs. Pounds first won fame, and thousands of readers will discover, with exquisite pleasure, some of their favorites in this collection. The play will perhaps bring more of surprise to her friends than any other portion of the book. As for the play, which is entitled "Forty Thousand Dollars," it may justly be said that it is extremely well done.

This book is recently from the bindery, and orders will be filled promptly on their receipt. Price of the book $2.00, plus 10 cents postage.

Four Great Books on Modern Religion

Jesus in the Experience of Men:

By T. R. Glover

Like Dr. Glover's earlier volume, "The Jesus of History," this one demonstrates afresh that "Jesus of Nazareth does stand in the center of human history, that he has brought God and Man into a new relation, that he is the present concern of every one of us and that there is more in him than we have yet accounted for." The author describes his purpose as primarily historical—watching "the Christian apostle and the Christian community brought face to face with new issues, intellectual, spiritual and social, and doing their best to adjust old and new." Professor Glover is Fellow in St. John's College, Cambridge, and University lecturer in ancient history.

Price $1.90, plus 12 cents postage.

Outspoken Essays:

By Dean W. R. Inge

Dean Inge, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is one of the great scholars of the Church of England, a Christian philosopher, a keen student of modern life and its tendencies against the background of history. His writings have given religious faith in England a new intellectual appeal. He has won attention no less by the fearless honesty of his inquiry than by his profound comment upon the problems which today engage the minds of men. While he excludes from his consideration no source of knowledge, his approach to the study of these matters is that of the man who believes in God, who believes in the teaching of Jesus, who, because of this faith, accepts the priestly vocation and devotes himself to the service of his fellows through the avenues which the church affords. This book is one of the most popular of the books of "the gloomy dean," as he is sometimes unjustly called. Dr. Newton believes that this book is one of the few current books that will be read fifty years from now.

Price $2.25, plus 12 cents postage.

What Christianity Means to Me:

By Lyman Abbott

As indicated by its sub-title, this book is "a spiritual autobiography." Dr. Abbott states his purpose in the book as follows: "I began the systematic study of the New Testament when I entered the ministry in 1866. Since that time I have been a student of one book, a follower of one Master. This volume is an endeavor to state simply and clearly the results of these sixty years of Bible study, this more than sixty years of Christian experience. The grounds of my confidence in the truth of the statements made in this volume are the teaching of Jesus Christ and His apostles as reported in the New Testament, interpreted and confirmed by a study of life and by my own spiritual consciousness of Christ's gracious presence and life-giving love."

Price $1.75, plus 12 cents postage.

The Proposal of Jesus:

By John H. Hutton

The thesis of this book is that Jesus—disregarding, it is true, the petty disputes and the sects and parties of his day—had as the chief message of his ministry a definite solution for the larger situation of his time, both political and religious, intended to avert the tragic and inevitable national disaster which he saw impending. The author holds that Jesus came into the world for the very purpose of submitting to mankind a program for both personal and social life, in the name of God. He was put to death because he adhered to his program as the only public policy which could save the Jewish nation. Also, that his program "still stands, and still represents his mind and what he accepted as the mind of God and the final ruling upon the conduct of human affairs." Dr. Newton says of the book: "The author makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous but awe-inspiring."

Price $1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

These four books, with "What and Where is God," have been our "best sellers" during the past six months. They are essential books. Every alert minister and thoughtful churchman should possess all of them.

The Low Price of a Life!

WHEN Miss Haines of the Friends Relief in Russia states that two million people must die in Russia before food can reach them, one begins to appreciate the size of the calamity which has befallen that unspeakably unfortunate nation. Were relief to be withheld entirely, the number dead by spring would be twenty millions. Recently our congress voted twenty million dollars to help the starving. The Russian government has voted away the last remnant of its gold reserve, ten million dollars, in order to buy food. With colossal gifts of this size, private charity is still necessary if the task is to be compassed. The Russian government will transport all food free of charge, and will allow the relief work to be administered by Americans. All that the American commissions have desired has been granted them, so there can be no doubt that the relief will be administered to all alike without regard to political or religious affiliations. The American Friends have figured out the amount necessary to save a child until the next harvest, and have set the figure at twelve dollars. An automobile tire would save the life of two children. A box party at the theater represents the life of a child, or of two children. It is a time when right-minded Christian people will curtail their luxuries for the sake of saving human life. To be callous in the face of the horrific needs of Russia is to be pagan in spirit and to turn aside from the teachings of Jesus Christ. Meanwhile, in the good providence of God, this sorrow which has befallen Russia is doing much to allay the bitter prejudices of political theory. Russia is to sit at an economic conference with the other nations of Europe. Once she would have scorned such a seat, and not long since most governments of the world would have refused such fellowship. The radicalism of the democratic movement in Russia is being tempered by necessity. That there are certain innovations in Russia which will stand the test of time is probable. In the feeding of the hungry angry partisans will develop a sympathy of mind that will help them in facing their differences.

Dean of Religious Editors Turns to Education

ON the side of the church's personnel no happening of this season is more important than the withdrawal of Dr. Howard A. Bridgman from the editorship of that great paper, the Congregationalist. His resignation has been in the hands of his board since the National Council meeting held in Los Angeles last summer, but it became effective only with the last issue of 1921. Dr. Bridgman was with the Congregationalist for thirty-four years, having advanced from the most modest beginnings to the position of managing editor under his chief, Dr. A. E. Dunning, whom he succeeded a dozen years ago as editor-in-chief. His service to the paper and its constituency has been rendered both within the line of a proud tradition and in departure from it. The Congregationalist is one of the few denominational papers yet remaining to carry over to our day the atmosphere of that period when religious journalism ranked with the strongest secular journalism. The rise of secular magazines of unlimited resources and enormous circulations, together with a relaxing of interest in denominational points of view, have compelled many religious journals to give up during the past two decades. But the Congregationalist under Dr. Bridgman has been able to meet the demands of the modern public's mood with a genius whose reward is a large body of readers and a beneficent influence throughout the entire church. This genius of Dr. Bridgman's is three-sided: he has kept the paper liberal, as Dr. Dunning had made it; he has made it denominational in the sense of that domestic virtue which provides first of all for the welfare of one's own household; and he has enriched its tradition of catholicity which makes his paper an organ not of a single denomination alone, but of our universal Christian faith. Dr. Bridgman's fellowcraftsmen in all denominations regret his withdrawal. He has been a delightful neighbor, brotherly, genial, unselfish, totally lacking in those "airs" which a small man standing on his eminence might have assumed. As a writer he is a beautiful combination of depth and cleverness, always in earnest but never dull or controversial. He is to be headmaster of Croton school for boys; but it will be many a day before his public or his team workers will be able in their thoughts to let the academic gown displace the mantle of dean of religious editors which he has so gracefully worn.

The Congregationalist's New Editor

THE appointment of Dr. William E. Gilroy as Dr. Bridgman's successor in the sanctum of the Congregationalist may seem to New England Congregationalism to be something of an act of faith in view of his modest reputation, but in the office of The Christian Century the quality of Dr. Gilroy's talent has been long known to have passed the stage of experimentation. He was born to be an editor. And The Christian Century takes a modest pride in having discovered this fact! For several years Dr. Gilroy, until now pastor of Plymouth church, Fond du Lac, Wis., has contributed frequently to our pages and occasionally has been called upon to render special service on the editorial side of this journal. His call to the Congregationalist came to him without the personal acquaintance of a single member of the committee, and rested solely upon the merit of his writing and the expressions of a few friends who have come under the wholesome and inspiring influence of his gracious personality. Dr. Gilroy is one of the most companionable of men. Lured from a peripheral parish to the hub of Congregationalism his simplicity, humbleness, directness of speech and fineness of mind will quickly win him the confidence of all his coworkers and of the denominational constituency which his paper serves.

Freedom of Learning a Boon Yet to be Achieved

FREEDOM of learning is one of the basic conditions of any adequate program of education. Dogmatic restrictions of the laboratory method may for a time keep the truth away from the people, but for the most part these restrictions simply arouse curiosity and stimulate research. Several teachers have been discharged in the colleges of the southland this winter for alleged belief in the theory of evolution. Nothing will more certainly guarantee the growth of state universities than such a policy. The young people of the south are no more willing than the young people of other sections to be brought up on an educational nursing bottle in the hands of a theologian. They want to know the truth about their world and no odium theologicum will prevent their seeking it to the end of the day. In the state universities it is not in the fields of science that freedom is denied. Religious subjects are tabu for the most part, except as an occasional professor may express his disapproval of the common religious convictions of the people. It is in the field of sociology and economics, however, that we find the sensitive nerve of the educational situation in the state institutions. Orthodox political economy is what the politicians want taught, and when some young innovator in a chair of sociology ventures to dissent from social orthodoxy, there is apt to be a commotion in the state legislature at the time the state university funds are voted. The price of liberty is eternal vigilance. We have few schools which have achieved all 'round educational freedom. But there can be no doubt that the demand of the age is for free inquiry. Only by constant search for the truth can we hope to make the adjustments from age to age which alone can prevent degeneration and decay in our national life.

Crime and Prohibition

WEET propaganda is busy trying to make the public believe that the prohibition laws are turning us into a nation of law-breakers. We have only to amend the laws to permit beer and light wines, and everyone will settle down and be good. Though this is on the face of it absurd, it has won the approval of a considerable element of the populace. The facts about arrests must be faced in different cities. These are available from public records and need not be the occasion of any dispute. San Francisco decreased arrests for drunkenness the first year of the operation of prohibition from 17,354 to 11,814. In Los Angeles the decrease was from 15,830 to 2,589. In Boston the decrease was from 52,682 to 16,487. The Chicago Tribune would hardly be under any suspicion of being an organ of the reformers. On a recent day two articles set forth inadvertently the working of prohibition in Chicago. Crime has decreased from year to year so far as totals are concerned. For a year there has been some increase in the number of murders, which the average citizen thinks must have been an enormous increase owing to the vastly enlarged space given to sensational murders in the daily press. The Washingtonian Home in Chicago is written up after this fashion: It has only two cases of delirium tremens in a year, whereas these were once very common. This institution with a long and honorable record of service as an institution for the cure of drunkards now debates whether to close its doors or whether it shall go into an entirely different field, that of caring for mental cases quite apart from the question of alcoholism. Evidently prohibition has done some prohibiting. If we amend our laws to permit wine and beer, we shall have to have an army of chemists in all our communities to conduct the tests on suspected liquor to see whether it comes within the limit. It is declared by experts that the meanest and most criminal drunkard of all is the beer drunkard. Meanwhile it is interesting to note that New Jersey voted on prohibition recently, and is for it. About the only adverse vote is in the Chicago city council which has been, is and apparently ever more shall be as wet as Lake Michigan.

Education for Women In the Orient

TIMES have changed in the orient just as they have in America, and the tradition of woman's inferiority yields before the logic of modern conditions. The woman of Japan no longer stays home to make artificial flowers. She drives the motor bus, or takes up the fares. Great factories employ thousands of women. Confucius assigned to women a relation of inferiority in the social scale, but in China the Confucian ethics, so far as it relates to women, is now a dead letter. One of the chief forces which is transforming the orient as it has transformed the occident is education. Once women are admitted to the classes of great universities, they carry back to their less fortunate sisters the point of view of the modern world, and all is changed. This interpretation of the changing orient is being presented in American colleges with great cogency by Miss Margaret Slattery, who has returned from an extended trip through the east. Speaking in behalf of the campaign of the American colleges to endow the union women's colleges of the orient, she tells of the various institutions she has visited, and what she saw there. The Rockefeller Foundation has promised a million dollars, provided two million is secured by general gifts. The two million has been apportioned to various cities throughout America, and each community now faces the demand made upon it. The transformation of the orient will move at a much more rapid pace when the mothers of the coming generation share with their husbands and brothers the emancipating knowledge that makes up the intellectual equipment of the twentieth century.

When is a Man Married?

UNDER the prevailing confusions in the United States it is not always possible even for a good lawyer to tell when a man is married. The other day an Illinois couple went into another state and were married in proper form. They came back to Illinois to live, only to find that in this state they were living in adultery. In certain states no such stigma attaches to their union. The divorce of Mary Pickford brought to public attention a long series of abuses by people moving temporarily to certain states for the purpose of securing an easy divorce. Reno has become one of the standing words in the joke columns of America. Efforts have been made to induce the various states to enact uniform marriage and divorce laws. These efforts which have been sponsored at different times by eminent people—by Theodore Roosevelt when he was President—have proved altogether futile. Thinking people turn more and more to the conviction that the only solution is a federal amendment to the constitution, conferring on the national government the power of making the laws that regulate marriage and divorce. There is in a sub-committee of the senate at the present time such a bill which is being argued pro and con. Since the question is one that clearly falls within the province of church interest, the various church organizations should take cognizance of it. In the future a man who is called a married man in Kentucky should also be called a married man in Illinois. The states that have encouraged hotel business by establishing divorce colonies should be compelled to come up to the more decent standards of their sister commonwealths. It is clear that a federal law might degrade standards in a few states, but it would undoubtedly lift standards in most of them. The church has no greater stake in the future than in the welfare of the monogamous home.

THERE is widespread assumption that religious modernism is indifferent to if not inconsistent with evangelism. The man of traditional creed and outlook finds it hard to believe that one who is not orthodox according to his standards can have any deep and serious interest in religion at all. And as for his possession of any passion for the salvation of the souls of individuals through the grace of a Saviour who came to seek and save the lost, such a thing is past orthodox comprehension. There are aspects of modernism that seem to warrant the distrust of these sincere and ingenuous souls who can conceive of faith existing only in orthodox forms, but who have a genuine, practical interest in their fellowmen and a burning desire for their redemption. It should be remembered, however, that as there is more than one kind of conservatism there is likewise more than one kind of liberalism. Here and there one finds ministers and churches whose vigor and apparent effectiveness seem to give triumphant witness to the efficacy of the "old gospel" But any claim based on these outstanding instances becomes grotesque when one remembers the men and churches professing the most intense adherence to that "old gospel" and resisting every hint of liberalism, whose own lives and organizations are a byword of barrenness and decay. The fruits of fervor, deep conviction, faithfulness and success are by no means confined to one particular kind of doctrine.

There is a conservatism that has little relation to faith. It is a conservatism of instinct, or of self-interest and privilege, the conservatism of great establishments and conventional orthodoxies. Its devotion to formal creeds, foundations and standards, its resistance to all change, is not because of vital belief, but because it is habituated to pay tribute to external authority. Such an attitude has manifestly no relation to evangelism, and can, in the nature of the case, have no interest in the message of good news concerning salvation. But there is another sort of conservatism manifesting itself in men whose outlook and activities are otherwise advanced almost to the point of radicalism. It is frequently illustrated in men of the learned professions, modern and progressive, alive to every new idea and method in their professional spheres, but assuming the most docile attitude toward whatever they have regarded as orthodox in the sphere of religion, and vigorously condemning in that sphere the very sort of open-mindedness that has marked their success in their own professional activities. Here is a minister who preaches to his people the most outspoken sort of social radicalism on Sunday evenings, and the most dreary sort of religious doctrine in the mornings. A surgeon in a western city, a man of ability and personality, was asked by a friend who was paying him a visit if he belonged to Dr. ———'s congregation. He seemed horror-stricken at the suggestion. He assured his guest that he was a "Moody" man, and not one of the "moderns," that his business was operating, but that he had never operated on the Bible, which Dr. ——— had cut to pieces! Dr. ———'s was the leading church of the city and he an earnest Christian man of liberal faith and outlook. The thing would have been amusing, had it not been tragic. His guest kept his tongue in his cheek. He felt that it would have been as useless for him to discuss with his surgeon friend the free things of the spirit, and to attempt to make clear his own modern outlook, as it would have been for the surgeon to discuss the intricacies of his own profession with a child.

The various types of conservatism have their counterparts in liberalism. There is the liberalism that is little more than an instinctive recoil, an unintelligent protest, against the narrowness of conservatism. There is the liberalism that rather enjoys airing its doubts, cynicisms and criticisms, and that finds its chief satisfaction in shocking orthodox and conventional people. There is the liberalism that expresses itself in a sort of cultured quietude, that regards all intensity and fervor as undignified. Its interest in religion is rather theoretical and impersonal; it tends to regard any manifestation of concern about the salvation of others as bordering on a breach of good manners. There is a liberalism which confounds religion with politics and sociology. Noble in its aspirations, daring in its spirit, it is more concerned about reorganizing the environment of life than with the direct transformation of individuals; it is more concerned with social ideals than with personal experience.

But there is a liberalism which, in its roots, development, ideals and vision, is essentially and thoroughly evangelical. For such liberalism there are two profound facts,—the supremacy of God's grace, and the worth of the human soul. Christ and his gospel are the meeting place of divine grace and human need. The Bible is unique for its revelation of these great facts, but its purpose is to make these facts supreme, and not to obscure them, or in any way usurp their place in moral and spiritual challenge to the soul. Men are not saved by faith in the church, nor by acceptance of its creeds, nor are they saved by faith in the Bible, nor by faith in miracles, nor by faith in any fact about Christ, no matter how important; they are saved by the grace of God, through faith in Christ. "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." Faith is not a matter of opinion about some critical question; it is a matter of adherence to Christ. And Christ is the unique moral and spiritual fact, standing out from Scripture and from human history, the supreme, ultimate fact, the acceptance or rejection of which is decisive for character in the deepest depths of the soul and for all eternity.

To one who is at once thoroughly evangelical and truly liberal Christ stands in the gospels with direct challenge to man's reason, conscience and will. It is not primarily a matter of the date or authorship of the records, or of their accuracy in every detail. It is a question of the inherent worth of the personality, the ideal, the teaching, therein contained and revealed. The sermon on the mount as an interpretation of the true way of life stands or falls by what it is, apart from the question as to who uttered it, or how it was recorded. No miracle could make it more true, no authority could add to its compelling power. No conventional or "authoritative" interpretation can prevent men interpreting it for themselves. It is there with its essential challenge, and it will always be there, no matter what criticism says or does. And what is true concerning the sermon on the mount is true concerning the whole range of the gospel touching God, salvation and human relationships, as incarnated in Jesus of the New Testament.

Here is a teaching, says the modern minded evangelical, about God, life, character and destiny. Is it right, or is it wrong? Is it worthy of belief? Can it lead man to his supreme goal? The records of miracle, the comments, the interpretations, all may be for some minds sanctions rendering belief easier; or they may be for other minds obstacles to belief. But here is the ultimate question, Is the teaching itself wisdom or folly? Is it the highest that has come to man, or is it not? The evangelical liberal regards the gospel in and concerning Jesus of Nazareth, as a scientist might regard some great meteor fallen from the heavens. The scientist's attitude toward that meteor relates to what it is. He submits it to every known test that he may understand its nature and its meaning. His theory of its origin grows out of his knowledge of what it is, not vice versa. Evangelical liberalism finds in Jesus and his teaching the supreme moral challenge to man and the ultimate revelation of God's character and love. The test of the validity of this Gospel is not found in historical criticism, but in the human heart, and in the lives and experiences of men.

Jesus himself constantly appealed to this tribunal. He taught the fatherhood of God by appealing to human fatherhood. "Which of you, being a father. . . ?" And at the close of the great sermon-parable on brotherly love and human relationships he appealed even to a tricky lawyer for a verdict: "Which of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbor unto him who fell among the thieves?" Liberal evangelism would like to see the simple gospel of God's grace as revealed in Jesus brought in direct challenge to every living soul, and with opportunity for a verdict. Does

Jesus save? Does he offer a true way of life, and power to walk in that way? These are questions that do not depend for their answer upon any critical or speculative consideration. If the gospel challenge could be made so plain and simple we should not have to witness the sad spectacle of those whose hearts are devoid of Christlike love passing for "Christians" because they happen to profess belief in certain doctrines and historic facts, and the utter exclusion from discipleship of many who do not easily believe these things but whose hearts and lives respond to the Master's message and example.

Sane, reverent liberalism, therefore, instead of being indifferent to evangelism has a positive function to perform in clearing the decks for action, so that the full power of the gospel may sweep over men, unhindered and unobscured by any secondary thing. It is of minor importance, for instance, whether the whale actually swallowed Jonah or not, but it is profoundly important that the question of the historicity of that incident should not in any way be mixed up with the challenge of the gospel. And this is true regarding all matters of biblical and historical criticism. One's theory of the inspiration of the scriptures, questions of literalism, questions of miracle, are all upon a lower plane than the supreme question: What think ye of Christ?

Manifestly, to write in this vein invites the danger of misunderstanding, and there seem to be at every turn in Christian circles those who have a veritable genius for misunderstanding. "Liberalism denies the miracles," "Liberalism rejects the scriptures," "Liberalism ignores Calvary," "Liberalism does not believe in the resurrection," etc., etc.,—one hears the hubbub of slander and attack. The simple fact is that "liberalism" does none of these things. Individual liberals arrive at their own convictions on these matters; but the evangelical liberal, whatever his answer to secondary questions centres all on Christ. He believes in Jesus because of what he manifestly is, and because of what he clearly sets forth concerning God and man. He does not believe in Jesus because of the miracles, nor even because of the resurrection; on the contrary he finds it easier to believe in the miracles and in the resurrection because he believes in Jesus; and moreover evangelical liberalism declares that only those who have come face to face with the moral and spiritual challenge of Jesus are really competent to discuss and weigh such questions in the full light of love and truth.

There will always be those to whom belief in whatever is conventional and orthodox is easy; there will even be those who find a sort of spiritual pride in believing the impossible. There will also be those who will not be restrained from imposing their credulities and their shibboleths upon others. But one of the most significant facts of present day religious life is that there is an ever-increasing number of Christians, whose range of faith is narrower, but deeper and more intense, because they center it directly on Christ. To them Christianity means a far more profound and utter commitment to Christ than the dogmatic acceptance of him involves. They are jealous and tremendously concerned about the one great thing for which God cares, if what Jesus says about God is true,—the salvation of the world. It is this world of men which God loves and for which Jesus died. We shall never have the full power of this essential evangelism until men and women of modern liberal feeling undertake with passionate and united effort to lift Christ up from the earth above the mass of theories, dogmatisms and questionings with which his personality has been surrounded. In his moral and spiritual significance, in his revelation of salvation and spiritual power, Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day and forever. There is a timeless element in the gospel unaffected by details of historic fact, because it transcends such details, and this timeless element is the gospel of a gracious Saviour, bringing God's gift of eternal life.

The Pile of Fruit

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I ENTERED into one of the Restaurants of Fred Harvey, and I sat down at the Center Table. For the tables in that Restaurant stood around the room, but in the center was a large round Table. And on each of the smaller Tables there was a Basket of Fruit. But on the Center Table was there a large Pyramid of Delicious Fruit, of many kinds. There were Golden Oranges and Red Apples and Juicy Peaches and Yellow Bananas, and they had been piled Skillfully in the Middle of the Table so that their top reached far toward the Ceiling.

Now at the side Tables every man ate Fruit, as much as he liked. But at the Center Table no man took any.

And when I had eaten a good square Meal, I called the Waitress, and said unto her:

I want to spoil that Pretty Picture in the Middle of the Table.

And she said:

Good for thee! For we piled that Fruit Yesterday morning, and no man hath had courage to touch it. And Fruit in this Restaurant is placed upon the Tables to be eaten.

And I said, Get me that Big Orange from the Bottom Row, and a Big Red Apple from the middle on the Other Side, and a good Bunch of Grapes.

And when I had begun, then did every man at the Table take Fruit, and the Pyramid grew Smaller by Degrees and Beautifully Less.

Now there are men who stand off and fear to attack Life's larger possibilities of Joy and Usefulness. When Opportunity cometh in Smaller Baskets, then do they eat and are Measurably Satisfied. But Life's Great Privileges do men often permit to stand on the Middle of the Table, where they see them but fear to Taste, lest they bring down a Tower of Babel. But Life's Reasonable Joys, both small and Great, are to be Enjoyed as they come, and not to be Gazed upon from Afar.

Wherefore, improve thy Present Opportunity, whether of Service or of Sweet and Reasonable Joy. For the Baskets around the wall are thine, and also the Great Heaps where God hath gathered up Life's Fullness of Knowledge and Satisfaction and Friendship and Power.

Why the League Limps

By Jane Addams

A MEETING to consider the desperate emergency created by the Russian famine was called in Geneva, August 15, 1921, under the joint auspices of the International Red Cross and the League of Red Cross Societies to which our Woman's International League was able to send a representative almost directly from our Congress in Vienna.

There was every possibility for using the dire situation in Russia for political ends, both by the Soviet Government and by those offering relief. On the other hand, there was a chance that these millions of starving people, simply because their need was so colossal that any other agency would be pityfully inadequate, would receive help directly from many governments united in an international mission of good-will. It was a situation which might turn men's minds from war and from a disastrous peace to great and simple human issues; in such an enterprise the governments would "realize the failure of national coercive power for indispensable ends like food for the people," and would come to a cooperation born of the failure of force.

Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, appointed high commissioner at the Red Cross meeting in August, after a survey of the Russian famine regions, returned to Geneva for the opening of the assembly on September 5, in which he represented Norway, with a preliminary report of Russian conditions. He made a noble plea, which I was privileged to hear, that the delegates in the assembly should urge upon their governments national loans which should be adequate to furnish the gigantic sums necessary to relieve twenty-five million starving people.

NEW HOPE FOR THE LEAGUE

As I listened to this touching appeal on behalf of the helpless I was stirred to a new hope for the League. I believed that, although it may take years to popularize the principles of international cooperation, it is fair to remember that citizens of all the nations have already received much instruction in world-religions. To feed the hungry on an international scale might result not only in saving the League, but in that world-wide religious revival which, in spite of many predictions during and since the war, had as yet failed to come. It was evident in the meeting of the Assembly that Dr. Nansen had the powerful backing of the British delegates as well as others, and it was, therefore, a matter for unexpected as well as for bitter disappointment when his plea was finally denied. This denial was made at the very moment when the Russian peasants, in the center of the famine district, piously abstained from eating the seed grain and said to each other as they scattered it over the ground for their crop of "winter wheat," "We must sow the grain although we shall not live to see it sprout."

Did the delegates in the Assembly still retain the national grievances and animosities so paramount when the League of Nations was organized in Paris or were they dominated by a fear and hatred of Bolshevism and a panic lest the feeding of Russian peasants should in some wise aid the purposes of Lenine's government? Again I reflected that these men of the Assembly, as other men, were still held apart by hatred and fear, which could only be quenched by motives lying deeper than those responsible for nationalistic estrangements.

When the food challenge, put up so fairly and squarely to the Assembly of the League of Nations, received a negative vote the action revived the qualms and doubts many of us had unwillingly entertained during the first year of the League's existence. We had felt at times as if the governments must develop a new set of motives and of habits, certainly a new personnel, before they would be able to create a genuine international body. It was as if the governmental representatives were fumbling awkwardly at a new task for which their previous training in international relations had absolutely unfitted them.

SUPER-CAUTIOUS GOVERNMENTS

In a book entitled "International Government," put out by the Fabian Society, its author, Leonard Woolf, demonstrates the super-caution governments traditionally exhibit in regard to all foreign relationships, even when under the pressure of great human needs. The illustrations I remember most distinctly were the "International Diplomatic Conferences" following epidemics of cholera in Europe between 1851 and 1892. Five times these conferences, convened in haste and dread, adjourned without action, largely because each nation was afraid to delegate any power to another, lest national sovereignty be impaired. The last European epidemic of cholera broke out in 1892. Even then national prestige and other abstractions dear to the heart of the diplomat confined the quarantine regulations, signed by thirteen states, to ships passing through the Suez Canal, the governments hoping thus to provide a barrier against disease at the point where the streams of Pilgrim traffic and Asiatic trading crossed each other.

Mr. Woolf points out that if the state had any connection with the people, it was certainly of vital interest that cholera should not be allowed to spread into Europe; but that these genuine human interests were sacrificed to a so-called foreign policy, to "a reputation for finesse and diplomatic adroitness, confined to a tiny circle of government diplomats." In the meantime the pragmatic old world had gone on its way, and because there was developing a new sense of responsibility for public health, scientists and doctors from many nations had become organized into International Associations. In fact, there were so many of these that a "Permanent International Commission of the International Congresses of Medicine" was finally established. Such organizations were doing all sorts of things about cholera, while the governments under which they lived were afraid to act together because each so highly prized its national sovereignty.

NATIONALISM AND THE LEAGUE

Does something of this spirit, still surviving, inevitably tend to inhibit action among the representatives of the nations first collected under the auspices of the League of Nations, and will the League ever be able to depend upon nationalism even multiplied by forty-eight or sixty? Must not the League evoke a human motive transcending and yet embracing all particularist nationalisms, before it can function with validity?

To evoke these universal motives should have been all the easier in that first year after the war, because during the world war, literally millions of people had stumbled into a situation where "those great cloud banks of ancestral blindness weighing down upon human nature" seemed to have lifted for a moment and they became conscious of an unexpected sense of relief, as if they had returned to a state of primitive well-being. The old tribal sense of solidarity, of belonging to the whole, was enormously revived by the war when the strain of a common danger brought the members, not only of one nation, but of many nations, into a new realization of solidarity and of a primitive interdependence. In the various armies and later among the civilian populations, two of men's earliest instincts which had existed in age-long companionship became widely operative; the first might be called security from attack, the second security from starvation. Both of them originated in tribal habits and the two motives are still present in some form in all governments.

SECURITY FROM ATTACK

Throughout the war the first instinct was utilized to its fullest possibility by every device of propaganda when one nation after another was mobilizing for a "purely defensive war." The second, which might be called security from starvation became the foundation of the great organizations for feeding the armies and for conserving and distributing food supplies among civilian populations. The suggestion was inevitable that if the first could so dominate the world that ten million young men were ready to spend their lives in its assertion, surely something might be done with the second, also on an international scale, to remake destroyed civilization.

Throughout their period of service in the army, a multitude of young men experienced a primitive relief and healing because they had lost that sense of separateness, which many of them must have cordially detested, the consciousness that they were living differently from the mass of their fellows. As he came home, one returned soldier after another trying to explain why he found it hard to settle back into his previous life, expressed more or less coherently that he missed the sense of comradeship, of belonging to a mass of men. Doubtless the moment of attack, of danger shared in such wise that the life of each man was absolutely dependent upon his comrade's courage and steadfastness, were the moments of his highest consciousness of solidarity, but on the other hand he must have caught an expression of it at other times.

The soldier knew that as a mere incident to his great cause he was being fed and billeted, and the sharing of such fare as the army afforded in simple comradeship, doubtless also gave him a sense of unity. Although the returned men did not talk very freely of their experiences, one gradually confirmed what the newspapers and magazines were then reporting, that the returned soldiers were restless and unhappy. I remember one Sunday afternoon when Hull-House gave a reception to the members of the Hull-House

Band, who, with their leader, had been the nucleus of the 149th Field Artillery Band, serving in France and later in Coblenz, that the young men, obviously glad to be at home, were yet curiously ill-adjusted to the old conditions. They doubtless missed the enthusiasm of mass action, the unquestioning comradeship of identical aims which the war experiences had brought them.

FEEDING THE WORLD

Throughout the war something of the same enthusiasm had come to be developed in regard to feeding the world. It also became unnatural for an individual to stand outside of the wide-spread effort to avert starvation. He was overwhelmed with a sense of mal-adjustment, of positive wrongdoing if he stressed at that moment the slowly acquired and substitute virtue of self support, and he even found it difficult to urge the familiar excuse of family obligations, which had so long a time been considered adequate.

This combination of sub-conscious memories and a keen realization of present day needs overwhelmed many civilians when the grim necessity of feeding millions of soldiers and of relieving the bitter hunger of entire populations in remote countries, was constantly with them. The necessity for rationing stirred that comradeship which is expressed by a common table, and also healed a galling consciousness on the part of many people that they were consuming too much while fellow creatures were starving.

Did soldiers and civilians alike roll off a burden of conscious difference endured from ancestral days, even from simian groups which preceded the human tribes? In their earlier days men so lived that each member of the tribe shared such safety and food as were possible to the whole. Does the sense of burden endured since imply that in the break-up of the tribe and of the patriarchal family, human nature has lost something essential to its happiness? The great religious teachers may have attempted to restore it when they have preached the doctrine of sharing the life of the meanest and of renouncing all until the man at the bottom is fed.

OLD TRIBAL VIRTUES

For the moment, at least, two of the old tribal virtues were in the ascendancy and the fascination of exercising them was expressed equally by the Red Cross worker who felt as if she "had never really lived before" and actually dreaded to resume her pre-war existence, and the returned soldier who had discovered such a genuine comradeship that he pronounced the old college esprit de corps tame by contrast.

Human nature, in spite of its marvelous adaptability, has never quite fitted its back to the moral strain involved in the knowledge that fellow creatures are starving. In one generation this strain subsides to an uneasy sense of moral discomfort, in another rises to a consciousness of moral obliquity; it has lain at the basis of many religious communities and social experiments, and in our own generation is finding extreme expression in governmental communism. In the face of the widespread famine, following the devastation of war, it was inevitable that those political and social institutions which prevented the adequate production and distribution of food should be sharply challenged.

Hungry men asked themselves why such a situation should exist, when the world was capable of producing a sufficient food supply. We forgot not only that the world itself had been profoundly modified by the war, but that the minds which appraise it had also been repolarized as they were forced to look at life from the point of view of primitive human needs.

FIRST MONTHS OF PEACE

To different groups of men all over the world, therefore, the time had apparently now come to make certain that all human creatures should be insured against death by starvation. They did not so much follow the religious command as a primitive instinct to feed the hungry, although in a sense these economic experiments of our time are but the counterpart of the religious experiments of another age.

During the first months of so-called peace when everywhere in Europe the advantage shifted from the industrial town to the food-producing country, it seemed reasonable to believe that the existing governments, from their war experiences in the increased production and distribution of foods, might use the training of war to meet the great underlying demand reasonably and quickly. In point of fact, during the first year after the war, five European cabinets fell, due largely to the grinding poverty resulting from the prolonged war. Two of these governments fell avowedly over the sudden rise in the price of bread which had been subsidized and sold at a fraction of its cost.

The demand for food was recognized and acknowledged as in a great measure valid, but it was being met inadequately and in piece-meal fashion while a much needed change in the world's affairs threatened to occur, not under the direction of long established governments, but under the leadership of men driven desperate by hunger. As the war had demonstrated how much stronger is the instinct of self-defense than any motives for a purely private good, so one dreamed that the period of commercial depression following the war might make clear the necessity for an appeal to the much wider and profounder instinct responsible for conserving human life.

It is obvious that these demands could only be met adequately if the situation were treated on an international basis, the nations working together whole-heartedly to fulfil a world obligation.

The Press—Scorpion or Savior?*

By Edgar DeWitt Jones

"And they have tails like unto scorpions, and stings, and in their tails is their power to hurt men five months." Rev. 9:10.

NO living person can be sure as to the precise meaning of this strange and lurid passage in Revelation, save that the weird creature represents some grim destroyer which imperilled the early church. And that is enough to know, since it brings us into a bond of common experience and makes us part of the unending moving picture. Good and evil are age-old enemies; right and wrong have been contenders in the arena of time from the beginning. Upon this "three-league" canvas of the Apocalypse in vivid splashes of color is a picture of truth and error at war for supremacy, with truth triumphant. In this fragment of St. John's vision I find both topic and text for a sermon on the modern newspaper, its power for good and evil, particularly for evil.

Four great forces for the moulding of public opinion have long been recognized, to-wit—the pulpit, the school, the theater, and the press. A century ago the press was the least powerful of the four; today it is the most powerful. More influential is the press than the pulpit of a Savonarola, a Beecher or a Parker, and not even a Booth, a Salvini or a Jefferson could get so vast a hearing as does the modern newspaper. The educational value of the twentieth century press is comparable to a university, so varied and comprehensive are the contents of a single issue. Thus, unrivalled and conscious of power—possibly intoxicated by the knowledge of it—the modern newspaper is at once a marvel and a menace, a scorpion that stings and injures society; a saviour that preserves and fosters the qualities which make a nation great and enduring.

Ours is the age of the newspaper, and we are a nation of newspaper readers. This is the hey-day of the press, with genius, brilliance, wealth, and all that such a combination means, contributing to the authority and pre-eminence of the printed page. Newspaperdom is a fascinating realm. There is something distinctive in journalism. It has a charm and color all its own, a charm of which I am conscious every time I enter the home of a great paper. Three years of my life were spent in a publishing house. I confess to a liking for the smell of printers' ink and there is music to my ear in the staccato of the linotype and the roar of the presses, and as for the men who make our papers—the editors, reporters and correspondents—there are no finer or more likeable men in the world.

A SCORPION PRESS

There is a scorpion press—a type of newspaper that hurts men, women and little children; that injects poison into the mind and leaves a trail of hapless victims wherever its demoralizing sheets are read. Newspapers of this kind are purveyors of filth; they reek with the musk of society scandals and boudoir gossip. They specialize in what might be aptly called "lingerie" literature. They feature racy dialogues of the divorce courts; they invest lust with a halo, and array vice in alluring apparel. "Yellow" is not a strong enough word to describe such a paper; "scarlet" is a more fitting color for such filthy sheets, although the life they exploit so seductively is drab enough in the end, God knows, and the curtain that is finally rung down upon them is black.

Most decent families forbid a scandal-monger the privilege of their homes, even occasionally. Yet under the guise of a newspaper, a scandalous sheet is often a daily visitor, handled and read by old and young in the self-same homes that bar the tale-bearer and the cullumniator. The outrageous excesses to which some newspapers have recently gone in sordid details of vice would have been impossible ten years ago; only a world inoculated with war venom would permit such indecency as has been exploited in certain newspapers, and to a greater or lesser extent featured by all. A press that flaunts this kind of thing and specializes in it is a leprous press, and if visited with the condemnation it deserves would, after the fashion of the leper under the Mosaic law, be segregated, compelled to wear sack cloth, and at the approach of every uncontaminated person, be obliged to cry—"Unclean, unclean, unclean."

A PERIL TO INNOCENCE

What should be said of the newspaper that exploits innocence at the price of a publicity that imperils body and soul. What condemnation should be visited on a press that is absolutely conscienceless as to the by-products of certain kinds of feature articles. Scarcely a year ago, in one of the large cities of the land, a newspaper sent a reporter and a camera man to one of the high schools for "copy." The reporter secured an interview with half a dozen bright and pretty high school girls on the topic: "The kind of a man I would like to marry." Think of interviewing fifteen-year-old girls on such a topic for publication. These interviews, with the photographs of the young ladies, including their names and addresses, were featured in an early issue of the paper much to the indignation of the families concerned. Not only so, but at least one of the girls through such unwarranted publicity was subjected to the annoyance of a pernicious correspondent who took advantage of the information thus supplied. The fact that this incident was contrary to the general policy of the paper and that the affair was deeply regretted by the management affects only slightly the rebuke deserved and not at all the principle involved. A newspaper must not prey upon the innocence of children or youth, and a community which permits such a thing without rebuke is recreant to the core.

A scorpion press can work fearful havoc in the realm of racial, religious and class prejudices. A trouble-maker of flesh and blood, whether in a church, a bank, or a trade-union is dealt with summarily, first or last. Is there no way to control by moral suasion a press that delights in setting race over against race, nation against nation, religion against religion. Journals that thrive on anti-Jewish, anti-British, and anti-Japanese propaganda in so troubled an hour as this assume a frightful responsibility. When Dr. R. J. Campbell of London visited America some years ago he was asked, "What in your judgment is the greatest obstacle to the union of the churches?" His answer bordered on the sensational. Said he: "The denominational press." By this, of course, he meant a so-called kind of religious journalism that is in fact irreligious to the core, a journalism that delights in contention and strife, that separates and estranges the churches. By the same token, one of the greatest barriers to "a concert of nations" or any kind of international cooperation is a sectarian press which persists in harping on the ancient grudges, prodding the old animosities between races and nations, and often exaggerating them; thus feeding fat to the fires of hate and postponing the day of an enduring peace. The gospel of international goodwill deserves publicity and merits the publishing of the truth on the part of the newspapers far and wide; not the obscuring of conditions as they are, not the darkening of counsel nor the deliberate coloring of the news so as to favor a narrow nationalism or a racial hostility.

"Did Charity prevail, the press would prove A vehicle of virtue, truth and love."

A rancorous partisan press has the power to hurt men, not only for "five months" but for a life time, and to harrass and hinder policies upon which impends the welfare of millions. A bitter and biased partisan paper resembles a bigoted, sectarian pulpit and the consequences are much the same in both instances. The worst in man is appealed to; his prejudices are inflamed; he becomes increasingly narrow, bitter and exclusive. It is easier for him to hate, to become vindictive; harder for him to be just, generous and fair. A democratic or republican paper that persistently magnifies every virtue of its own party and every vice of the other party would be ridiculous were it not so dangerous. An intelligent party newspaper is an asset to a community; a cantankerous partisan journal always was a liability, but in this generation it is out of joint with the times, a relic of jungle journalism.

There is a newspaper in this country of noble lineage and rich traditions, possessing a staff of brilliant men, and owning a wide and influential constituency. Editorially the paper is partisan to the core whenever the personality of former president Woodrow Wilson is involved. In the nearly two years that I have read this paper I have never once seen a reference to Mr. Wilson that has not been contemptuous, belittling and prejudicial. Such partisanship is irrational. It is unfair and unjust. It is not good sportsmanship. Happily the partisan newspaper of the extreme type is obsolescent; it will be occasion for shouting when it is obsolete.

PRESS MUST BE FREE

A free and unmuzzled press is a necessity. Drastic legislation to curb freedom of speech or pen is not desirable save such as protect from libel and slander. George William Curtis said, "No abuse of a free press can be so great as the evil of its suppression." Newspapers like individuals are prone to confuse liberty with license. It is the province of law to set up barriers at those outposts of freedom beyond which it is not safe to go; it is the privilege and duty of the community to make it unprofitable for a newspaper or a person to persist in occupying the twilight zone where freedom shades off into license.

Newspapers must practice "a noble self restraint" for the sake of those ideals which make a people strong in the things that matter most.

Whether or not the press is scorpion or saviour, whether it hurt or heal, depends on public opinion. Just so long as the masses will tolerate a scarlet press, will buy the same with avidity and permit such a newspaper to come in the home regularly, just so long will a degenerate type of journalism flourish. What has become of the virtue of protest, the genius for rebuke, the voices that will not be stilled in time of trouble and season of peril. Society must have "entrails" in order to protest vigorously against corruptible tendencies in press or drama. Mr. Taft, during his Presidency, attended a theatrical performance in Washington in the course of which occurred a particularly salacious dialogue. The President arose at once and left the theater. That kind of a protest counts.

THE POWER OF PROTESTING

The morals of the press can rise no higher than the level of public opinion. The men and women who ride downtown on street car or bus are the people that the publishers of a newspaper respect more than the politician, the preacher or the professional reformer. The great army of men and women who make up a city, the multitudes who people store and shop and office and home—this mass or average mind is what the press watches and observes with care and caution. The parents of the average home have it within their power to shape the character of the newspaper that comes into the family circle. Stop buying the paper that caters to the low and the vicious; that is an effective weapon always. Protest against a peculiarly indecent piece of news or head-line with a call in person or letter to the editor. Such procedure, when it is intelligently done, is welcomed by thoughtful public servants and discerning managers of great and going concerns everywhere. On the whole, most persons are reluctant either to commend or to condemn a newspaper's policy, yet I doubt if there is a journal anywhere that has not a real interest in the opinion of the "inarticulate" public.

If society has suffered because of a venal and vicious press, society is also under everlasting gratitude to newspapers that have stood Gibraltar-like for honor, truth and justice. There are honorable names connected with the journalism of America who helped to make history and who, at tremendous personal sacrifice, threw the influence of their mighty pulpits against iniquity and corrupt office-holders. It may be truthfully said that no great cause has triumphed in the last fifty years that did not have in its support an unafraid and vigorous newspaper as champion.

There are five ideals which journalism cannot afford to disregard. The first of these is honesty; the second is truth; the third is justice; the fourth is magnanimity; and the fifth is love, which covers a multitude of sins, both of journalists and of preachers; and is the only panacea for the sins of society.

Since I began with a quotation from Revelation, let me close with another and a very different one from the same book. In the twenty-second chapter the seer beholds a river bearing the water of life, bright as crystal, and on this side of the river a tree of life bearing all manner of fruits and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations. "The leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations!" What an ideal for the press of America in this day when the gospel of reconciliation is so sorely needed. What an ideal, and how noble the symbolism, that the leaves of the newspapers which issue from the presses millions upon millions be for the healing of the battle-torn nations and a just and permanent peace. The reward of a peace-making press surpasses speculation.

What Japan Thinks of America's Christianity

By Paul Hutchinson

K. KAWAKAMI, the Japanese publicist, has recently edited a volume that professes to reveal "What Japan Thinks." It gives us westerners plenty of food for reflection from the opening article, in which the editor of the Seoul Press warns the youth of Japan to "beware the snares and pitfalls that are so cleverly set for them around the clay feet of the Goddess of Liberty," to the article copied from the Asian Review on "The 'White' Problem in Asia," in which the author declares "Asia as yet is unarmed and disarmed. But humanly speaking it cannot remain armless for an indefinite period. The day of reckoning is not far off."

The last article in the collection is a discussion by the editor of the Herald of Asia, the leading liberal weekly of Tokyo, of the question, "Can Japan Be Christianized?" The discussion (which leads to a negative answer) is concerned largely with an article that had previously appeared in another Japanese periodical, written by an "independent" Japanese preacher. This Japanese preacher, who became a Christian in 1878, holds that Japan will finally become Christian after what he calls "missionary Christianity" has disappeared.

The sentence that caught my eye, and sticks in my memory, is the one in which the non-Christian Japanese editor sums up the argument of the Japanese preacher. He tells how the foreign officials of the World's Sunday School Convention truckled to non-Christian Japanese politicians and men of wealth, and then writes: "The demoralization of religion is beyond description in America; but that is no reason why Japanese Christians should imitate American believers."

That is a comfortable judgment to come winging half way around a world and crack you in your self-esteem, isn't it?

But is it not easy to discover its foundation?

Are we not squarely up against a question that began to trouble the church as long ago as when III John was written? Are we not required once more to examine and revise our attitude toward wealth and position, especially within our own ranks?

To be sure, this may be but a surface outcropping of a deeper problem. Some may say that if we settle our attitude toward wealth in itself, the question of the rich man in our midst will solve itself. Theoretically, that may be true. But, as Grover Cleveland put it, we face a condition and not a theory. Can we convince men that we, as professed followers of Jesus, are not "demoralized beyond description" until we have made our relation to our wealthy and politically-powerful members sun-clear?

When you study it, you see that, while this may be a problem of detail, it is no surface problem. It is significant that our Lord, and our Lord's brother, and our Lord's most intimate follower, all faced this question of the rich man who would be in the ranks of the believers.

The problem of the rich man remains to plague us.

Unconsciously (let us hope) rich men have most of us bluffed. We may howl—as I am doing now—but when it comes to making up our boards it is astonishing how the possession of a million dollars makes a man competent to formulate our foreign mission policy or set the standards for our colleges.

Consider, in our local congregations, our presidents of boards of trustees, there by right of eminent subscriptions. Consider the censorship on pulpit utterances exercised by heavy contributions to the preacher's salary. Consider how much more rejoicing we are able to work up over one wealthy man who strokes his respectability by joining our ranks than over ninety and nine hungry men who come to us seeking permission to sleep in our pews.

And that influence runs out into our denominational life. Why is it that church colleges are apt to be so much more conservative than state institutions? A study of trustee boards may offer a hint as to the answer. To the credit of the churches be it said that they generally can dream dreams beyond their present financial power to realize. But it is tragic when, to make these dreams come true, they swallow gnats and camels alike to meet the prejudices of men with money.

SUBVERSION OF ETHICS

I have known good men, occupying high church position, to approach wealth designated for use in promoting a particular "ism" in such a manner that the administrators of that wealth thought they had a new convert. Yet the friends of those solicitors knew that their dissent was absolute. For the sake of money to be used in a worthy cause these church leaders were willing to connive at misunderstanding. So does wealth subvert our ethics.

It even reaches out to tell us what we are to preach. I do not now have in mind the obvious example of the Pittsburgh business men. Nor do I refer to the manner in which such an organization as the Interchurch World Movement used advertising obviously designed to convince the man of wealth that the church was on his side. (Verily, it had its reward.) No, I am thinking of this thing as it happens, almost unconsciously, all the time. A couple of weeks ago I heard a man tell a group of ministers that they had no business to talk of injustice in West Virginia, because some of the miners there made as much as $9 a day!

And the sole license for such admonition lay in the fact that the speaker held almost a corner on the manufacture of milk bottles.

The truth is that the idea of power given the church by its wealthy members is largely a fiction. The rich, save for cases so rare as to command attention, are not the liberal. They contribute little of spiritual strength. A recent campaign conducted in the church of which I am a member proved that by far the larger part of the financial power is supplied by those of moderate means. About all the rich man brings to the church is the conviction of the exploited part of the community that the church is a body devoted to the maintenance of the economic status quo.

THE FUTURE OF GREAT WEALTH

To be sure, wealth is on the down-grade just now. Despite the return to normalcy, it will not be many generations before such huge accumulations as we have known will be outlawed. A denominational college in the east announced a year or so ago the foundation of a chair to teach that a man's possessions are his own, to do with as he will. One can almost hear the derisive laughter of our great, great, great grandsons as they read that statement. Year by year we grow more accustomed to land taxes, inheritance taxes, income taxes, profit taxes, sales taxes, corporation taxes, and taxes by which the state asserts its right to condition practically everything we do from birth to death. The tradition of wealth in our present sense is on its way to extinction. The terrible thing is the probability that almost the last place in which wealth will retain its power and respectability will be within the Christian church.

A few weeks ago one of the most awakening preachers I know—a man whose congregations contain people of wealth—suggested in conversation that the salvation of the American church in this generation might come if, out of the labor movement, there should arise a group of distinctly labor churches. Perhaps he had Winnipeg in mind. Certainly he dreamed of a church in which the tradition of wealth had utterly no place. That is a hope worth developing at more length another time.

The only way to reform in such a matter as this is to reform. But isn't it high time to consider reform when a liberal Oriental editor, after watching our performance when in the presence of wealth and power, can remark: "The demoralization of religion is beyond description in America; but that is no reason why Japanese Christians should imitate American believers." Whew!

January

WE pause beside this door:
Thy year, O God, how shall we enter in? * * *
The footsteps of a Child
Sound close beside us. Listen, He will speak!
His birthday bells have hardly rung a week,
Yet has He trod the world's press undefiled.
"Enter through Me," He saith, "nor wander more;
For lo! I am the door."

The Social and the Mystical

By Laura H. Wild

SOME of us have been long since converted to the Christian program of social betterment, to the idea of community service, of international brotherhood, to a definition of democracy that makes Christ and the golden rule the center of conduct, to the kingdom of God on earth, to the transformation of society here and now according to the principles of the sermon on the mount. We have been preaching it and teaching it for years. We have been getting new visions of it, especially since the great war. We have been allying ourselves with science in all the new discoveries for the betterment of human life, with sociology for all the practical programs for remedying the ills of society. We have applied the teachings of the Old Testament prophets and of Jesus in the way modern scholarship has given warrant for an altruistic gospel of ethical behaviour and brotherly love. We have rejoiced at the increasing response to this gospel, and have agonized over the indifference to it of this materialistic age. The pulpit has stressed it increasingly until it is the main theme; the press has emphasized it until it is taken for granted.

But that is a partial gospel, and we know it. Now as always human souls are hungry for bread that is more than physical, for comfort that is more than temporary, for healing that is more than partial, for a life that is more than a livelihood, for education that is more than utilitarian; in a word, there is a hunger for the deeper satisfactions, for communion with God, for the exaltation of the spirit, for the fellowship of the pure in heart, for such poise of soul and body that neither disease, nor poverty, nor public opinion, nor sensitive nerves, nor high-brow intellectualism, nor vulgar materialism shall smother one's real self and leave at the end a defeated husk of a human being, not whole in any sense of the word. Now as always men are crying out for what faith alone can give, not belief, but that third member of the sisterhood of graces, faith. Now as always down deep in our souls we are demanding what we feel we have a right to demand, a soul-life rich, deep, high, god-like, immortal, triumphant. We know that that and that only will save the world from cynicism and despair, from superficial materialism, from hate and deadly destruction, from the very atrophy of the higher organs of our spiritual existence.

RELIEF FROM DOUBT

Many are seeking such relief from doubt of self, doubt of friends, doubt of husbands and wives and parents (the tragedy of home life), doubt of health, doubt of society, doubt of rulers and the makers and upholders of nations (the tragedy of nations), doubt of this world and the next—the corrosive doubt that brings on the disease of fear. Immortality? We must have it, and we must have faith in it, notwithstanding the fact that “among physical scientists only 50 per cent believe in it; biologists 37 per cent; historians 51 per cent; psychologists 19 per cent.”* This may be the demand of the bourgeoisie rather than of the “intellectuals,” but the demand is strong and insistent and it cuts straight across all class distinctions when human beings are in distress, distress such as the poet in the book of Jonah experienced when the waves and the billows passed over him, even to the quenching of his life, and the sea-weeds were wrapped about his head. Human need cries out for the unseen, something more substantial than this shell of a material world, for the spiritual and for immortality. This age we have been passing through has not been an age of faith, it has been an age of materialism, as we all grant, an age of rationalism, of skepticism as regards spiritual verities, an age that has suppressed spiritual flights of the soul. Many are seeking relief from their partial and thwarted lives because they have come to a desperate pass and know their need.

Some have found it in a philosophy of health and healing which has been a strange mixture of non-Christian elements, modern psychology and half-truths of science, with sometimes a little Christianity added. Some have stumbled on a restoring principle akin to the truth of Christian mysticism which has been kept alive through the centuries, breaking out here and there with the beautiful fruits of meditation and prayer. And science, notwithstanding the figures quoted above, is now standing more humbly than for many a decade before the realm of the unseen and the unknown. To become a member of the Psychic Research Society is not to risk one's reputation for sanity nor even for level-headedness. Communication with a world of spirit is not greeted now with utter skepticism. Even those who are still conventionally skeptical are dumbfounded often by the evidences of something which is happening to people in a psychic world.

SCIENCE AND POETRY

Ministers of repute declare that they believe before long there will be much less need of hospitals because the therapeutic power of faith will be better understood. Women whose lives would have been literally crushed by the tragedies of their experience have found happiness and power; men, super-sensitive and enthralled by ideas which bring them near to the border-land of insanity, have regained their equilibrium and a triumphant grasp of a wholesome existence; parents have been converted from sadness and grief over some lost in the war to happiness, helpfulness, and courage. However we may explain these phenomena they are facts increasingly numerous, facts which cannot be gainsaid. And could we know the inner lives of many quiet and humble folk we would find the list swelling beyond belief. This type of phenomena belongs to the realm of faith, it is allied to mysticism.

One of the remarkable indications of the spirit of the age is this paradox: In a time when we are so very practical in our religious life that social service is being stressed as the great saving truth for humanity, and when we are so very sensible and scientific that we demand a demonstration for all that we believe—in a time like this, mysticism, which is the poetry of religion, is breaking out in unmistakable forms, with many of the same phenomena apparent as were manifest in medieval and ancient times.

Generally speaking, at the present moment the people who are intensely interested in the social gospel are not particularly interested in the mystical gospel. Even where mystical symbolism and concern for social welfare are united there is often present an indifference to and but scant comprehension of the modern, scholarly, historical view of the Bible and of religious origins and development. For the most part those who are mystically inclined care very little for the scientific, documentary interpretation of Scripture. On the other hand, a scientifically trained historian is hindered in his belief in the reality of much of this mystical faith because its adherents pride themselves upon ignorance of matters of scholarship and stress what they call "devotional study" of the Bible. Again it is unfortunate that many such adherents are without good mental training, can not explain their experiences in terms that seem reasonable to a scholar, and fall back upon their faith alone as sufficient without the help of the intellect.

Some would say these forms of religious expression appeal to two different types of mind and temperament and would never attempt to bring them together. Possibly we have assumed this too long. The attitude of the "intellectuals" has been that of tolerance, of mild benevolence in being glad that suffering souls could find relief in any way, however deluded they might be rationally and really. This attitude can no longer reasonably be held. There is too much to it to justify such brushing aside of facts. Mysticism is here; it must be reckoned with. The church cannot any longer dismiss it in the condescending spirit of the old fashioned doctor who gave bread pills to a certain type of patient. Among these three vital modern expressions: interest in the kingdom of God on earth, interest in the unseen world, and interest in the accurate scientific knowledge of religion, some reconciling and correlating principle must be introduced.

OUR VARIOUS GOSPELS

The next phase of religious development upon which we are entering is the correlation of our various gospels, the social gospel and the mystical gospel, the historical gospel of reason and the gospel of faith. What then will happen? The historical, literary, sociological truths which scholars have discovered in the Bible will still be there; but they will be shot through with the mystical truths of a race which saw visions with the eyes of true seers. No longer will the "devotional" Bible student regard the "higher critic" as irreligious, or will scholars be merely tolerant of the extraordinary assertions of faith. The fascination of historical origins, of racial development, of growth of the God-consciousness will still be there as a background, but it will be enriched by the realization of the mystical realities seen and lived and transmitted by the truly inspired prophetic seers of the Bible. This is an entirely different kind of study from the sort that perceives what was never there, by reading back into Scripture dogmas of a later age. Moreover, miracles may still be rationally explained but there will be an upper level, a higher plane of explanation, than has sometimes been accorded. The controversies concerning the ethical and the mystical elements in different portions of Scripture, whether Jesus could be behind both the sermon on the mount and the gospel of John, whether Paul preached the same gospel as Jesus because Paul was a mystic and Jesus was an ethical prophet, whether the Old Testament prophets were anything more than social reformers, such questions, fascinating as they are, will seem petty when the great truth of an unseen world actually realized is again apprehended, not in idea only but as a present fact. The Bible will then once more become a holy book in the old sense of a peculiarly sacred revelation and guide, but with all the added force which the study of history and comparative religions has given it. Such Bible study has already begun.

NO PLACE FOR MEDITATION

And what will happen when one prays? Prayer will not be talking to God away off at the other end of an ocean cable. It will be communing with the divine presence. God will be here, not in our ideas only, not merely in the subtle influence of men's purified spirits as their own minds have conceived of lofty thoughts and inspiring projects. But the touch of the great Person upon human personalities will be such an immediate and direct contact that men will be energized, recreated, filled with power. And who can say what such life-giving power may do for sick bodies as well as for sick souls? Just to stop and imagine God's actual presence in the room close enough to speak to him, is sufficient to give us pause in this nervous, restless, hectic age in which we live. But when this is not imagined but experienced, something quite marvellous happens. There are great therapeutic possibilities in meditation and prayer.

Even in our halls of learning, where mind is supposed to hold sway, life today is rushing along at such a pace that for a student to sit down and think, commune with great ideas, with the great minds and saints of the past, is a comparatively rare occurrence. Our mental automobiles are rushing us through our studies, always with some activity at the other end calling more loudly than meditation. And if this is true in academic halls how much more in the world of affairs. Yet time to think results often in mere brooding, a most unhealthy practice, when the mind turns back upon itself and eats into its own life, unless some higher power possesses our thoughts. Then recreation and invigoration follow and only then. To arrive at God at the end of an idea is fine, but it is much more sanctifying to experience his Presence. All this sounds much like medieval mysticism. It is the same truth, but the difference today is that modern psychology, modern scientific understanding of the laws of health, of the reaction of mind on body, of telepathy, modern analogies from other spheres of action, add reasonableness to our faith, bringing together the trained mind and spiritual discernment.

And what about our "applied Christianity"? How much we have used this term of late! It has denoted everything from an employment bureau to a league of nations. It has built hospitals and endowed clinics, it has established soup kitchens and settlements, Y. M. C. A.'s and a Red Cross. It has even pried open the doors of the church for a seven-day program of service. It has come to mean the practical expression of the spirit of brotherly love. It has left its mark upon our hymn-books in the altruistic songs we sing. This is as it should be certainly. But applied Christianity means just as much as we have to apply. A doctor may apply a plaster or an electric current, he may even infuse into his patient another person's life-blood. We have had many good ideas and have devised many social programs and have applied them more or less to the sickness of society; we have given much of our own selves in a spirit of brotherly love. But supposing we should discover just above us a great reservoir of divine life waiting to be tapped in order to flush out all the putrid channels of modern civilization; certainly then our hope of a regenerated world would have more substance to it than our present faith in an idea seems to hold, however Christian that idea may be. It will be the faith of experience.

The next step in Christian progress is to be the coupling up of these very real, very modern, and seemingly paradoxical expressions of our religious life, the rational and the mystical, practical service and inner realization. When the connection is made, when the dynamo of group sympathy is set up, when the current begins to be felt, a new era of faith in the unseen will be here, a new realization of the divine Presence over and within this world. It will not mean a mystic withdrawal from the affairs of earthly life, it will not be an absorption in the things of the spirit to the exclusion of the reason. It will rather lift us up to a higher plane of knowledge and to the experience of a spiritual dynamic in every-day affairs which the matter-of-fact church of the present day sadly needs. The next step is such a correlation. The people who must establish it are those who see eye to eye, and they must make a place for it in the church.

Pekin: A Social Survey

IN THIS far-away occident, we usually think of China as a whole—a vast agglomeration of some 400,000,000 human beings determined for the most part to do only as their fathers have done. The break-up has taught us that no generalization for all China will hold, not even that of its being made up of yellow men, for there are still aboriginal tribes in remote sections, and the Mongol and the Indo-Chinaman are not much nearer each other than are the Turk and the Englishman, while the political divergences today are almost as marked as are those of the Balkan peoples. In other words, the Chinese are a race rather than a nation, yet they present the usual contradictory aspect that seems to us to characterize them in most things, a homogeneity as marked as is Europe's heterogeneity.

The late Arthur Smith, who spent forty years on the ground studying the Chinese, said there were no "facts" about China; that was a whimsical way of saying what is noted in the above paragraph. Of course, there are facts, but not many generalizations to be made, and in a recent book entitled, "Pekin: A Social Survey," we have a compendium of facts regarding one Chinese city. The same facts would not be found in Canton or Nankin and they would be very different out in Ching-tu; but underlying the differences there would be possible a large basis of common observation. The variation would perhaps be even greater than between New York and London or Rome, but there would be at least enough in common for us to call them "things Chinese," and when we know China as well as we know our white civilization we shall be better able to comprehend how great is the renaissance that is now taking place in that ancient land. Their revolution is no more comparable to ours of a century and a half ago than was our little section of democratic movement comprehensive of the western renaissance which preceded yet included it.

Making a Chinese Survey

To make a social survey is not an easy task, under any conditions. That was illustrated in the comparatively simple survey of rural churches made under the direction of the Interchurch movement. An American rural church would seem to present about as nearly a single-cell type of social structure as could be found. The organization is apparently as lacking in complexity as the single room "box-car" type of church building; there is a minimum of organization, usually no resident pastor, with worship on one Sunday per month and with a subscription list for finances. In this rural survey many hours were spent by experienced men in making out a schedule that would be adequate as a survey yet simple enough to be used by persons not trained in sociology. The result was a schedule with some 250 blank spaces to be filled out, and there was much difficulty in getting these filled by any except such as had submitted to a thorough drill in preparation.

When Mr. Gamble went to Peking to initiate the China survey he faced what must at first have seemed a well nigh insuperable task, but with the help of Mr. Burgess, who had been ten years there in Y. M. C. A. educational work, he was able so to enlist the services of missionaries, native pastors and youth who had been educated in America as to effect a very competent organization. The field was very complex and thus called for a variety of schedules, and no one, aside from a few of the missionaries, had had the least experience in survey work. In America many of us have at least heard of such things as surveys and all of us have submitted to the queries of the census taker, but in China the census is practically unknown and the very idea of submitting to inquiry is foreign to the average citizen. To have gathered so large a body of information as have Mr. Gamble and Mr. Burgess is a triumph of diplomacy and patience and sheer persistence.

Salient Facts

One is tempted in a review like this to tell, chapter by chapter, what is in the book, but that is impossible since there are more than 500 pages and every page is crowded with facts; nor is it fair, either to the writer or the reader, for the one gets only a bare outline and the other does not get his book read. A good review tells you what a book is about, makes an assessment of its worth and gives you a chance to know whether you wish to read it.

There are a few salient facts in this volume which our short space will allow to be presented. Peking is a city of 811,535 population and stands on an area of only a little over twenty-four square miles; Indianapolis, with a little over one-third that population, covers about five times that area. Thus you have a crowding of homes for the entire city like that of the congested areas in our larger urban centers. Since Pekin is the capital city there are many office holders, but the striking fact is that there are twenty "expectant officials" for every government position. The result is that these men, together with students and young men coming from the country to get into business, bring an excess of male over female population of almost two to one. This results in an aggravated state of affairs with regard both to recreation and the social evil. The theaters are crowded nightly with thousands of persons; there both the story-teller and the movie show thrive, with the movie usually presenting the poorest films America has to offer. The country folk of China have as high moral standards in regard to sex as any in the world, but when young men congregate in such numbers, away from home, having never been taught to hold women in chivalric esteem, as women, and with the officials and rich men notoriously possessing slaves and concubines, it is not strange that the social evil thrives. The police system is Germanic in its organization, and the social evil is French in its cast. Thus, an efficient police system grades and manages it, and students, aspiring candidates to office, young men at wage or salaried occupation, and, indeed, whosoever will, married or not, makes his own choice as to patronizing it, much as men once did in regard to the open, licensed saloon in America.

In business the small shop prevails and in manufacturing the guilds are predominant. The study made of the Chinese guilds in this recent work is alone worth the price of the book; it ought especially to challenge the attention of those interested in socialism of any variety. The outstanding civic fact in Pekin is that of the police organization. The police do everything from keeping order to censoring recreation, over-seeing health, managing the prisons and civic philanthropies, gathering statistics, directing traffic, supervising street cleaning and sanitation, and putting out fires. The police officers gave the authors of the book as much cooperation as could be expected for such a survey, and their records proved invaluable to the surveyors.

Marks of Progress

To list the activities of the Chinese Germanicized police system, and to compare its work with that done in a German city are, of course, two different things. But a description of its activities is a cause of wonderment to one who is accustomed to think of all things Chinese as medieval, and perhaps Chinese sanitation will evolve from its odors much more rapidly than did Cologne from its "seventy odd smells" of Coleridge's lines to our time when the name signifies all that is sweet to the nostrils. There are nearly 17,000 children in grade and higher schools, twice as large a percentage as in any other Chinese city, and some 48,000 young men and 7,000 young women in various educational institutions. All this is the result of missionary initiative, and the process of emerging from private and philanthropic management to civic presents an interesting example of evolution.

The study made by the authors of the church members of Pekin, one by one, forms one of the most interesting sections of the book, covering as it does their homes, incomes, education, vocation, etc., but space will not allow more than such mention as will invite interested persons to get the "Survey" and read it for themselves. The story of the new type of prison as over against the old is one of the most encouraging presented; some American states could copy it with profit. A great shaft of light shines across this capital city of the most populous and ancient of peoples, denoting its emergence from antiquity into the modern world. Back of it, but never in its "spot-light," stands the missionary.

This survey indicates what should be done in every city and community in civilization. A survey is, in social life, like the study of anatomy in relation to health—it reveals us to ourselves and enables us to realize more clearly that which we can and ought to become. The missionary cause and, indeed, the cause of civilization itself, is indebted to those workers who made this survey of Pekin.

London, December 27, 1921.

THE YEAR is on its death-bed. It seems like a penitent sinner, somewhat sorry for the past. And the year 1921, it must be admitted, has not borne a very high character. There is good enough reason for penitence, but why blame the year? It is we who ought to look back with sorrow. There is nothing good but the good will; there is nothing evil but the evil will and this is found not in things but in persons. There are signs, however, that we are disentangling ourselves from the evil of 1921. Never has there been in recent years more hope at Christmastide. It is not only voices within the church which "speak comfortably to Jerusalem." Without the sanctuary others are conscious of a change. Here is one saying out of many from what is called, for convenience, "the secular press": "We are convinced that the worst of the peace is over. We say the worst of the peace. The paradox has been in the fact, not in the words. Never for centuries, if at all, have moral chaos and anarchy, with the blindness of egotism and violence, been more widely spread on the earth. Discord, difficulty, distress, ranging from unemployment in Britain to famine in Russia, still make the actual world a sombre place. But they inspire the soul of charity and the vigor of relief. We are nearer the breaking of the clouds."

Revival in Scotland

For some months now a steady and powerful work has been wrought in the churches of Scotland under the leadership chiefly of the students in the colleges and the missionary committees of the churches. Into this work there has been put not only a passion for winning the souls of men but also much forethought and wise planning for the training of those who should be won in Christian vision and service. This movement has remained but little noticed outside of the church and even within the church many have not heard of it. But now among the fisher-folk of north Scotland there appears to have broken out the flame of revival and since its emotional accompaniments come within the definition of "news," the press is busy reporting them. Some are saying that it is a revival like to the Welsh revival of a few years ago; but they are surprised that it should be repeated in Scotland. How little such critics can know of the fisher-folk in Scotland. They have always been liable to such seasons of passionate revival. If indeed the papers are right and this is like the Welsh revival, it is to be hoped something will be done in time to make ready for the future when the first excitement is over. In the midst of the Welsh revival, Silvester Horne strongly counseled the Welsh to prepare, but they did not. And is there any Welshman who will claim that the revival was a solid gain in the religious life of his country? It might have been.

Once more the chance may come to seize an occasion and make it a permanent landmark in the kingdom of God. But not without hard thinking and courage and forethought! That is why for Scotland our hopes turn more to the campaigns of students and missionary enthusiasts, who have along with the passion for souls, an understanding of the kingdom of God and a vision of the service to which the saved of this age are called.

Did St. Paul Write the Pastoral Epistles?

The question has often been discussed in such a way that the reader is compelled to say, What does it matter? But Dr. Percy N. Harrison, who has just published "The Problem of the Pastoral Epistles" (Oxford University Press), shows that it does matter. There has been among many scholars a belief that the epistles as they stand are not in the words of the apostle himself, but that certain passages are Pauline and that the writer having these before him expanded them with his mind upon the needs of a later age in the history of the church. The problem is among the unsettled problems of the New Testament. Dr. Harrison some years ago set himself to do the spade-work necessary if this problem was to be re-opened from the beginning. He is a Congregational minister and most of his work has been done in the leisure hours of a minister's life. But for patient toil and for skilful arrangement and, if a friend may add, for disinterested love of truth, this work will take high rank. It is in a department of scholarship in which this country has been deplorably weak—New Testament introduction. (Dr. Moffatt is, of course, a great exception that proves the rule.) The conclusion to which Dr. Harrison is led is that there are Pauline elements but that the writer is a Paulinist of the early part of the second century. But while this is a belief largely held, it has been left to Dr. Harrison to trace out in detail what are the Pauline elements and to place them in the life of the apostle. He claims that through his investigation the apostle will be better understood and the authenticity of his other epistles will be set on a firmer basis. But the question which will interest others is how far, if this thesis is true—and Dr. Harrison would be the last to desire that it should be received blindly—the ecclesiastical arguments based on the pastoral epistles will have to be modified. Without doubt there is in them a picture of a church life, more systematized, more ordered according to a general scheme, nearer to the church as we know it when it appears after the sub-apostolic age. Now if this church arose in the time of the apostle, then an authority may be claimed for the divine sanction of the church development which is discerned there. It belongs, if that is the case, to the apostolic age itself. But what if it must be set down to a later date? Interesting questions from which more will follow!

Is Our Age Like the Apostolic?

May I pass on without comment the following comparison which is almost certainly the work of the Rev. C. F. Raven, a scholar of mark: "Even in their details the two epochs are singularly alike. Lucretius, like Wordsworth, had introduced a new age in poetry; Catullus and Shelley, Tennyson and Vergil, Ovid and Swinburne, Horace and (dare we suggest it?) Browning had carried on the succession. The state religion had grown effete, and the finer spirits were satisfied either with outward conformity and inward eclecticism or with a passionate search for some new thing among the fads and fancies of the east. For the poor (and social evil was as real as now) there was the cynic at the street corner, the type of the salvationist and the communist; for the soldiery there was Mithras as today there is a thinly Christianized Jehovah; for the emotional there was ritualism and the cultus—Cybele's festivals combining something of the fervor of revivalism with something of the pomp of a high mass; for the introspective and the sickly there were the dream-dæmons and the vigils in the shrine of Æsculapius, to which we would commend M. Coue and the psycho-analysts; for the sensuous and imaginative there was Isis or the mysteries, part seance, part miracle play; for the superior and the academic there were the stoics and the dregs of Platonism, the Ethical Church and Modernism and Christian Science; and for the practical person—Long live the British Empire, a pinch of incense to the genius of Cæsar!"

London Missionary Society and Its Policy

The account of the last board meeting of The London Missionary Society has received much attention in the press. As in other societies, so in this, there has been for some months a strong difference of judgment upon certain matters of policy. In two high schools in Bangalore, the practice has been introduced of opening school with prayers in which without being committed to a Christian confession all the students, Hindus and Mohammedans, as well as the small minority of Christians, can take part. After the opening prayer, thorough and admittedly Christian teaching is given. The directors of the school have drawn in this way a disinction between prayer and teaching. It is a difficult matter on which to decide. After a debate of singular elevation of tone the board agreed to institute a much-needed enquiry into the whole question of religious instruction and worship in Indian mission schools and hostels, and meanwhile to hold in abeyance its attitude to the two Bangalore schools and their policy; it neither condemned nor sanctioned the practice. The speech of Dr. Jowett, admirably expressed, seemed to sum up the growing feeling of the board; but before that Dr. Care of Chestnut College, himself a former missionary in South India, had deeply moved the board by the record of his experience. He did, moreover, a necessary thing, when he called the board to remember the difference between prayer and preaching. Prayer cannot be made propaganda. The meeting of the board will do much to restore the confidence of some of the society's friends. They had begun to wonder—for rumor is as busy within the church as without—whether the society had lost its early passion for the gospel of Christ. Nothing could be further from the facts. We desire nothing more than to go on with the work to which we are pledged. To reassure our friends a resolution was passed affirming the society's faith that in no other name than the name of Christ is there salvation.

And So Forth

Dr. Horton has been discussing the revolution which has taken place in Christian thought. All claims to personal regeneration are discounted today if they mean that people wash their hands of the world's problems, draw aside their garments from the world's defilement, and go into some comfortable corner of religious meditation and worship, leaving the poor stricken world to struggle for its own liberties. . . . Missionary societies have held in London some very successful united cinema demonstrations; more than 15,000 people have been present and there seem to be great possibilities in this new method. . . . Mr. Studdert Kennedy has been speaking more pungent words "There is only one glory—the glory of service and sacrifice. The men who were glorious in the war were those here and there who suffered, yet remained hopeful, bright and cheery. We have really changed our God. We have ceased bowing down before a crowned Person sitting on a great throne surrounded by peaceful singing angels. There is no such Person. He is dead—killed long ago. The God we worship is the God still suffering over the sorrows of humanity, the God with tears in his heart for the sorrows of this world—the God who is like Jesus Christ."

John's Gospel and Messianism

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue for January 5th under the heading "Dean Inge's Imagination," Mr. G. Williamson finds fault with the statement that the fourth gospel practically abandons messianism. Does he know that even conservative scholars admit that chapter twenty-one is an epilogue that may be from a different hand than the preceding twenty chapters? Goodspeed in his "Story of the New Testament" declares that the author of the fourth gospel shows that the return of Jesus has already taken place in the coming of his spirit into the hearts of his believers, and that he transforms the Jewish apocalyptic expectation into a spiritual experience. Mr. Williamson would find it difficult to quote any chapter except the doubtful one in support of his view. When a trinity or more of scholars of the rank of Goodspeed, Peake and Inge agree, an ordinary truth lover will do well not to be too certain of a contrary view.

If the genuineness of John 21 be admitted a fair statement would be: the second advent is no longer in the foreground with John, it has receded to the distant horizon.

Political Prisoners

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just read your editorial "Political Prisoners and the Christian Conscience," in the last number of The Christian Century. I happen to have seen the I. W. W. in flesh, and also lived and slept and ate and worked with them in the forests of Washington. Hence they are considerably more real to me than the "foreign devils."

I feel impelled to add a few words of corroboration of your statements in the editorial. I worked among the lumberjacks of that region just as one of them, without their having any suspicion that I was a minister of the gospel—at least they did not until I had had an opportunity to get their opinions and viewpoint without the prejudice and bias they would have had, had they known my position. Heretics? Pacifists? Yes, they were all that and more. Yet I found myself wishing that some Christian ministers had maintained as clear a vision of human brotherhood as they did during the war.

I must not allow myself to get started, else this letter would be several pages long before I could regain control of my wrath at the methods used by the government in opposing the I. W. W., and the indiscriminate way some ministers have damned them. I thank you for your editorial, giving them a chance to have their side considered.

A Barrage of Prayer!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: One of the truest Christian duties is to face facts frankly. The Armenian situation involves facts that are not pleasant to face, but must be taken as we find them today. These are, briefly:

1. Thousands of Armenians and other Christian people in Turkey are still in grave danger of massacre.
2. The situation in Cilicia particularly is critical in the extreme, because of the probable withdrawal of the French troops.
3. The western nations plead economic bankruptcy as their main excuse for non-intervention, oblivious to the moral bankruptcy which their course is bringing about, and which is worse.
4. Whatever the reasons real or fancied, in whatever ways principle is yielding to expediency, nothing is being done to check the Turks and save their victims, and in the judgment of America's leading politicians, nothing will be done nationally or internationally.

4. And yet, the atrocities that are still reported week after week cannot be ignored. As world citizens and world Christians, many Americans are chagrined at the impotence of governments in such a case. But there is a higher power not yet exhausted, hardly tried, the power of intercessory prayer. We read that "the prayers of the righteous avail much," and even our imperfect prayers must have weight with God, whose influence upon the lives of men is beyond all measuring.

Must we not, then, give ourselves earnestly and unitedly to prayer that the might of God may stay the hand of Turkish lust and cruelty; and that the love of God may touch the heart of Turkish hatred, and that the peace of God may come at last to those who have been faithful to Him through trials of fire and sword?

Theological theories to the winds! If there be power with God, let us pray for its release in a situation where all else has failed!

"For what are we better than sheep and goats . . .

If, knowing God, we lift not hands of prayer

Both for ourselves and those who call us friend? . . ."

Brethren, that God may turn our failure into success, that God may save where we have lost, that God may transform foes into friends in the love of Jesus Christ. Let us pray!

The Historical and the Ideal Christ

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In the pilgrimage of Rev. R. J. Campbell from the prophet to that of the safe and sane scribe, or at least the custodian of traditions, he arrives at the place where, in his article on "Christ and Criticism," he says:

"And so criticism has been forced upon this alternative: either Jesus was a being more than human as we understand humanity, or he is only an ideal; he never was a historical figure at all."

But is the alternative a necessity for 20th century Christians? Is there not a tertium quid,—a historical human personality filled with the spirit of the living God, whose life was so sublime that the legends and myths and wonder stories must grow! How else could humanity show its love and veneration than to grasp the stories, and believe with all its heart in a deity superhumanly manifested in Jesus of Nazareth? It would have been miraculous if the miracle stories had not soon grown up about this wonderful Saviour of men.

Mr. Campbell says in "The New Theology," which now he probably desires to forget:

"The beautiful legends surrounding the infancy of Gautama, for example, are startlingly similar to those contained in the first and third gospels. Like Jesus, the Buddhist Messiah is stated to have been of royal descent and was born of a virgin mother. At his birth a supernatural radiance illuminated the whole district, and a troop of heavenly beings sang the praises of the holy child. Later on a wise man, guided by special portents, recognized him as the long-expected and divinely appointed light-bringer and life-giver of mankind. When but a youth he was lost for a time and was found by his father in the midst of a circle of holy men, sunk in rapt contemplation of the great mystery of existence."

Modern scholars tell us that Buddhism is now divided in different beliefs, similar to Christianity. But shall we say that Gautama was either a being more than human, or only an ideal? I think we are not driven to the alternative. He was a wonderful light to his people who sat in darkness, but the beautiful legends of his origin had to come after his life, so sweet and gracious. How else could Asiatic humanity express itself?

Ghandi now in the days of science, is believed by some to have supernatural power, we are told. He can stop bullets, make cotton grow, and even causes limbs or arms to develop.

Shall we say this is impossible of this great Indian patriot, who is better known to his countrymen than Jesus was known to his?

We can affirm that this belief in superhuman qualities naturally follows the greatness of the life of Ghandi. But to say that Ghandi must be either an ideal, or a being more than human, is not according to real criticism, unless we believe in the authenticity, the scientific authenticity of the writers about Ghandi. The same rule applies to the other great Asiatics, Gautama and Jesus, Buddha and Christ.

I remember some years ago in a friendly argument I had with a prominent Buddhist concerning the religions. Our final stand was upon which produced the best life, Buddhism or Christianity.

In the light of modern history, kindled by the conflagration of the World War, we Christians should be rather humble, if such a thing is possible, and retrace our steps, for with the two great Protestant powers, Germany and England, exhibiting their savagery to the heathens, there may have been something lacking in the conception held by good Christian people of him who went about doing good. The world today needs the truth; let Mr. Campbell or any other teacher give his best. But let him speak with authority of life, not the unique authority of origins and traditions.

The Rheims Cathedral

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue of December 22, 1921, there is an article by the Rev. Alva W. Taylor entitled "Propaganda Poison," some statements in which seem to be without adequate basis in fact. I am a subscriber to your excellent magazine, and frequently find inspiration and food for thought in its pages, especially in the articles of Mr. Taylor. But it seems to me that in his pardonable zeal for the cause of peace and good-will, he is bending over backwards and calling black white. There is no doubt that during the war people in all lands have been the victims of false propaganda, and we shall all do well to rid ourselves of unjustified prejudice. But let us not in the overflowing kindness of our hearts, in the all-inclusiveness of our aspirations for a righteous world order, white-wash the Germans where a real, black, yawning, sepulchre exists. Concerning Mr. Taylor's statements in regard to the Belgian atrocities, I am unable to say one way or another, but with regard to the Rheims cathedral, I know from photographs and what trustworthy eye-witnesses have told me, that his statements are not true. Let me quote from his article:

"The Rheims' cathedral furnishes one of the most striking examples of the methods of war-propaganda . . . The striking thing is that in the midst of this wreckage (of the homes of this city) the two great towers of the grand old cathedral, the most conspicuous objects in the city, are about the only things not ruined . . . the grand old towers, visible for miles from the city, were never struck by a single high explosive, and only one, we are told, ever struck the cathedral itself. It, fortunately, did not explode. . . Much damage was done the cathedral and many a gorgon head is missing from the towers, but this all seems to have happened in the course of the general bombardment. . . It seems to the writer a much more heinous thing to destroy the homes of 130,00 people than to ruin the towers of any church, but it seemed to strike the public's sense of sacrilege, so it was played up to the utmost; the ruin of homes and the loss of lives came to pall upon us and no longer thrilled us with horror."

It seems to one who lived, as a young boy, in the shadow of those cathedral towers, and to whom every stone was a dear and mystic prayer, instinct with pure religion and undepleted, that modern religious reformers often lose all sense of continuity with the past, all sense of the symbolic value of tradition, in their zeal for "building all things new." Certainly no one with any real artistic feeling could help feeling intensely what a loss the present and future generations have suffered in the very real ruin of this glorious church. I am sure that Mr. Taylor would agree with a Socialist acquaintance of mine that the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, in New York City, is a "wicked waste" that makes him "hopping mad." But then, to some of us it is food for the soul, giving us a sense of God that no sermons of Mr. Taylor's could ever give. Allow me to quote from Miss Elizabeth Boyle O'Reilly's recent "How France Built Her Cathedrals," so very favorably reviewed in "The Churchman" and elsewhere, what actually happened at Rheims:

"In the first days of September, 1914, after the battle of the Marne, the Germans evacuated Rheims, which they had occupied for little over a week. Before they gutted the city, some cans of inflammable liquids, with bundles of straw, were set on the roof of the cathedral, and there they were found and made note of officially by Frenchmen who ascended the towers to hang out the Red Cross flag. The destruction of Rheims cathedral was planned deliberately and in cold blood it was carried out. No military excuse for the crime is possible, since General Joffre made a formal statement that at no time were the church towers used as posts of observation.

"From the heights a few miles away the enemy opened fire on the city. It is said that Baron von Plattenburg ordered the bombardment. General von Haeringen is also cited as an executioner of Rheims cathedral. On September 17th and 18th the church was riddled with projectiles. Between dawn and sunset, on September 19th, over five hundred of them struck the mammoth church. About four o'clock on the fateful day, Saturday, September 19, 1914, the timber roof caught fire from an inflammable bomb. In less than an hour flames were devouring the wooden scaffolding which, by ill luck, because of repairs in progress, framed part of the edifice. Fire lapped and calcined the outer walls, obliterating the kings and angels and the saints, wiping out all the loving handiwork of the old stone-cutters. Once again molten lead ran in the streets of Rheims. Fire lapped the sculptured screen inside the western doors, and the lovely lavish chiseling has become a blurred amorphous mass. Projectiles tore through the apertures of the vault's keystones and ignited the straw spread on the pavement for the wounded German soldiers who had been left behind when the invaders evacuated the city. (The French, at the risk of their lives, saved these wounded enemies). . .

"Poor martyred Rheims! Its once illuminated western front is tattered and corroded past restoring, and is falling flake by flake. With a touch of the finger the stone crumbles into dust. The towers are mutilated. . . No more will the triple winged seraphim chant hosannas in the great western rose. . . The sixteenth century windows in the clear-story are pulverized. . .

"Every check to the invader's troops in the trenches was immediately revenged on the defenseless church. 'Rheims Cathedral Bombed' became a typically recurrent line in the war's official bulletin. . . On July 5th eight shells crashed into the western entrances; and so on runs the sinister record."

I wish my pen might run on to give the whole terrible picture. All lovers of Gothic art should read it in Miss O'Reilly's admirably documented and humanly religious interpretations. The above description is but a bloody episode in a glorious story.

I feel that social Christians like Mr. Taylor have no appreciation for Catholicism and what it means to true believers—or unbelievers raised in the Catholic tradition. It is indeed a "heinous thing" to destroy so many homes in a city of kindly people. No one can palliate that wrong! The other artistic wounds of this historic city likewise are too many to be counted, irreparable. But the cathedral, the shrine of the Soul, every stone of which was pregnant with meaning, sacred with the association of centuries! Truly, "the public's sense of sacrilege" was well founded. It was spontaneous and universal. It did not require to be "played up to the utmost," and Mr. Taylor should remember that this destruction began in 1914 before "the loss of lives came to pall upon us and no longer thrilled us with horror." The blood of every individual shed in this war is indeed a wrong against heaven. To work for peace by rational methods is the only genuine atonement for the crime. But let us not call wrong—right or black—white! Let us not let our sense of social righteousness blind our sense of the value of religious tradition and art. Homes can be rebuilt, hearth-fires can be rebuilt, if any of the dispossessed families survive. A cathedral which has become the symbol of the soul of a people, which has acquired a vivid personality all its own, once destroyed, is irreplaceable. Let us mourn its loss with bowed heads, as for a dear and loved friend, not (almost) condone a murder.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

"Hast Thou Found me, O Mine Enemy?"*

PERHAPS when we have become sufficiently saturated with the triangled scenarios (two men and one woman or two women and one man) of the present day, some bright person will dramatize the stories of the Bible and in that day the cinema will come into its own. For sheer dramatic power these tales of the Bible have no equal. In the story today you have a beautiful and unscrupulous queen, a wicked but weak king and a rough, untamed prophet. You have the king coveting a vineyard, fretting because Naboth will not sell it to him, the plotting of a resourceful queen who stops at nothing, the death of poor Naboth on a trumped-up charge, the king, happy as a child with a new toy now, walking along the clustered rows of the newly acquired vineyard, the sudden meeting with the stern prophet, the curse upon the royal house and the prediction of a dire end.

Charged as this is with dramatic elements, we are particularly interested in the moral implications which travel with the narrative. The king could not be happy in his palace because that particular vineyard was not his own. Naboth had his rights but Ahab respected them not. This vineyard had been handed down from father to son. It had been most carefully tended. Every vine was known and loved and the clusters hung heavy upon the trellis. "Thou shalt not covet" was written into the Hebrew experience. To want something that belongs to another so badly that you will do wrong to obtain that thing is covetousness. This was the sin of Ahab, shared by his wicked wife. While Ahab was weak and petulant, refusing to eat, casting out the musicians, his brow dark with hate and misery, Jezebel is the one who acts. "Infirm of purpose, give me the daggers," we almost seem to hear her say. Pitiable queens both—Jezebel and Lady Macbeth. To hire perjurers and assassins was the work of an hour, and soon simple, honest, trusting old Naboth was being stoned to his death. Then came the queen with smiles to her husband. "Come," she said, "Naboth is dead; rise up and take possession of the beautiful vineyard." Modern psychologists are telling us that the average man has a mentality of about fourteen. Ahab was such a boy. He is happy, he walks out into the sunshine and makes straight for the coveted vineyard. How charming it is upon the hillside; how warmly the sun rests upon it; how green the foliage and how purple the grapes; what wine it will make; how complete the view now from the palace window—all—all his very own. Thus he walks and thus he communes with himself. But now, all of a sudden, a dark, rough, hateful man darkens the row ahead. Now he fronts him. God in heaven—it is Elijah of all men—the prophet—the man who insists upon morality—the man who speaks for God—and now he faces him silently—sternly—relentlessly. "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" cried Ahab, and O what a world of passion, fear, cringing, defeat, punishment lurks in those words! Then the prophet's answer, see it written in golden letters upon the screen: "I have found thee, because thou hast sold thyself to do that which is evil in the sight of Jehovah." It is like the voice of relentless fate. It is the crack of doom. It is the omen of death. Ahab does not need to be told that his days are numbered and that the dogs will lick his blood by the city wall, by the palace window—that same window from which he had gazed longingly at the forbidden vineyard.

"Be sure your sin will find you out"—how this narrative strikes terror to our very marrow! It is the story of all human life. Was there ever a hidden sin which was not shrieked from the housetops? Was there ever a flaw but the X-Ray brought it out into the sight of men? "There is nothing hidden but shall be revealed." Murder will out. Lady Macbeth will walk rubbing her little hands, moaning and wailing, while others look on. Jezebel will perish miserably—hated, loathed; dogs will lick her blood by the wall. Sin is a fearful thing, it blasts careers, it contaminates the blood, it ruins children, it devastates society, it destroys every beautiful thing. Is the prophet the enemy? Why call God's servant the enemy? Had Ahab followed the teachings of the great prophet he might have gone down in history as a noble king, had Jezebel consecrated her mighty talents to good she could have led her people into beautiful paths and deserved their love and good-will. And yet we will not learn—all history is against our sinning and yet we sin. Experience is a dear teacher but fools will learn no other way. We all pay the tuition—and the penalties. Some day as sure as God the stern voice will say, "I have found thee."

JOHN R. EWERS

The Meaning of Paul For Today

BY PROF. C. R. DODD

"Here is real insight, not only into the experience of St. Paul, but into the depth of the Christian gospel, with its 'strange power which men call weakness.' Hence his vision, one of the most radiant that has glorified religious history, of the possibility of the universal redemption of man by mystical union with God in Christ—a vision the depth and meaning of which we have not yet fathomed. The interpretation of this vision in his technique, in his philosophy of history, in his enlarging experience, is followed out by Dr. Dodd with consummate insight and suggestiveness. Its meaning for today is so obviously significant and far-reaching, at once so inspiring and rebuking, that it need hardly be pointed out. Jesus shall reign, inevitably, but it will be the conquest of Love."

Such is The Christian Century's editorial comment upon Professor Dodd's new book, which bids fair to be read by many thousands of thoughtful ministers and other Bible students during the year. A most successful attempt is here made to read in frankly modern terms the permanent message of Paul to the world.

Price of the book $2.00, plus 10 cents postage.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Union Seminary Men Preach Internationalism

The students of Union Theological Seminary are so much in earnest in the cause of Christian internationalism that they recently conceived the idea of sending out teams of speakers to the churches to interpret this idea. They petitioned the faculty for special instruction for such teamwork, and their petition met with prompt response, some of the finest experts in New York giving their time to such instruction. At the present time seventy-five churches have been reached. These students believe that the years of student life should be years of testimony as well.

Sacramental Wine and Sacrilegious Wine

The evangelical churches have long since adopted the use of unfermented wine in the communion service. The prohibition law provides, however, for the use of fermented wine in those religious societies which still cling to that custom. As only the priest takes the wine in Catholic churches, the amount needed there would be very small. The Jews have a committee at work at the present time to prevent the use of sacramental wine serving as a cloak for bootlegging operations among their people. Recently the wets worked up a big newspaper scare, representing that the Anti-saloon League was going to fight for the abolition of sacramental wine of the fermented sort. This has been officially denied by the Anti-saloon League, which at the time of its organization had among its officers some noteworthy Catholic ecclesiastics.

Lay School of Religious Education

Auburn Theological Seminary, a Presbyterian foundation with more than a hundred years of history, has the past year inaugurated a new feature in its day school of religious education. The faculty and trustees feel that it is not enough to train ministers; it is believed necessary also to have trained lay workers. A very commodious building has been secured on the campus, and students are allowed to board in the seminary clubhouse. Expenses are low, and married students are glad to have their wives given an opportunity for study. Prof. Edward P. St. John, formerly of Hartford Seminary, and well known as one of the early authorities on stories and story-telling, is the new dean. He is planning a very comprehensive program of instruction. The summer course this year will extend from July 21 to August 13. Rev. Kenneth B. Bowen was recently secured to teach the principles of religious education at this session.

Sunday School Convention in Argentina

The methods of the American Sunday school are now sufficiently standardized in Argentina to make practicable the holding of a national Sunday school convention there. Some of the delegates to this recent convention traveled eight hundred miles to reach the meeting. There are now 110 Sunday schools in Buenos Aires, and four of these participated in a model program on the Sunday morning of the convention. At this session 1,400 persons were in attendance. These delegates to the convention for the most part slept in tents which were loaned by the Y. M. C. A. in order to lessen the cost of the trip to those attending.

Patriarch Is Welcomed to Philadelphia

Patriarch Melitios of the Orthodox communion of the east visited Philadelphia recently. While there Bishop Rhinelander held service at the Church of the Holy Trinity, which was attended by many ecclesiastics of the Orthodox and Episcopal communions. The Patriarch in his address deplored the divisions of christendom and declared that in the Anglican church his people found a sister church.

Christian Endeavor Gains in Southland

E. P. Gates, secretary of the Christian Endeavor Union, reports that in the state of Louisiana there has been a twenty-two per cent increase in the number of Christian Endeavor societies during the past year. Helpful activities are reported from various cities in the country. In Worcester, Mass., the young people provide religious services at the public institutions of the city and this service is much appreciated by the inmates. During the past year fifty-one new societies were organized in Oklahoma. In the program of the junior societies rapid changes are being made to conform the program to the findings of religious education experts.

Virginia Church Dedicates New Hymn Books

The dedication of church buildings is a fixed custom, but the dedication of hymn books sounds like an innovation. First Christian church of Lynchburg, Va., recently installed Hymns of the United Church. The pastor, Rev. C. B. Reynolds, wrote a dedicatory service for the book, and on the day when the hymnal was first used this service was participated in by the pastor and people. Following this there was a service of praise and song conducted from the new hymn book.

American Mission to the Lepers

The abolition of leprosy from the entire world is the ambitious project of the American Mission to Lepers, an interdenominational project. This society reports that there are two million lepers in the world. The disease is by no means confined to the orient, more than one thousand of these sufferers being found in our own country. Three cases were discovered recently in New Jersey. The society carries creature comforts to the sufferers in various parts of the world, cooperating with denominational missionaries. The gospel is preached to

Are Theological Seminaries Disintegrating?

ARE the theological seminaries of America disintegrating? Is the number of theological candidates really less, and are they of poorer quality? Over these questions a merry war has been waged for many months. Conrad Henry Moehlman has recently published in the Record the most exhaustive survey of the field yet given to the public. He shows that in 1916 there were 12,051 students in institutions reporting to the government, and that in 1918 this number had decreased to 9,334, representing a loss of 2,697 students. In the same period the attendance at the law schools of the country decreased 56 per cent; medical students, 6 per cent; dental students, 22 per cent; pharmacy students, 33 per cent. The college graduates of the country in that period declined 13 per cent. It is evident that all educational processes lagged, particularly the training of professional men in graduate courses. Mr. Moehlman has made a series of graphs to indicate the total number of theological students in the country each year since 1870 up to 1915. In that period the Protestant students have increased from 2,499 to a high mark of 9,125. From 1890 to 1900 the number was almost stationary, and from 1900 to 1905 there was a loss. The ten years from 1905 to 1915 represents the period of largest growth in the theological student body of any in the entire history. Then the war brought a reaction. It is interesting to note that Roman Catholic theological institutions fell off from 1900 to 1905 just as Protestant institutions did. The statistics indicate that the falling off in Protestant enrollment is largely among the short course men, a fact that would hardly have been guessed by the various observers. Since many of the theological schools take only graduates and the process of making college graduates has been slowed up, it will take theological schools longer to get back to normalcy than it has the liberal arts colleges. Meanwhile Mr. Moehlman asserts that it is not the business of the theological seminaries to turn out enough men to man every little struggling church. A lot of competing churches ought to go out of business and then there would be enough men of good ability and training to minister to the country.

lepers, and the untainted children of the lepers are isolated and educated. Treatment is given to the lepers, and it is now confidently asserted that in its earlier stages the disease is curable. Chamulgra oil is regarded as the specific. Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston recently became chairman of the Chicago committee.

"Reds" and Presbyterians Compete in Lumber Country

Jack McCall, who is employed by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions in the lumber country as a missionary among lumber-jacks, was himself a lumber-jack at one time. He is now visiting eastern churches and interpreting his task to that section of the country. The Presbyterian denomination is the only one that works in the lumber country. Their missionaries now total twenty-one in number. They are opposed by fifty "red" propagandists in the pay of the I. W. W., who preach secularism and revolution. A total population of 150,000 is to be found in the lumber country of the northwest, and for the country over the industry employs a half million men. The I. W. W. expends $53,000 for propaganda in Spokane alone, which fact indicates their evaluation of this particular group of men as a field for revolutionary propaganda.

New York Protestants Resent Discriminations

New York Protestants have reacted against the policy of their city government in making religious discriminations against guests in the city. The freedom of the city was conferred upon De Valera and other Irish Sinn Feiners, but it came near being denied the Prince of Wales. In view of these and other disturbing facts, Dr. Walter Laidlaw has drawn up some statistical figures on the relative strength of Catholicism and Protestantism in America. The Protestant population constitutes 72 per cent, as over against a Catholic population of 15.5 per cent. From 1906 to 1916, the period covered by government census figures, the Catholics had a growth of 10.6 per cent, while the various Protestant bodies grew from 17.4 to 28.2 per cent. Analyzing the sources of Catholic growth, Dr. Laidlaw points out that in the ten years the English speaking Catholic churches grew only 1.5 per cent, while the foreign speaking churches grew 22.1 per cent, indicating that the growth of Catholicism is due to immigration from Catholic countries.

A Fundamentalist Found Guilty of Heresy

When the spirit of heresy-hunting fills a denomination, the suspicion of unsoundness sometimes falls in unexpected places. The Baptist Fundamentalists in Des Moines adopted a creed which contains a definition of the church universal. It reads: "We believe in the church—a living spiritual body of which Christ is the head and of which all regenerate people are members." Dr. Frank Goodchild is understood to have been the author of this article, and he is now under attack by the Word and Way, a Baptist newspaper, which insists that the new testament teaches no doctrine of a universal church, but only of independent ecclesæ which have their validity from sound doctrine and correct ordinances. Dr. Goodchild has made room in the church for homeless pederbaptists, but the Word and Way will have none of this loose and lavender liberalism.

Disciples Divinity House Presents Annual Report

Dean W. E. Garrison of the Disciples Divinity House of Chicago has recently published his annual report in which the work for 1921 is summarized. He reports that during the year sixty-five students have taken the courses offered by the house in addition to their studies at the University of Chicago. In addition, the house affords a social center for 150 Disciple students at the university not pursuing theological studies. The loan library of the house has been in use the past year, and this service will be enlarged just as rapidly as funds will permit. The books are mailed out to ministers with no charge except for postage.

Southern Presbyterians Will Raise Money

Not at all daunted by economic conditions, the southern Presbyterians are planning to put on two big financial campaigns the coming year. An equipment fund of five million dollars will be raised by securing fifty thousand pledges of one hundred dollars each; $2,700,000 of this money will be spent on foreign fields while the remainder will be used in home missions and Christian education. Following this will come a campaign for $4,500,000 which will go to increase the work of the various boards. One-third of this total will be spent in foreign missions. The team workers are now in the weaker presbyteries building up the organization and getting ready for the big drives.

Missionary Does Not Favor Ghandi

Rev. Frederick C. Cowan, writing to a friend from India recently, gave his impression of Ghandi and the movement of non-cooperation. He thinks that Ghandi's movement tends to let loose the evil forces of racial hatred and anarchy. Speaking of the British government, this American missionary says: "One cannot judge India until he has been here and seen it, and then alone can he appreciate the magnificent and wonderful work Great Britain has done against terrible odds. Think of the different elements here, the different castes, nationalities, religions, and then now she, steering clear of all the shoals, has done what she has. She has by great irrigation works reclaimed millions of acres and made the desert blossom as a rose. She has by means of a vast network of railways and splendid macademized roads made all parts of the country accessible, and travel cheap. She has by her colleges, universities and schools educated millions who are occupying positions of trust and making a good living, and she has, finally, by a just and righteous government, that respects every man's religion and faith, kept order and maintained peace. Those who picture her as simply exploiting India for their own benefit do her great wrong. Of course, she has to levy taxes and make enough to run such a great system."

Making New Religions All the Time

Those who have scanned recent census reports of religious bodies report that the past two years has been the period of greatest unrest in the religious world known in a century. Many religious bodies have been born in the large cities, usually made up of women with women leaders. Though abusive of orthodox religion, most of them retain certain Christian elements, but offer some new revelation along with the old. The cities where religions are made are Boston, New York, Chicago and Los Angeles.

Chaplain Is an Aggressive Christian Worker

The new type of chaplain is an aggressive Christian worker, rather than a mere stool-warmer. One hears of many excellent things done by these men both in and out of army service. Chaplain Frank C. Rideout of Fort Leavenworth is known for his evangelistic interest. He recently conducted a series of evangelistic meetings in Argentine Baptist church of Kansas City with a constantly increasing interest. The chaplain refused any compensation for the work in the Kansas City church, and every day returned for his usual round of duties at the fort.

Religious Life at the State University

The attack being made upon colleges and universities this winter by reactionary theologians is very bitter. In Wisconsin the fight has been most determined, and a college president is said to be going up and down the state attacking two science professors of the University of Wisconsin. President Birge of the university has denied emphatically that the atmosphere of the campus is hostile to religion. As a matter of fact few denominational universities have so well organized a religious program as that at the University of Wisconsin. The Campus Religious Council is made up of a pastor, a professor and five students from each of the following organizations: Baptist church, Congregational church, Episcopal church, Evangelical church, Jewish Students' Association, Lutheran church, Methodist church, Presbyterian church, Reformed church, Unitarian society, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. Each year this religious group brings to the university some of the most eminent religious leaders of the nation. Men of all faith come to the campus to exalt spiritual idealism. In addition the Christian associations undertake to commend religion to the students through speakers, interviews and discussion clubs. Many of the denominations employ religious workers who do nothing but work among the students. A total of twenty-one workers devote all their time to the religious welfare of students, one-half of them being ordained clergymen. The aggregate expenditure on the religious work about the university is about $50,000 annually. This work has been considered so important that one after another of the cooperating religious organizations has built up around the campus imposing community houses and churches. The total investment in lands, building and endowments for this purpose totals $400,000. While religion cannot be taught in university classrooms, large numbers of the students do take up the study of religious subjects. Thirty-one different courses in religious subjects are offered on the edge of the campus this year. Among these are the Life of Christ, the Bible and Our Civilization, Science and Religion, Social Christianity and Religious Pedagogy.

Preacher Advertises for Sermon Subjects

Advertising for a sermon subject is the latest novelty in homiletic practice. Rev. Byron Hester of Electra, Texas, has inserted an ad in the town paper in which a coupon can be returned to the minister. The people who have difficulties with religion are invited to send in their doubts, their difficult passages of scripture and their challenges. One line of the coupon states "I believe that

Christian Educators Meet in Chicago

THE Council of Church Boards of Education met in Chicago January 9 and 10. Following this meeting many denominational boards of education held their annual sessions to plan their denominational work. Prominent in the personnel of the interdenominational group is Dr. Robert L. Kelley, the executive secretary, a member of the Methodists denomination who in his sympathies combines the cultural and the religious. Dr. E. P. Hill, the treasurer, is a Presbyterian who formerly taught in McCormick Theological Seminary. The outstanding financial leader of the colleges is Dr. John W. Hancher, councillor in finance of the Methodist Episcopal Board of Education, who has just finished raising $1,500,000 for Nebraska Wesleyan. It is said that he has raised more money for Christian education in the small colleges than any other Christian leader of this day.

The meeting of these educators divides sharply into two groups on a great many questions. The religious workers in state universities form one group which naturally believes strongly in the possibility of the state university as a center where Christian workers may be trained. The advocates of the small college emphasize the alleged superior moral environment of the Christian college, and the greater amount of individual attention given by teachers to students in these institutions.

At the meeting last year, the outstanding statistical study of the year was the survey of Congregational colleges. This year an even more comprehensive study of Disciples institutions has been carried on by Dr. Kelley and his statistical tables and charts would easily fill a large book. Beginning with a brief study of denominational history, the survey takes account of the educational competency of the different schools. Dr. Kelley divides the Disciples schools into three groups educationally: those which have arrived, those which are about to arrive, and those that probably will never arrive. In his study the names of these schools were given, with a solemn warning to the schools of the third group.

When asked to summarize his impressions of the Disciples schools, Dr. Kelley declared that Disciples colleges are unique among Christian schools in the place given the Bible in the curriculum. In a few schools the study of the Bible exceeded that of any other subject; in the average school only English literature occupied more time. It was exceptional for Bible study to fall below second place in any of these schools. He explained this emphasis upon Bible study as due to the original impulse given to education among the Disciples by Alexander Campbell, who insisted on making the Bible the sole source of doctrine and discipline.

Dr. Kelley expressed disappointment with the fact that the higher the standard of a Disciples college educationally the lower the amount of Bible study, but expressed the conviction that the Bible study in the poorer schools "was little better than Sunday school work." He asserted that fewer courses taught in a thorough manner would have a deeper influence upon the students.

Dr. Kelley, in one of the discussions relative to the source from which student volunteers come, asserted that one-fifth of the student volunteers at the present time are coming from Methodist colleges. He had no statistics on the contribution of the state universities to the recruiting of this force. Disciples statistics show the state university as an increasingly important factor in furnishing personnel for Christian work beyond the seas.

A conference of church workers in universities was held immediately following the session of the Council of Churches Boards of Education. In this conference the workers discussed once more the question of the housing of university students, some opposing separate denominational housing and others favoring it.

Among the surveys now in progress for future report, is one dealing with theological seminaries. In this survey the statisticians will not only provide figures but also personal impressions from visits made to the classrooms.

preachers are afraid to preach on (blank)." The minister hopes in this way to diagnose the problems and difficulties of the people who stay at home and fail to cooperate with the churches.

Philadelphia Federation
Functions Successfully

Philadelphia is not a slow town in things religious, whatever reputation it may acquire otherwise. Strong churches which dominate the community are a recognized feature of the community life. These churches are coming into increased influence through their cooperation in a city federation. Rev. E. A. E. Palmquist came to Philadelphia from Boston as the federation leader some time ago and his work is being strongly commended by Philadelphia clergymen.

committee on cooperation with the courts has a plan to receive delinquent girls that pass through the courts, and care for them in an institution. The committee on law and order has recently taken over the work of the Philadelphia Antivice Society.

Denominational Schools and the Young People

The old-time plea of supporting denominational schools for the sake of the young people of a given denomination is now largely passé for the young people insist on following fancy in the choice of a school. Only thirty-five per cent of the students of Northwestern University, the largest midwest institution of the Methodists are followers of John Wesley. The Baptists are outnumbered by several sects at the University of Chicago. The Presbyterians are outnumbered by several denominations at Illinois College. Meanwhile the religious leadership in these denominational universities is mostly confined to the denomination giving auspices to the institution. There is lacking the fine interdenominational cooperation in the care of students which one finds at the state universities, where one often finds a larger per cent of students going to church than at the denominational schools.

Disciples Mission Work Grows

The Disciples are the youngest of the great evangelical bodies of America, and they did not organize their foreign missionary work until 1872. In spite of this late start they now have 324 missionaries and 1,500 native workers in various parts of the world. Enrolled in the foreign Sunday schools are 25,812 pupils. Last year 3,025 converts were baptized into the faith.

World Friendship Bureau Has Unique Methods

The World Friendship Information Bureau and Clearing House of Chicago has some unique methods. World Friendship seals are being sold which can be attached to letters. A disarmament song has been written for the society and is now being sold in quantities as a leaf to be attached to hymn books and to be used in other ways. On New Year's eve the Westinghouse radio telephone distributed through the air messages relating to world peace. Some of the most eminent citizens of Chicago contributed to this service in behalf of peace and good-will. Rev. John Timothy Stone of Fourth Presbyterian church said: "A spirit of good-will and of confidence among the nations is needed just now if we are to restore government and business to normal, healthful life. Attention must be turned to life's productions and manufactures, to the industries of peace rather than the exigencies of war. Although many of us do not believe in peace at any price, we believe that righteousness and honor go hand in hand with mutual good will and confidence, and that this is just as true internationally as it is individually. We still hope that the conference in Washington may be world-wide in its influence to reduce the provision of means and methods of warfare and to accelerate among the peoples of the earth a greater desire to follow constructive and wholesome administration of peace. To this end we trust that the new year may dawn with a universal determination to adjust conditions and regulate actions for the wellbeing of the world. May none of us be influenced by false definitions of patriotism which hold aloof from the interests and needs of our fellow-men the world around."

Dr. Scanlon Enlarges the Field of His Labors

Dr. Charles Scanlon, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare, has accepted the presidency of the National Temperance Society, one of the oldest organizations in the country for the promotion of temperance. Dr. Scanlon accepts this new responsibility in addition to his already heavy burden. The National Temperance Society publishes three journals, among them the National Advocate. The program for the National Temperance Society during coming years will include law enforcement and a missionary program in foreign lands.

Cleveland Pastor Relieves Downtown Church Will Not Pass

For two decades we have been hearing of the retreat of the downtown church. In most cities the churches have been moving to the suburbs, often leaving the boarding house populations without a shepherd. Some churches have remained, however, and tenaciously hold to their ideal of a central location for worship. The Catholics have at least one downtown church in every city. Rev. F. H. Groom, pastor of Franklin Circle Disciples church of Cleveland, asserts in a recent issue of his parish paper, the Messenger, that his church will remain right where it is. He cites First Christian church of Kansas City and Central Christian church of Des Moines as examples of successful downtown churches.

Will Meet the Attacks of Modernism

Moody Institute continues in its self-appointed task of "meeting the attacks of modernism." The annual Founders week will be observed this year February 1-5 and the conference speakers have been chosen with reference to the following avowed purposes: "To meet the attacks of modernism on the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith; to enlighten Christian believers concerning the extravagances and disorders of professed faith healers and the 'tongues' movement; to stimulate missionary zeal; to quicken the hope of believers concerning the return of Christ promised in the scriptures; to afford instruction in the practical problems of today in the evangelistic field, the sphere of rescue missions, the pastoral office, and the management of the Sunday school; the deepening and refreshing of spiritual life; and the annual meeting of the institute's alumni association."

Baptist Leader Disputes Liquor Reds

THE bolshevik element of this country is the former wet crowd and it persists in glorifying its defiance of the constitution and laws of the United States. A campaign of ridicule is being conducted through the press, with many cartoonists doing their bit, to make the American people sick of their bargain with national prohibition. However, facts are facts, and they are no more effectively presented by anyone than by Mrs. Helen Montgomery, president of the Northern Baptist Convention. She says:

"Reports from chiefs of police in fifty-one largest cities of the United States, including New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis and cities of that size and former degree of wetness, and with a total population of over 20,000,000, show a slump in arrests for all causes from 960,603 in 1917 to 851,108 in 1920. The total arrests for drunkenness in these cities in 1917 were 307,108. This was cut to 108,835 in 1920, or almost 65 per cent of a decrease.

"Police Commissioner Enright of New York City shows that crimes like burglary, assault, arson and murder declined from 15,000 in 1915 to 10,000 in 1920. Murders decreased fifty-one per cent and burglaries ten per cent in Chicago during 1920 as compared with 1919, and the number of disorderly cases from 38,000 to 32,000.

"The reports of the Massachusetts commission on prisons shows that the prison population of Massachusetts has declined from 108,185 in 1914 to 56,932 in 1921, and that the prison population of Boston has declined in the same period from 6,000 to 3,000, a decrease of 50 per cent.

"In Ohio four workhouses have been closed and there are 10,000 fewer inmates under prohibition than under license. In Pittsburgh, Warden Lewis reports that in 1918 there were 14,684 prisoners committed to the jail; in 1920, only 4,712. In Washington, D. C., there were 6,590 commitments to the workhouse in 1914; 2,511 in 1919 and 833 in 1920. Mayor Smith of Louisville, Ky., reports a decrease of 84 per cent in the prison population in the first year of prohibition.

"In Milwaukee, the beer capital of the United States, there was a decrease between 1915 and 1920 of 38 per cent in cases of abandonment, 60 per cent in drunk and disorderly, 38 per cent assault and battery, and 59 per cent disorderly conduct. Governor Brown of New Hampshire, reports in July, 1921, that there are but 43 jail inmates in the state. Richmond, Va., has increased 27 per cent in population during the years between 1917 and 1921, but her arrests for drunkenness and disorder have decreased 75 per cent."

The Outline of History By H. G. WELLS

Now in One Volume at $5.00

THE OUTLINE OF HISTORY was unquestionably the best selling and most widely discussed non-fiction publication of the past year. The list price of $10.50 for the two-volume set, however, placed it out of reach of many potential book purchasers. In response to an urgent demand for a cheaper edition there is now published a one-volume edition that will appeal to a much wider market. It represents H. G. Wells' answer to the criticisms, favorable and unfavorable, which the first edition drew from scholars in all fields. Without sacrificing his own original viewpoint, Mr. Wells has taken advantage of constructive suggestions relative to both general emphasis and detailed content. The one-volume edition is printed on thin bible paper, and contains 1272 pages. (Add 15 cents postage).

WHAT THE FORTY-ONE CHAPTERS COVER

THE WORLD'S DAWN

The world was old long before the coming of man, those immeasurable ages of life's first faint stirrings of which most of us know so little and are unable to learn much from professional monographs. The "Outline" gives this marvellously interesting story in language which brings before the mind's eye a thoroughly understandable realization of those ages through which mass and matter passed, up to the crude beginnings of living creation, and thence to the giant reptiles and animals—a brilliantly told story, covering millions of years and culminating in the advent of man.

MAN'S ADVENT.

The dim mystery of man's origin is wisely dealt with. Sources are examined—the Bible, Evolution, and so on, in the light of actual discoveries of the Neanderthalic and other ages, and so is composed a picture of earliest human life and origins, which is full of enlightenment on the question. After that picture, the reader is shown mankind's victories and failures in the struggle for life against mammoths and monsters, his gradual rise from the primitive, the instinct of love and hate, the family idea, the earliest methods of protection and reasoning, the growth of intelligence. And so he emerges from savagery, he takes his first step along the path which leads to today.

CIVILIZATION'S CRADLE.

It is curious to picture an inarticulate world, yet it was so till man began to think; then came speech, which for long was the only means of record, a time of mythology and superstition out of which religion grew. The next steps in communication were signs, picture-language and writing, then art and culture. How, gradually, over many centuries, all this came about in different parts of the world is told in the "Outline" and a marvellously fascinating story it is of a world in civilization's cradle, still in the swaddling clothes of development.

A SUGGESTION: Turn back to page 89 and list your Winter book order—and put "The Outline of History" first in the list. (You may have reasonable time to pay for the books.) Prepare for a great year by reading great books.

HISTORY'S BEGINNINGS

When mankind woke up to a realization of cause and effect, history began; sanguinary wars, brutal enslavings of nations wholesale, magnificent though crude conceptions. Thrilling pages these make in "Outline," wherein graphic portrayal is given of how these early races, some vanished, others surviving, made history, and in doing so wove the fabric of the world's polity, out of which evolved both the freedoms and expressions of today.

IN ANNO DOMINI

A right understanding of these years is necessary to the student of social and political questions, particularly in early Anno Domini when the world consciousness was keen and its conscience impressionable. It was the age of mind over matter, of noble chivalries struggling amid selfishness and greed, of Crusades and Magna Charta, the dawn of light and freedom. These two thousand years of progress are vividly outlined by Mr. Wells in words which get at the truth through the glamour and glitter and leave the reader in good view of the facts in accurate perspective.

WHAT OF TOMORROW?

After coming down to recent years, traversing the nineteenth century and revealing much about the Great War, the author takes the reader to the top of the high tower of his farsightedly practical imagination and shows him the world as it is to be if right and freedom are to sway and mankind is to gain good from the trials which have lately been tearing civilization. Without doubt such a coherent and common sense plan of world co-operation as here depicted is an ideal worth the sacrifice of the War years, and if it is to come it will only be by united and unselfish action. Such a plan to study and work for is alone worth many times the cost of this work—invaluable as it is in other respects.

The Proposal of Jesus

By JOHN A. HUTTON

A new $1.50 edition of which is now in hand. Scores of new orders are coming in every day. Send your order NOW, that it may be filled without further delay.

"Not only luminous, but inspiring," says The Christian Century.

"Of charming eloquence and practical power," says The (Edinburgh) Scotsman.

Dr. Hutton, who has stirred America to an intense interest in his writings by his recent visit here, holds in this book that Jesus intended his message to be practically applied in the solution of the larger problems of his time — social, political, religious; he maintains also that he was put to death for that very reason by the influential leaders of his day, who, like their sons of today, do not like to see Christianity considered as a "practical" religion.

Personality and Power

Of this book, Edward Shillito says, in a recent issue of The Christian Century:

"There is one society which has mastered the art of preparing courses of study. That society is the National School Union. Each year the union issues an outline for the Sundays of the year. Preachers and others who are at times hard pressed for material find these outlines fresh and unconventional and enriched with a large number of references to literature. The new book for 1922 has for its central theme 'Personality', and is the best thing of its kind known to me."

The Fruits of Victory

By NORMAN ANGELL

Author of "The Great Illusion."

NO ONE is really prepared to face the questions which the discussion of disarmament is bringing to the fore unless he is informed of the economic facts underlying such discussion. Norman Angell has furnished just this information in his new volume, "The Fruits of Victory." The argument of the book is that from an economic viewpoint war is utterly futile. Every minister who plans to take his part in the coming campaign for disarmament should have this volume and master its contents.

Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?

By Albert Parker Fitch

"Can the church survive in the changing order?" It is a real question. We have a way of supposing that she cannot perish, but there is no such a thing as permanency of this sort in the social structure.

The question is not only real, it is grave, important. At few other times in man's mental and moral history has he more needed the guiding and steadying leadership of a strong religious organization than now.

Can the church survive in the changing order? Well, the answer will depend upon the extent and character of her faith. The day has come for dropping a liberal apologetic for scholastic Christianity; for trying to define ancient phrases which once carried an open and ingenuous meaning; for reinterpreting historical movements so as to make them unhistorically acceptable; for reading twentieth century sophistries into good third century metaphysics.

THE EXPOSITOR'S Dictionary of Texts

Outlines, Expositions and Illustrations of Every Major Text and Dominant Passage of the Bible

Editors: Sir W. R. Nicoll, Lane T. Stoddart
James Moffatt, D.D.

Its Methods

Each exposition is a sermon compact and complete in itself. Each text suggests a theme by which it is headed; for instance, the exposition on "Like as a father pitieth his children," is entitled "THE GOD OF THE FRAIL"; to the exposition eight minds contribute.

Plan and Purpose

The Editors' purpose in planning THE EXPOSITORS DICTIONARY OF TEXTS was to compile a compendium of Scriptural insight and comment. They did so by gleaning from the master theologians and preachers of the past half century the best exposition on every major text and dominant passage of the Bible.

Great Sermon Makers Approve It

"Judging by the effect on myself I should say that its value lies in this: That by its wealth of apt and unhackneyed illustrations it starts the mind on lines of thought reaching far beyond the text under review. I welcome it as a precious boon to preachers."—REV. PRINCIPAL DAVID SMITH, D.D.

"In suggestiveness, originality and practical usefulness I should think the Dictionary stands alone. This book flashes light on one everywhere."—REV. G. H. MORRISON, M.A.

"Its comprehensiveness seems to me to be one of its chief merits. I look forward to much assistance from constant reference to its pages."—REV. CANON J. G. SIMPSON, M.A., D.D.

"All is sifted, modern, thought-provoking. The hard-worked pastor will find much gold here for his minting days."—REV. W. L. WATKINSON, D.D.

"It is a prodigy of toil, and the result is admirable. It is a treasury of the best things chosen with unerring wisdom, arranged with skill, and made immediately available for the preacher's use. The ministry of souls is never out of sight. A more quickening and useful companion to the preacher of the Word does not exist."—REV. JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.

New Books on Christ in Today's Life

In the amazingly puzzling times in which men find themselves today, there is no fact of greater significance, or more hope-radiating, than that thoughtful men are turning for guidance to the great Teacher and Master. New book catalogs bristle with striking titles which point to Him who alone can lead men out of darkness into light. The Christian Century Press has selected the following as really great books. All of them endeavor to see Jesus, not merely as a hero of the first century, but as the true leader for men and nations in this twentieth century.

Jesus and Life

By Joseph F. McFadyen, D.D.

A fresh and searching interpretation of the Gospel of Jesus in its social implications. The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, says in his preface: "We are realizing as never before that the christianizing of men, of all men, in their relations is not so much a matter of interest to the church as a matter of life and death for the world." ($2.00).

The Guidance of Jesus for Today

By Cecil John Cadoux, D.D.

This book is an account of the teaching of Jesus from the standpoint of modern personal and social need. Says Canon James Adderley: "It recalls by a shock to the bewildering problem of applied Christianity and makes us once more suitably uncomfortable. I want everybody to read it." ($2.00).

The Open Light

By Nathaniel Micklem, M.A.

This interpretation of Christianity by one of England's younger Christian thinkers takes its title from William Morris's lines, "Looking up, at last we see the glimmer of the open light, from o'er the place where we would be." The author says: "I hope this book may help to make Christianity appear more reasonable and more beautiful." ($2.00).

Christianity and Christ

By William Scott Palmer.

"Twelve years ago," says Dr. Palmer in his introductory note, "I was profoundly influenced by the critical examination of Christian documents and of Christian origins, by science generally and by the new movement in philosophy. I felt impelled to revise my religious beliefs. It was a kind of stock-taking, and took the form of a diary, now long out of print. Many trials have come upon the Christian religion and the church since then. It seems to be time for a new stock-taking on my part; and I propose to write a new diary and in it ask my new questions and find, perhaps, new answers." Dr. Palmer is author of "Where Science and Religion Meet." ($2.00).

Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus

By Principal A. E. Garvie, D.D.

This is not a new book, but a new edition of a very great book by the noted head of New College, London. The Congregationalist says of the book: "Its chief value is in its emphatic insistence upon the genuineness of the human experience of Jesus, coupled with the constant acceptance of the uniqueness of his nature as the only-begotten and well-loved Son of God." ($3.00).

Note: Add 10 cents for postage on each book ordered.

Here is a fine library of books on the greatest possible theme. Their possession and study will insure a fruitful year for any churchman or churchwoman.

Benedict XV— The War Pope

BENEDICT XV will take a place in history if for no other reason than the fact that he occupied his great office during the period of the world war. The lurid light of that conflict heightened the significance of every man whose official status was one of responsibility, no matter how conventional or mediocre his actions may have been. Benedict's policies were not characterized by originality. He followed precedent and attempted hardly more than those things which well defined convention prompted him to undertake throughout the four years of strife. A more resourceful and potent personality in his position might perhaps have used the moral weapons at his disposal more effectually. It is Benedict's virtue that he steered holy church through the conflict without serious mishap, though situations of infinite delicacy and peril emerged on every hand. What Leo XIII might have done in the same position is a fascinating conjecture. Benedict issued general appeals in the name of peace to the warring nations. All these went unheeded. Even his appeal to President Wilson in late 1916 met no response, perhaps because Mr. Wilson saw how imminent was our own entrance into the fight. The papacy's attitude toward the heroic course of Cardinal Mercier in Belgium was interpreted as pro-Germanism, but throughout the war there were finely conceived acts of friendship for France which found their reward at the end in a reversal of French official attitude and public sentiment toward the holy see. Whether it was Benedict's diplomacy or the glorious chaplaincy record of the French priesthood that won the popular and official heart of France no one can tell. But there can be no doubt that the pope's general course of conservatism and safety first, enabled the church to weather the great storm without creating serious hostilities from without or unduly wrenching the internal organization of the hierarchy. Benedict's predecessor, dying in the first month of the war, broken in heart by the shock and burden of the unexpected debacle, committed to the frail, aristocratic priest whose elevation to the cardinalate had taken place but four months before, a responsibility more delicate and perilous than any pope had ever before assumed.

Papal Gains and Losses In the War

THE papacy came out of the war with both losses and gains. The gains in France were matched by gains in official Italy. But in the break-up of central Europe Rome lost Austria-Hungary, the last political crutch on which it leaned for support of its claim of temporal authority. In the creation of the numerous new states the democratic spirit has tended with considerable decision to throw off the repressive influence of an autocratic church and there is today a strong current setting in toward some form of Protestantism. Whether the war weakened the papacy politically or not, evangelical Christians have grounds for a hopeful view of the trend of things in the Catholic church. Shorn of its secular power the papacy will tend to increase in spiritual power. And the very exercise of spiritual power without recourse to the sanctions and guarantees of political pressure will inevitably tend to liberalize the church. Benedict's policy toward modernism followed the repressive example of Pius X, his immediate predecessor, and there are few tokens left to indicate the existence of any self-conscious liberalizing movement within the bosom of the church. And yet, though noiseless and loyal, the effects of such a drawing together of Catholic laymen as we see in the extraordinary growth of the Knights of Columbus, are potent for democracy and liberality within the church. In a world increasingly democratic the ancient church must slowly yield to the claims of the new spirit of liberty and social control before which in the end autocracy in every form must give way.

A Strange Perversion of Religious Values

THE religious press has carried from Maine to California the story of the action of a few Disciples churches which have passed resolutions refusing cooperation with the United Christian Missionary Society unless the latter adopts a creed on the baptism question, and applies it ruthlessly to its foreign missionaries. The action of such churches, including the large congregation at Canton, O., has been widely reported, and always as a scandal that men tell with amazement. The reason the Christian world is scandalized is that they see in this reactionary group an astonishing perversion of religious values. The church that refuses to support homes for the aged and homes for little children has repudiated the standard of values set up by the Author of the parable of the sheep and the goats. Those who would put the baptism question ahead of the question of brotherhood and cooperation in Christian work do not agree with Paul when he says, "And now abideth faith, hope and love; and the greatest of these is love." One would not be surprised if a Roman Catholic took the position that the baptism question transcended in importance such considerations of human value. He is a sacramentalist in religion, believing that the grace of God can be mediated only through certain forms and orders. But the Christian world is rightly astounded that any in the Protestant camp should set ceremony above love, and should prefer division to unity when the question of much water is raised. All generous minded Disciples hang their heads at this shame for which their whole communion suffers. But meanwhile nearly every Protestant communion has an equally irreconcilable element which would put something ahead of the things that the New Testament teaches to be the primary elements of the gospel. If a brother cannot believe the doctrine of the near return of Jesus shall we withhold not only the love of a brother but the love of a neighbor as well? It is often done. If a man cannot believe in the virgin birth, is it our duty to consider him a heathen man to be scourged out of our religious camp? This is by no means uncommon. So long as Protestant churches refuse to be Christian in Jesus way, they must expect that thousands of liberal-minded men will make the mistake of confusing theological dogmatism with real Christianity, and recoiling from it.

Is the Minister a Producer?

YOUNG men who face the choice of a life task are influenced by popular conceptions of the merit of various professions and callings. If a community tends to discount the work of a minister, from that community we are not likely to have many candidates for the ministry. In the widespread materialism of the period following the war, one is not surprised to find all the idealistic professions regarded with less favor. The mechanic who turns out a steel axle on the lathe can show for every day's labor definite results. The minister may work harder and longer hours, but he cannot point to achievements so definite. In order to satisfy the demand for concrete results, he may draw up a numerical statement of his work, showing the number of calls he has made, the number of his converts and the size of his congregations. But if there were nothing else to be said about his service to the community, he would not be a very impressive figure. It is only as we find in the minister the builder of that spirit which alone makes the community life possible that we can appreciate the dignity of his calling. Only the community that nourishes those moral sanctions which inhere in religion can long endure. No city could have a policeman on every corner and in every alley. No business could maintain ever-present auditors. The affairs and interests of every community rest back fundamentally on cooperation. And religion in its last analysis is the basis of social cooperation in behalf of a community's ideals. The thoroughly selfish man has no place in such a social structure. He ought to be a Robinson Crusoe or a Daniel Boone, living far from the haunts of other men. Nor must we forget that the satisfaction of legitimate human wants is the true gauge of industrial service in the community. The perennial interest in religion is a continuous disclosure of the fact that spiritual needs call for the guidance of trained and skillful specialists. The minister then is a real producer. He builds moralities and spiritual attitudes. He is the active agent at work in behalf of cooperation in the local life and of that higher cooperation which links the soul with God.

Brewers Make Trouble in India

IT is not commonly known that the political protest of Ghandi, the non-cooperationist leader in India, is aimed directly at the activities of British brewers and distillers. William E. Johnson, better known as "Pussyfoot" Johnson, who has just returned from India, reports the remarkable growth of the temperance movement in that country. The Indians are being urged to resist the drug addiction that is being forced upon them by the British liquor interests. His program meets a ready response especially from the Mohammedan classes with whom total abstinence is a cardinal religious principle. One of the provinces will soon have local option, and it is confidently predicted that the various towns in that province will go dry at once under the leadership of Ghandi. Ghandi is also opposed to the policy of the government with regard to poppy cultivation. The man who wants to produce opium from poppies can get a government subsidy to aid him in his farming. All other farming operations must be carried on without government aid. This threat at the morality of India is opposed vigorously by the new movement of protest. While the British government has done much for India in providing an educational system, railroads and many other of the devices of modern civilization, and in setting up a stable government, Britain has all along allowed many of her altruistic services to be compromised with her evil alliance with brewers, distillers and drug venders. This partnership will cease, or one of these days the revolt in India will be beyond control. When a whole people rises up in revolt actuated by a spiritual impulse, the results are always serious. In no nation in the world has the liquor dealer become so influential in politics as in Great Britain. Even when the nation was threatened by the German submarine, and the people were asked to make all sorts of sacrifice, the brewer was allowed to get his supplies to go on with his useless waste. With Canada, India and many other parts of the British empire dry, there will likely be a change of front on the part of the British people toward prohibition which now seems to them like a freak action of the United States alone.

The Cross-roads and Some Guide-boards

WE HEAR a stream of talk today about the failure of Christianity, about the bankruptcy of organized religion, about the church at the cross roads, or even at some more ominous place. One need not deny the allegations. It would take a very brave, and probably a very ignorant, man to be the advocate and defender of the present status quo of Christianity, religion, or the church. Yet it is pertinent to ask which period in the history of Christianity appears to a careful student of it to have been on a high and satisfactory level of spiritual life and power? There have been no doubt epochs when the church has had leaders of genius who started forward on a new line of march and who gave fresh vision and inspiration to large groups of men and women, but there is no period when the church as a whole or in very large fraction had grasped the real meaning of Christianity or was exhibiting the irresistible might and power of those spiritual forces which Christ has revealed.

A distinguished lady once remarked to one of the famous editors of Punch that she did not think Punch was as good or as humorous as it used to be. "No," replied the witty editor, "it never was." That applies to many other things besides Punch. We gild and glorify the past with a sheen and splendor which it never had in fact. We see the light and glory on the high peaks as we look wistfully back and then we commit the fallacy of supposing that the valleys and plains were like the peak. If one thinks of moving back into the comfortable home of any bygone century it would be well to search the premises carefully before crating the furniture for the journey. The golden ages are all in front, they are not behind—except in story books. "Having embalmed that fly in the liquid amber of my words," as Thomas B. Read, speaker of the house, once put it, let us come back to our own strange century and see what there is to say about it. It is a transition time, they tell us. It certainly is that, but so are all periods. The world never stayed in any one century yet, though it comes nearer staying in some than in others. This period is surely no mere hyphen between past and future; it is dramatic and momentous in significance and it is big with destiny.

The lost leadership of the church is what impresses us most as we consider the religious situation. Can that leadership be recovered? Certainly not in its ancient authoritative form. But a new and better type of leadership may yet be won. One can clearly discern three lines of development in the life of those who constitute the church which are essential to a recovery of influence and spiritual power. They are an increase of first-hand religious experience, what we usually call mystical experience; a wiser social program, and a fresher and more vital interpretation of the New Testament. There is no real leadership possible in any field until there are experts who know the field, and there is only one way of being an expert in the Christian faith—that is to have found the way into a living experience of God. This is a far simpler and less abstruse thing than the books about it indicate. What it involves is to realize that true religion does not consist in holding doctrines and logical notions about God; it is the discovery of first-hand spiritual forces and energies to live by.

The Christian leaders who have awakened the church and who have in their times kept the faith and saved the day have almost always been men and women who had this experience. They talked of what they knew. They delivered what they had seen with their eyes, what they had beheld, what their hands had handled of the word of life. They were experts and they exhibited the evidence that they were dealing with realities which they had experienced. We begin our faith often, perhaps usually, by having faith in somebody else's faith. But we must not stop there. We must go on with determined purpose to until our own lives have received the streams of divine energy flowing into them and through them into others. We have tried to pump up religious revivals by extensive and expensive pumping machinery. We have wrought wonders in the way of publicity, campaign systems and psychological effects. Where we have missed out has been in not understanding that there is no substitute for personal depth of experience on the part of those who compose the church. If all those who "hit the trail" in these intense campaigns were railroaded into the churches and the number multiplied a hundred fold, we should, as a spiritual force, be well nigh as weak as before. It is not numbers of nominal members that make a church; it is depth of experience and transmission of power. Until we have that we shall lack leadership and we shall continue to "tramp the temple" and mark time. This is an hour in which to pray that a real contagion of vital, spiritual religion may sweep over our country. We ought to see multitudes of persons find what they have been seeking and pass over from the class of nominal Christians to become flames of passionate intelligence on behalf of God.

The religious condition of college students in America ought to give every thoughtful person serious concern. These men and women are straighter and more soundly moral than were the students of twenty-five years ago, but they have in large degree lost their religious moorings and bearings. Everything with them is in the melting-pot. They are in a haze about the most fundamental of fundamentals. There is no use offering them chopped straw, up-in-the-air speculation. They will, however, respond seriously to convincing evidence. They are familiar with the laboratory method. They are used to dealing with facts. They have respect for first-hand experience. They will follow experts. The religion which is to win these three hundred thousand college students is a religion of life, a religion incarnated in good, live persons who are what they proclaim.

A wave of deep genuine religious experience in college would quickly mean a great increase of recruits for the ministry. Already the students in theological seminaries are awake to the importance of the mystical side of religion. They are giving thoughtful attention to it. But there is need of many more men coming from college with a clear vision that there is nothing better for a man to do in this world than to become a living interpreter of Christianity. If the first-class men finished their senior year with this vision in their souls and then were obedient to it, a new epoch would be at hand. But that desired condition will not come until these fine young fellows see religion exhibited in its dynamic and vital aspects and are convinced that the power of God, which worked so mightily in the apostolic age, is a reality in this present age.

Almost every thoughtful person today is interested in movements and efforts for a better social order. Some are occupied with theory, some with practical experiment and some are gradually shaping their theories in the light of experiments. Now what church leaders need to do is to realize themselves and then to make all young people realize that for Christ the transformation of the social order was an essential part of his program and of his way of life. No more intense believer in the recreation of society has ever lived. He never thought of having followers who would calmly acquiesce in the continuation of injustice and social wrongs. To be a Galilean was to be a lover of men—the men who “labor and are heavy laden.” To be a disciple was to be a learner not only about God but about how to treat little children and poor tired women, and how to change the conditions of life from wrong to right.

We do not want to change the church of the living God into a new sociological experiment. We do not want to give up worship in order to establish soup kitchens. In that direction increased weakness lies. What we want is to realize that Christianity is a way of life and that life is fundamentally social and interrelated, that no man can be a Christian and live unto himself. Both the medieval period and the reformation epoch were primarily concerned with what was going to happen to the soul after death. Their theories of salvation had a post mortem slant. We moderns are primarily concerned about the issues of life here in the sphere where we can test and verify the trend and significance of things. We believe that whatever “beyond” awaits us will be rooted and grounded in the nature that is being formed within us now, and we are convinced that however glorious heaven may be or however ominous hell may be, love or hate for those among whom we live here in this present world is just as glorious or just as ominous.

The church does not altogether comprehend how completely the focus of interest has shifted, not only for educated people, but for working people as well. So long as salvation is conceived and preached mainly in reference to a world beyond, the rank and file of those who compose our villages and cities will go their way and give little heed. They will say, in substance, “If you do not love your brother whom you have seen, we have no interest in what you say about a God whom you have not seen. Show us a religion that really does things, that alters men’s lives and that sets new spiritual forces and energies operating in the society where we live and we shall be impressed.” It will not be easy for critics of the church to forget that pulpits dedicated to Christ not only sanctioned the method of war, but inculcated and propagated hate. But the best way back to Christ for a church that has taken this loop is for that church to take up the burden of human suffering and follow Christ now and henceforth in the work of searching out and finding lost sheep and of making love prevail among men as a real way of life.

Hardly less important for a revival of power and influence is the fresh discovery of how to use the Bible, especially the New Testament. So long as the Bible is treated as a mysterious authority, or as a storehouse of doctrines, or as something which you have got to believe in all its details whether you are convinced or not, it will fail to attract multitudes of present-day people. That way of approach shunts them away from the Bible and makes it a closed book to them. Now just at this critical epoch historical research and literary insight have given us back the Bible with immensely heightened value. It has become to many of us who have loved it from childhood a new and more thrilling book. The historical background of each book has been unfolded. We see what these ancient heroes of faith were fighting for. We understand their problem. We feel the grip of the dramatic issue at stake. They at once become flesh and blood people and they get our interest without any spurious pushing. The moment we understand the book of Jonah, for instance, we no longer find ourselves in collision with science over the possibilities of life in the bowels of a great fish. The same situation is true wherever we turn. We find ourselves at the center of a great movement in which and through which the deeper meaning of life is being revealed to us. Christ and St. Paul have been re-discovered by the work of the last fifty years. Nothing is more interesting than to feel the throb and flow of the actual course of these two lives which so fill and dominate the New Testament. It is no longer the realm of dogma, it is the moving story of the most tremendous human issues, seen in the two most effective personalities that have ever lived.

But how much of all this has reached the Sunday School? And how much of all this fresh and wonderful discovery of new forces makes itself felt in most Christian churches in America? The answer is very well known. And the answer is one explanation of the weakness of the church. Who was interested in Ptolemaic astronomy after Copernicus had found a new astronomy that was true to facts? Who was interested in old fashioned biology after Darwin had found a principle which completely reorganized it?

Who that knows and has real insight is interested in dogmatic Bible teaching when once he has felt the significance of historical and literary interpretation?

Here we are in a world that needs a fresh and transforming message of life. It is within our reach. Christianity can still be the power of God. If it fails it is our fault. If it loses its leadership it is because we who profess it do not care enough about it to take the pains to be living organs of it. If we who now call ourselves Christians had the first-hand experience of God, if we were followers of Christ in his love of men and in his faith in a new social order and if we were making the world today feel the freshness and power of that mighty revelation of the Spirit through the Bible there would come a new stage in the history of the church.

The Reform of Insurance

INSURANCE is big business, very big business. It has become exceedingly complicated. Varying motives guide its conduct. Its best inspirations are the yearnings of a society seeking to be Christian and to embody the principle of bearing one another's burdens. Its worst impulses—too many of them are being brought to light in succeeding crime waves. All insurance men are not of the same character. None is wholly responsible for recent tendencies and developments. Yet the guild is on trial today. It has not faced another such crisis since the legislative investigation into the manners and methods of the old life insurance companies of New York, when several great careers were wrecked, certain highly respected men of affairs were driven to despair, and all too inconsequential reforms were effected. This time the issues run deeper and farther, and will eventually require an overhauling of the fundamentals on which the insurance business rests.

High-minded citizens and devout Christians engaged in the business have eloquently and convincingly interpreted its genius and purpose. To avail of its securities is now generally recognized to be the duty of every good citizen. No reputable business operates without its safeguards. It is not merely a counsel of fear, a craven running to social cover from individual adversities. It is, when rightly conceived and conducted, a program of fellowship, of universal brotherhood, of support of the weak and unfortunate by the strong and the many. In idea and ideal it is all that its high-minded promoters have claimed for it. But it is time to raise the question whether the guild in control has permitted it to degenerate into a profit-grabbing institution involving self-seeking devices which make it a prey upon society.

Insurance began with recognizing the near limits of human forethought and power. Life was circled narrowly by mysterious dangers, against which no human device could fend. Any one might prove the victim at any time. Promoters of insurance were successful in convincing the public that it is not right for the isolated victim of these fortuities to stand the brunt of them alone. Injury against which society cannot defend the individual, society should make good to the victim, so far as it can. Unpreventable calamities are not the concern alone of the poor fellow whom they strike. By orderly, scientific processes it is proper that society as a whole should co-operate with the imperiled individual in his self-defense.

But science has vastly widened the circle of security. Mysterious dangers against which no human device can provide, have been greatly reduced. The office of insurance thus diminishes as science furnishes new safeguards, and puts each individual in the way of intelligent self-defense. But the insurance business has certainly not diminished. May be in volume it ought not to have diminished, for never have a wholly respectable number of human beings been stirred out of the shiftless, easy-going life of the mere animal. The zone of peril for the citizen is still sufficiently wide to call for extensions of insurance. But the greed of insurance promoters would seem to have blinded them to the legitimate fields of extension and the proper zones of reduction in their business. From fortuities against which intelligence and science cannot guard, these promoters have carried security into fields where the malicious and corrupt may escape the legitimate consequences of their crimes. It has come to pass that the insurance business feeds upon wicked, reckless, needless loss. Fire insurance would languish if there were not repeated fire losses. The passion of many underwriters is to keep insurance rates up rather than to prevent fires. Such a wholesale prevention as modern science is now prepared to effect would bankrupt the insurance companies. It would break them to permit a wholesale devastation, but it would not less certainly break them if there were as complete a suppression of fires as the scientific application of preventive measures now makes possible.

To say that insurance companies have again and again led in fire prevention measures does not meet the situation. That fact is doubtless a tribute to the irrepressible good will in human nature which drives some men to social service hostile to their private gains. Many doctors slave night and day in sincere attempt to keep the neighbors well, when, under the prevailing system of supporting the medical profession, it is to their private and selfish interest that people should continue ill. Few well people pay doctors' fees. Similarly, certain insurance promoters have contributed brains and enterprise to the scientific prevention of fires, but the fact remains that the business as a whole is organized on a basis which encourages an increasing loss, and discourages the thoroughgoing application of known measures for the prevention of loss. It is not surprising that many insurance agents and agencies yield to the pressure which the mechanism of their business brings to bear upon them, and that they suppress noble impulses which would lead to private loss in the interests of social gain.

But more subtle and malignant abuse of insurance is revealed elsewhere. The magistrate in New York whom the public has for years acclaimed as the stoutest foe of crime, has recently broken forth against the security companies which have entered the field as professional providers of bail. A large proportion of the crime of New York, and doubtless in most of our cities, is committed by men and women already out on bail upon earlier charges. Highly organized and amply financed security companies are ready in court on the instant to vouch for these known criminals. Thus, this magistrate points out, an unfortunate or even innocent "first-offender," unable to secure bail by the usual process of appeal to friends, is remanded to jail for an indefinite incarceration, awaiting the appearance of his case on the court docket, while the professional criminal, in virtual partnership with these professional bailers, goes free, with no restrictions upon his liberty to engage in further crime, except that he must appear for trial days or weeks in the future.

It has often been pointed out that common methods of handling burglary insurance incite to a degree of burgling. Numerous security companies, comprising a large guild, could not survive if the police did their duty strictly and with the degree of thoroughness which ordinary brains and well-known preventive measures make possible. It has been openly charged that some of these companies connive at a degree of activity among burglars. The public believes this to be the fact. If this connivance is not demonstrated it would be very surprising, for the business is set up to encourage it. One may be sure that human nature, frail and weak as it is known to be, will still resist the most malignant seductions of this program, but human nature is not always and everywhere equal to the terrific strain which this large and ambitious commercial scheme imposes. One need not search far for potent causes of the crime waves sweeping back and forth over the country. If our insurance business, as at present organized, did not create and inspire much of it, that would be because the ordinary laws of cause and effect fail.

The idealism of insurance has given it peculiar attractions to Christian men. Ministers have left the pulpit and pastorate to espouse this calling in larger numbers than any other. What is going on in their minds today? The profiteers appear to have seized the profession, and are dominating the guild. The zeal to protect the public's life and person and property seems prompted not by love of the people but by eagerness to get all that the traffic will bear. Is it not time for a frank and open discussion of this theoretically altruistic, socializing enterprise from the point of view of Christian idealism and service? Has the guild gone as bad as it seems? Is the cultivation of crime and criminals the natural issue of a propaganda which has so persistently, by the word of mouth of its agents and in the literature of its agencies, thrust forward claims of social ministry? The recent world strain has certainly opened the seams of our altruism, and has revealed the malignities of which the profiteering spirit is capable. These experiences are leading to more serious question in the minds of thoughtful citizens than ever before, whether a social system founded upon and generating private profit as the goal of endeavor is workable in a Christian era. Gross extravagancies of theology have at times incited to sin that grace might the more abound. But they were refined in comparison with a commercial enterprise which sets the criminal class to preying upon society, with ever new freedom and abandon, for the sake of collecting from society the private profits derived from this jeopardy. The merchant's system of barter, revolting as is much of its scramble for gain, has generally risen above such standards. Has the insurance guild the inherent moral stamina to cleanse its own house, or must the rivers of the public indignation be turned through to sweep it clean? And will the four pillars of the structure withstand the strain of that torrent?

Secondary Uses

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THIS have I discovered, that a thing which is Imperfectly Fitted for the use for which it is intended may be largely useful otherwise. And I have often noted that a man who is Pronounced a Success in one place cutteth no ice in another. And I am very slow to condemn any work of God or any serious undertaking of men because it seemeth to fall short of what it was intended to do.

There was once a man who dwelt in Chicago. And he had friends who owned a Summer Cottage on the eastern shore of Lake Michigan. And they invited him to spend certain days with them.

And he took passage upon a Boat, and sailed the blue waves of Lake Michigan.

Now Lake Michigan is a friend of mine, and I have only happy memories of my voyages upon its waters, neither have I lost any meals therein. But with some men it is not so. And on the day when this man journeyed, Lake Michigan was feeling a bit Skittish.

And albeit he had much wherewith to occupy his mind on the way across, yet was he most of all concerned with the recollection that before many days he must journey back and have it all to go through with again.

And when he arrived, or what there was left of him, this matter was much upon his mind, and well might have spoiled what was otherwise a very pleasant Visit.

But he made a Great Discovery.

Upon the eastern shore of Lake Michigan there is an institution whose name is the Pere Marquette Railway. And he returned to Chicago thereby.

And in all the days that followed, he was a Booster for the Pere Marquette.

And he talked of forming a Syndicate to run a branch of the Pere Marquette from New York to Liverpool, and then to reduce the Cunard line to a One-way Thoroughfare.

Now there were certain men who spake to him ill concerning the Pere Marquette. And they made a jest of its time-tables, which they declared to be erratick, and certain other things did they do which I will not repeat. For I also have no kick coming against the Pere Marquette, albeit I prefer the Lake and its Boats unto any train that ever was or yet shall be.

But when man spake thus unto this man, he said,

Speak not evil unto me concerning the Pere Marquette. I know its train schedules and its arrivals and departures and am acquainted with all its ways. As a Railway it may leave something to be desired; but it hath few superiors and no equals as a Remedy for Sea-Sickness.

The Church's Self-Respect

By Lloyd C. Douglas

I HEARD a man with a large voice and an exhaustless supply of anecdotes say that in a certain metropolitan mission the retrieved castaway was always sent directly from the penitential altar to the cobbler where new heels were built on his shoes. I do not vouch for this yarn; but I'll go bail for the theory that the brother with no heels cannot be expected to measure his morals, motives, manners, or manhood, with the chap who has been raised up at least an inch out of the slime. Self-pride may be a very reprehensible conceit; but self-respect is imperative to the success of any man or institution attempting to realize his or its divine origin and commission.

In a recent article in The Christian Century, entitled "The Galilean Psychology," the writer endeavored to call attention to the most obvious of the principles practiced by the Master in his dealings with other men. Pursuant to that thesis, it has been suggested that a more intensive study of modern church methods, with these principles in mind, might prove of interest. In compliance with that request, we might begin by considering the unpsychological processes commonly employed in recruiting men and women into membership in our churches.

LODGE PSYCHOLOGY

One of the main considerations of any self-respecting individual is the protection and development of his own personality. Consciously or otherwise, he strives to distinguish himself from the mass. This is a heaven-born desire. It needs to be encouraged and properly directed. It offends a normal man when his name is forgotten by people who should have remembered it. He wishes to be identified from the mob. Sometimes his efforts to count one are almost tragically pitiful. Whatever he has the most of, he capitalizes. Has he money, and no brains, he shows off his money. Has he oodles of money, and no brains, and lots of religion, he may volunteer to write a brand-new creed for a church, on condition that he be allowed to foot some large bills. If she has nothing but a new hat, she will go where the population is dense and envious, and exhibit the new hat. Humanity is a queer critter, that way.

In the show-windows of the best furniture store in town, a dining-room suite is placarded, "Exclusive." Somebody, otherwise unable to express her individuality, may be baited into the possession of this furniture. She will then be unlike anyone else in the city—in respect to her dining-room. We are all engaged in some sort of a struggle to keep ourselves from being completely swallowed up by the mass-mind. We try to build little dykes to protect ourselves and our interests from the wholesale inundation of our personalities.

The secret society promises the candidate some exclusive rights unshared by the mob. Members know certain mysterious signs and symbols not accessible to the whole public. The chief allure of the lodge, therefore, resides in its ability to offer the private citizen a weapon for the defense of his personality. He may get some pretty rough treatment, in the course of his daily routine in business, but he is conscious that there are a few holdings of his which are exclusive to a selected few. Now, how does the secret society (whose secrets are as old as Time, as innocent as new-fallen snow, and as free, in their essentials, as the air we breathe) contrive to render this service to its constituency? How is it able to create that peculiar impression upon the candidate, and conserve it after he has become familiar with its inward parts?

THE CANDIDATE

Nobody ever asks you to join the lodge. It may happen that a friend of yours, who is a member, will encourage you into a conversation concerning the desirability of membership, but he will not solicit your application. His whole attitude in this matter stimulates your curiosity. If he speaks of his lodge, at all, his words are carefully hedged about with caution and an air of reserve. You ask him what steps you should take to become a member. He provides you with an application blank. You fill it out and he takes it away with him. That is the last you hear of it for some time.

You do not call him up, next day, to inquire what has been done about it. Somehow, you have gathered the impression that you are to sit quietly, in your dealings with this institution, and wait until you are told what to do next. A committee looks you up. You have a curious sense of being under surveillance. Frequently, you have an intuition that somebody is appraising you. Men you had known only casually invite you out to lunch, and sound you concerning your ideas on many things.

After a lapse of weeks, you are notified to appear at a certain place, at a definite hour. You are not asked if the engagement will be entirely convenient. You are not informed what the program will be. You do not suggest another night for it, or insist upon full information concerning the coming event. Up to this time, nobody has made you any promises. Your conviction is deepening that this institution must have a great deal of respect for itself, to be able to assume so much; and, if it feels that way about itself, there must be good reasons. Your confidence grows.

THE GRIP

Upon your arrival at the appointed place, you do not rush into the main works, watch in hand, shouting that they must make it snappy because you have another pressing engagement. If you should do that, they would tell you by all means to go to your other engagement and forget to come back. They don't care a continental whether you come into the lodge, or not. Therefore, you want in. If they had pressed you, and hounded you, the chances are that you wouldn't have cared to come in—or, coming in, would have taken only scant interest. No; you arrive in a docile state of mind. You are shown into a little ante-room, where there are neither books nor papers to beguile the tedium of delay, and told to wait until you are wanted.

That night you are taught a grip. But the Grip that does most business with your emotions, on that occasion, is not any peculiar trick or hand-clasp known to a fraternity. The big sensation is that you are now in the Grip of Something—something masterly, ancient, tried and tested by Time—Something entirely sure of itself, serene in its strength and dignity! You are a suppliant for its favor and its benefits. Almost the first words spoken to you, in that place, are reminders that nobody coaxed you in; that you came entirely upon your own initiative; that the institution had been struggling along without you for hundreds of years, and that you must not be so ill-advised as to imagine that your presence, now, would affect the organization in the slightest degree.

This kind of talk is rattling good medicine for an age that needs discipline so badly as ours. You are honestly glad to hear it. It is decidedly refreshing, in the course of a life full of bombardments—people trying to sell you insurance, real estate, stocks and bonds; all manner of solicitations being made by persons who flatter you and skin you; whining supplications by beggars; importunities to join the church, etc.—it is refreshing, is it not, to be caught in the Grip of Something that speaks in a voice of command? And you know that the institution means exactly what it says to you. Perhaps you do not suspect the real nature of that fact, at first. It may occur to you as a humorous occasion to see your intimate friends taking things so seriously—and you are disposed to smile; but you will not smile any more. If the lodge means you to be serious, you will be serious. You are in the Grip of Something which considers it a very important matter that you should have respect for it.

Moreover, when you go out of the place, sobered and steadied, you are not sent out with the chesty idea that you are very much different from other people on the street. You are given to understand that you are only a novice; that you have but peered, for a moment, through the parted curtains of an ancient school of thought and conduct. You are sent away with the instruction that you are to attempt to recall everything you learned there, and report your recollections to a serious-minded committee. Having done this, the committee will tell you whether you are fit to learn any more. Neither does this committee make a slipshod job of its work. Unless you come through, about ninety-nine and seventy-seven hundredths per cent correct, you can go out and meditate for sixty days more! The lodge is in no hurry to get you; nor will it have you until you have measured fully to all of its requirements.

JOINING THE CHURCH

I am not attempting to point the moral that accessions to the church should proceed in this manner. My only thought is that the lodge psychology might be of benefit to the church. It is plainly to be seen that the chief allure of the lodge is its unalterable self-respect—a claim which easily explains the high regard which its constituency entertains toward it. But what is the usual procedure in recruiting men and women into organized Christianity?

The candidate for membership is not only unrequired to be a suppliant for the benefits of the church: he is not permitted to be a suppliant. Having attended the services of the church, a few times, the congregation turns out its force to capture him. The minister hurries to his place of business and rather overdoes his cordiality. Assuming, for the moment, that the minister is a salesman, (a word I detest in this connection) it is to be observed that he is not a very good one. He works too fast. Moreover, he does not sell his goods on their merits. He mistakes important features for the unimportant, and vice versa. He seems to be in the mood of one who implores you to buy something—not because you need or want it—but because it was made by a blind man who must have the money, or starve.

This minister, then, is the suppliant. He lays siege to the heart of Jones, with the candid claim that the institution he represents needs Jones, tremendously. Jones, acquainted with the processes by which men enter clubs and secret societies, inquires what steps he should take to become a member. What does he have to learn, or do? Is there no preparation of any sort required? No initiation fee? No application blank? But what are the obligations—financial, for example—and creedal? He is told that he can pay what he likes, when he likes, if he likes. He can believe whatever he will. He can become a regular church attendant, or not—as he prefers. In fact, he is given to understand that his joining the church will not alter his status in the slightest particular. It will neither confer benefits nor exact responsibilities beyond whatever benefits he can gather for himself and what responsibilities he may wish to accept.

MAKING IT EASY

As often as otherwise, Jones does not even meet the deacons for a moment after some church affair, to receive their effusive felicitations upon his decision to join the church. Usually, the only person with whom he has any conference is the minister; and in that conference Jones is given to understand that nothing is expected of him, incident to his taking this important step, other than his full name and his attendance at church on the morning of the fifteenth. If Jones remembers, late Saturday night, that there are to be guests for dinner at his house on the great and notable Sunday, he has no hesitation about cancelling his engagement to join church, by telephone (which shows how much respect has been engendered within him)—and the minister has to go around and line Jones up again, shortly before the next occasion when members are received.

As the minister leaves Jones' office, radiant and successful, having bagged another name for his parochial roll, he purrs, "There will be others coming in at the same time; so you need feel no embarrassment about appearing for the formal service of admittance into membership." Jones smiles. He remembers how much concern was felt for his personal feelings when he was taken into the lodge. Nobody seemed to care, at that time, whether he was embarrassed or not. Certainly no pains were had to insure him against it, when he made his debut in the lodge-room.

Oh, the truth is that anybody can join church, almost anywhere, on his own terms, and on ten minutes' notice! Sometimes, an hour before the service when members are to be received, if the parsonage telephone rings, and somebody wants to know if he, she, or it can come into the church that morning the answer is hilariously affirmative. This is a crime! But this is a fact! Is it any wonder that the churches make no stronger appeal to the people whom they wish to gather in? And is it any wonder that the churches fail to command the full loyalty of so many of the people who are thus recruited?

Now the remedy for this state of things is more simple than one might suppose who is fearful of instituting proceedings looking toward more dignity and effectiveness at this point. The new regime must begin, of course, with a definite commitment of the congregation to a better policy. If a personal testimony may be forgiven, the writer experienced no disorder or disapproval from any quarter when he announced, in his church bulletin, some years ago, that "hereafter we solicit no members for this church. Application blanks are to be had upon inquiry by interested persons. Church relationship may be established through this process only. The initiative must be taken by the applicant for membership." Not only were the accessions to the church more numerous, after that, but the attitude of the people who came in was much more serious and satisfactory to themselves and the institution. The first step, then, is to teach that the church is not a beneficiary, but a benefactor; not a mendicant, but a hospice!

ATTITUDE TOWARD PROSPECTIVES

Persons who seem to be interested in the church, as evidenced by their frequent attendance at its religious services and social events, are to be treated with the warmest cordiality. There should be no question about the genuineness of the welcome they receive. This attitude, however, should be dignified. There should be just enough restraint in it to impress the newcomer with the belief that the welfare of the institution does not reside with his decision to become a member.

It is surely a wretched relationship when a man thinks that it is of very great moment whether he comes into the church, or stays out; just as it is an abominable notion when any church-member feels that the success of the institution would be terribly handicapped if he should fly up, in a huff, and leave. Churches, almost everywhere, are crippled by the presence of heady persons who know too much to follow and not enough to lead, in whose opinion the loss of their patronage would create sad havoc in Zion. Until such spiritual morons are given the kind of discipline that alone can save their undeveloped souls, not much hope need be entertained of the prosperity of the churches over which they exercise this blighting influence. But that is another story, deserving of separate treatment.

The newcomer should be shown friendly attention. The minister will wish to call. He may properly express his hope that a closer relationship may develop. But, if he wants to get some really valuable members from this home, let him handle the conversation with reserve. It should be laid down as a hard and fast rule that the initiative must be taken by the applicant, when the time comes for a discussion of the actual terms of membership in the church.

NOT MERELY PERFUNCTORY

When the application blank has been properly filled, it should come before the officers who naturally have oversight of such matters—the deacons, probably. These men should do the candidate the courtesy of looking him up. Either too great display of eagerness, or an attitude of perfunctoriness, will be almost certain to spoil the good effect of the application. If the church is as important as the lodge, let the officers of the church give the candidate to understand so. He should be impressed with the dignity of the institution.

Our customary procedure, in the average church, when it comes to the ceremony of admitting people into membership, is quite too informal, casual, and unimpressive. A group comes down to the front, and the minister hurries through a brief formula which usually lacks much of beauty or inspiration. After a man has come to the point of desiring to claim common cause with Christ, before the altar of the church, it would appear that this is a strategic moment to give him a thrill that will last him for the rest of his life. It should not be a mere episode sandwiched in between the announcements of the pie social, the rummage sale, the old shoes wanted by the Salvation Army, the old magazines wanted by the infirmary, and the rest of the old trash wanted by divers and sundry—and the collection. It can be made a very solemn and impressive moment, not only for the candidate, but for the whole church. How rarely it is.

AFTERWARDS

If the preacher expressed one-tenth the zeal in conserving the new member; putting him to work; making him feel his responsibilities—that he had demonstrated when he was all aflame with passion to write this name on the church record, he would soon have a congregation that would turn the town bottom side up.

As the matter stands, the novitiate returns to his pew, after the dull service of initiation. He is now in good and regular standing; but he has nothing to show for it. Common sense suggests a little manual to be placed in his hands, treating of his rights and responsibilities as a member, and containing a certificate of his membership in the church. He should have a cordial letter from the deacons within a week. (No doubt he will get one from the treasurer.) What a member is worth to the church may be decided within the first ten days after he is received.

No effort should be made to thrust him, immediately, into a place of conspicuous service. This only cheapens the church, in his regard. To promote him, at once, to office, or responsible committee-work, inevitably breeds contempt in him for an organization so hard up for leadership. And it may utterly ruin him by permitting him to place too high an appraisal upon his value to the society.

It is an excellent religious psychology to "lay hands upon no man suddenly."

The newcomer, however, should be treated with such warm cordiality that he will observe how much closer is the friendship inside the church than outside. How frequently he only remarks how much more attention he was given before than afterwards.

Whatever may be the nature of the ritual whereby we render our common worship, on the first day of the week, room must be found in it for a stirring moment when the minister straightens his shoulders, and projects this splendidly challenging sentence, "I therefore beseech you, brethren, that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherunto ye are called!"

Not to sense the high significance of this charge, today, is to admit that we are workmen who have cause to be ashamed. No other institution on earth has such a background, such a heritage, such a chance! If we fail of doing for society what society now expects and demands of us, we have no alibi: we cannot complain of the tools or the timber. To miss this opportunity means that our defeat will have to be explained on the ground that we weren't quite up to it; that we lacked the faith and courage to enter our promised land; that we were unable to demonstrate our moral right to the vocation.

Many a church, if it could only make a little adventure of faith and courage in its attitude toward its interested friends on the outside, would realize new life by practicing, consistently, the processes of the great head of the church who palavered over nobody, supplicated nobody, begged for nobody's patronage—but waited to be of instant service whenever anyone called to him. Doubtless it was sometimes difficult for him to maintain that attitude. At the last, he said to the Holy City, "How oft would I have gathered thee—and ye would not!" But this was his plan. It involved a certain percent of loss, to be sure; but "as many as received him, to them gave he power."

"Cook's Tours"

By Halford E. Luccock

"ARE you taking a Cook's Tour or are you going 'on your own'?" asks the purser. That is the previous question for all globe trotters, whether they trot to the ends of the earth or only down Main Street. Every man's Pilgrim Progress is either a Cook's Tour with a machine made itinerary, safe and painless, or a venture "on your own." Not that we have a chance to decide the question as our little craft puts out on its voyage. Far from it. The grand tour of life never becomes as simple as the process of buying a steamship ticket of a certain kind. Many a man has come to harbor after an eighty years' cruise without even realizing that he has been following docilely a schedule of trips and stops laid out carefully by others and rigidly adhered to. He has been on a personally conducted tour, with a complete set of pre-digested thoughts and exclamations thrown in, to be vocalized at the points indicated. He has gone through life with about as much adventurous initiative as an express package tagged and ticketed and safely delivered.

SWARMING WITH THE HIVE

Now, I would be the last man wittingly to injure the business of Thomas Cook and Sons. I have never had the honor of knowing Mr. Thomas Cook or any of his estimable sons, yet my heart leaps up when I behold their names upon a sign. I would be an ingrate were I even to forget a day in a far port when their good Samaritan, mail-forwarding genius delivered to me a letter which, faint yet pursuing, had trailed me through several countries, a letter which brought hope, breakfast and speaking terms with a First National Bank somewhere (provided I didn't speak too long).

A Cook's Tour has served thousands of pilgrims as a shock absorber; almost as a flowery bed of ease in which unadventurous souls may be carried to the sky of foreign lands. It hits all the high spots in proper order. Cook's tourists need never worry whether it is Rome or Florence, or whether they are looking at pictures in the Louvre or Uffizzi gallery. The guide knows and it will come out all right in the end. It is so easy and makes less wear and tear on the mind and nerves. Yet travel a la Cook has cost other than money. The tripper misses things here and there. He misses the thrill of wondering whether he will ever get where he started for, and how badly broke he will be when he arrives. He misses the glorious freedom of choosing the particular brand of hotel bandit he prefers to be robbed by. He cannot follow the lure of beckoning roads which coquette with him for he is due at the next "point of interest." He must swarm with the hive when it swarms into the next gallery and register awe and ejaculate "Ah" before the next picture.

It is undeniably easier to go through life on a Cook's Tour than to zigzag through fifty years in company with the eternal question, "Where Do We Go From Here?" The other day a man in New York got on a Broadway street car at 34th Street, paid his fare, rode across the street and got off at the other side. He said to the bewildered conductor, "I would rather pay a dollar than play football with that gang on the street." He much preferred to let the street car get him across the street than to take the risk of making an end run around the crowd in mass formation, or risking a center rush on his own initiative. It is so much easier to hop on to some convenient theory or political party, doctrine or creed and leave all the responsibility and trouble of thinking to the motorman. New York City is considering a comprehensive plan for traffic regulation which contemplates the control of all street traffic for five miles in length from one central signal station. All vehicles in this area will stop and start when some invisible god flashes a light. In these days of propaganda and canned thinking vast multitudes move at the flashing lights of some invisible but colossal traffic director who flashes the lights to the copy room and then out over the country. He flashes red and the mob responds in a tremor of abhorrence at bolshevism. He flashes white and the mob moves on with a reassured delight in 100 per cent Americanism as per schedule.

MANY COOK'S TOURS

As one watches the crowd streaming into a city in the morning, if he is at all cynical, he is tempted to think that the majority are taking a Cook's Tour through life. You can almost read the water-mark on their brows—"T. Cook & Sons, No. 999." There will hardly be a thought all day which has not been carefully prepared by others. The problem of what they shall wear on their bodies has been decided for them by the twin gods of manufacturing and advertising. And what they shall wear on their minds has also been decided by the same twin powers. What they shall laugh at was decided six months before by the deities of Hollywood, California; while the magazine with the new number of a million subscribers every week and the Hearst newspaper designed for "the nine-year-old mind" stamp them like a giant steam roller, leaving men and women almost as much alike and as animated as a row of celluloid dolls.

Probably the majority of the average citizens always take a Cook's Tour when they enter the industrial world. The sight-seeing tour of the present industrial situation is conducted by the (not very) Tired Business Man. The tourists are chaperoned as efficiently as a girl's finishing school on a shopping trip. They see what the chaperone wishes them to see through the appropriate colored glasses and go through the proper reactions. The phrase, "labor union," brings to their mind the appropriate reaction—"outside agitator." The man with decided convictions on peace is gummed with the label, "sentimentalist." Those interested in democracy in industry are "dangerous reds." The beauty of the system is the economy of energy. These reactions can be secured again and again without a single wrinkle of the gray matter being disturbed. It is efficiency to the nth degree. Meanwhile the great problems of the human side of industry have never been glimpsed.

THE CHURCH A COOK'S TOUR

The church is thronged with men and women taking their religion as a Cook's Tour already marked out for them. It causes them no bother. Joseph Parker once said, "The church is a great brickmaker." It has shaped men and women into the same conventional mould. "Their not to reason why;" theirs merely to accept the form handed down as the authorized schedule. Julia Ward Howe in one of her letters speaks of going to a reception where each one seemed to have left himself at home. We have all been to parties which seemed full of wax figures sitting along the wall eating ice cream. We have been quite surprised to learn later that some of the wax figures were really live, human beings. Frequently a church includes many people who have left the best part of themselves at home. Even so daring an adventure as reciting the Apostle's Creed has been made a sleepy and monotonous Cook's Tour. They pass thoughtlessly over the great heights of human experience like passengers going over the Alps at night in a sleeping car. Sometimes, thank God, reciting the creed is the great adventure which it ought to be and trembling lips repeat, "I believe in the life everlasting," as a daring mariner in the days of discovery rounded "Cape No" in the teeth of a gale. Such an affirmation of faith is an experience like Magellan's plowing through the lonely and limitless Pacific ninety days without sight of land. One who repeats that great affirmation, "I believe in God the Father Almighty," in the face of the desolation and woe that covers the earth, has an experience like the climb of Balboa up the jagged hills of Panama until he reached the peak from which he could see the vast stretches of the Pacific. It is a rare experience of the spirit that climbs up the hard facts of life until one surmounts them and can view that love of God whose breadth is like the wideness of the sea.

THE ADVENTURE OF LIFE

There is another kind of Cook's Tour, however, which should not be forgotten and that is the "grand tour" taken by Captain James Cook with his valiant ships, the "Resolution" and "Adventure." When that stout-hearted English mariner pushed the prow of his vessel into the unknown waters of the South Pacific

He was the first that ever burst
Into that silent sea.

That is the kind of a Cook's Tour—the venture of a gentleman unafraid—to which Jesus called men when he asked them to follow him. He that loseth his life shall find it. Religion is a grand tour of the mysteries of the unseen. It is not the kind of a "grand tour" which was so popular a few centuries ago in England, that of a young man journeying over Europe in order to acquire superficial polish. Pure religion and undefiled is more like the grand tour of Europe conducted by that prince of personal conductors, John J. Pershing, who led a host of Americans in a memorable tour of northern France in behalf of the world. The voyage of life is not a picnic but a crusade. The Christian life does not find its true symbol in a Sunday School picnic at a pleasure resort, but rather in such a crusade as that in which millions of young men offered freely their lives. Thomas Carlyle had the heart of Christian philosophy when he said, "Life is not a May-game, but a battle and a march, a warfare with principalities and powers. No idle promenade through fragrant orange groves and green flowery spaces, waited on by coral muses, and the rosy hours; it is a stern pilgrimage through the rough, burning, sandy, solitudes, through regions of thick-ribbed ice." A Cook's Tour in religious thinking and activity sacrifices on the altar of conventionality the great heritage of real life. How many misshaped lives can well be described in the verses of Agnes Lee:

The snow is lying very deep,
My house is sheltered from the blast
I hear each muffled step outside,
I hear each voice go past.
But I'll not venture in the drift,
Out of this bright security,
Till enough footsteps come and go
To make a path for me.

Far better than such an epitaph is the glorious phrase left by Sir Francis Drake when he spoke of "sailing the seas with God." Perhaps Francis Drake does not stand out in our memory particularly for godliness. Nevertheless, that expression of the man who wrought so valiantly in the English Channel against the powers of darkness makes a sturdy model to guide by.

Dorothy Canfield says very keenly: "Lots of old accepted notions look to me like a good big dose of soothing syrup to get people safely past the time in their existences when they might do some sure enough personal living on their own hook." Unless we do make ventures on our own account which win for us some real religious experience, whether we are preachers or laymen, we will go through life talking about Christianity without even having tasted the real thing; just as hungry men are frequently to be seen in the streets carrying signs on their backs advertising a big dinner which they have never even smelled.

GUARDIANS OF ORTHODOXY

The self appointed guardians of opinion and belief in our churches are active agents seeking to herd the passengers on this whirling globe into Cook's Tours. They view with alarm any excursions taken on one's own initiative and responsibility. They point with pride to those who walk in lock-step formation. They seek to make the itinerary of the pilgrim between the City of Destruction and the Celestial City a straight and sheltered one, passing over the deserts of platitudes. They frown on all pioneering. Usually such guardians of the Ark regard a course of study for ministers such as is provided by the Methodist Church, not in the sense in which it is designed, as laying before the mind of the growing student Christian points of view, but as a rigid summary of opinions to be heroically gulped. Consequently they are shy at any expression of opinion which was not on the itinerary which they have followed. They are willing that the young preachers shall be led through the green pastures of John Wesley's sermons and the still waters of the Methodist discipline. But they flee from the theological Bad Lands of the modern apprehension of Christianity. To young men eager to get into the stream of present day thinking this ancient dialogue is rehearsed:

Mother, may I go out to swim?
Yes, my darling daughter,
Hang your clothes on a hickory limb,
But don't go near the water!

What the church needs tremendously is a new generation of Elizabethan Sea Dogs—preachers who are willing to steer the prow of the church into the rough waters of present day life in the spirit of Drake, Howard, Raleigh and Sir Humphrey Gilbert.

One great disadvantage of present day drives and movements in the church is that they tend to transform the quickening experience of worship into a Cook's Tour over a long itinerary of "special days" which follow each other with all the monotony of a railroad time table. The congregation becomes somewhat like the occupants of a sight-seeing car in which all the details of various organizations are pointed out through a megaphone announcing alternately: "On your right you see the Woman's Foreign Mission Society which has 109,174 members and furnished 214,999 meals last year in 23 different languages." Followed next Sunday by, "On your left you see the Tract and Publication Society which produced last year 84,911,688 pages of printed literature." It is reported (on poor authority) that the sanhedrin of one promotion agency was once humiliated to discover that the month of March, instead of having four Sundays, as any respectable month should have, had five, and the fifth Sunday was left entirely unprovided for! Consternation reigned, for there was no telling what might happen if the congregation had a whole Sunday at leisure to worship God! A composer once wrote a piece containing a long part for the cornet player. The piece was first rate in every way except that it could not possibly be played because the composer did not leave any place for the cornet player to take a breath. Frequently a local congregation is trying to sound out the cornet player's notes without having a chance to stop to fill its lungs with a breath of inspiration.

Don Marquis has written some verses, apparently flippant in their form, but which are a model declaration of independence for all globe trotters who do not intend to spend their whole lives following Cook's Tours. Here is the way he has planned to spend the years after reaching the promising age of eighty:

But when I'm eighty I intend
To turn a fool again for twenty years or so;
Go back to being twenty-five,
Drop caution and conventions, join some little group
Fantastically rebel and alive,
And revolte, from soup
To nuts; I'll reimburse myself
For all the freak stuff that I've had to keep upon the shelf;
Indulge my crotchets, be the friend of man,
And pull the thoughts I've always had to can—
I'm looking forward to a rough, rebellious, unrespectable old age,
Kicking the world uphill
With laughter shrill
And squeals of high pitched throaty rage.

Industry and Christ's Ideals

By Sherwood Eddy

A BUSINESS man writes:

"I have twice read your article in The Christian Century of Dec. 29, on "The Church at the Crossroads," and have been very much interested. It is a severe arraignment of the employer class and of the church, and makes us study as to our duty, both as employers and church members. We wish you had suggested ways and methods for constructive efforts. I believe most business men really desire to handle their business on thoroughly humanitarian lines and are glad of practical suggestions. Can you assist such men with ideas that are possible of development in sane and practical ways?"

I did not in my previous article intend to be severe on the employer class. I belong to it myself. The finest men I have known have been the great hearted Christian business men who are trying to solve this problem. I hold no brief for labor and deprecate the misguided leadership of some of the labor unions. I believe in the common humanity behind employer and employe alike, and that a solution may be found by co-operation between the two. I have found no panacea, no adequate answer to the problem in any one system or program. I am not a socialist nor do I believe that socialism offers the solution. Neither, apparently, does syndicalism, nor the guild system or any other single panacea. For myself I am driven back to the principles taught by Jesus Christ as the only final basis for a solution. The question asked above is a fair one and I will try to give a fair answer.

The industrial problem is a crucial issue before the world today. It is the fundamental problem of Europe. It must be faced in America. What are the foundations upon which we may base a solution? There are certain principles of truth and of right that are grounded alike in reason, in conscience, and in experience. Some of them have been voiced by the great philosophers; some have been taught by the moralists; all of them were taught and exemplified explicitly and implicitly by Jesus of Nazareth.

THREE GREAT PRINCIPLES

As we study his teachings certain great principles emerge. He views all life in the light of God as the loving Father of all men, in whom life finds its origin, worth and meaning. He sums up life in the twofold command to love God with all our heart and our neighbor as ourselves. Thus we are fully to share our life with God and men. In our social relations with men three great principles are laid down in his teaching as basic and fundamental.

In the love and purpose of God the individual man is of infinite worth. We might call this the principle of personality, or the incalculable worth of every individual human life. Second, in the relation of men to each other Jesus teaches the principle of brotherhood, that no man lives by himself or to himself alone, but that all men are bound together under one Father, in one human family, mutually related and interdependent, in a corporate relationship in social solidarity. Third, this relationship between men is fulfilled not in isolated, independent self-seeking, but in mutual service as the motive and expression of life, realized in the fulfillment of the creative and social functions rather than in the acquisitive and selfish instincts for private gain.

Based upon these, and following naturally as corollaries from them, are three other principles equally fundamental. Grounded upon the worth of the individual is the principle of liberty, implying equal opportunity of self-realization, as necessary for the development of personality. Founded upon brotherhood is the principle of justice as the equal right of all members of the human family to a "more abundant life." Finally, Christ sums up all his teachings in the great commandment of love, as the full sharing of life with indomitable good will, as the fulfillment of the law and the prophets, the essence of the gospel, and the central meaning of life. We are to love God and our neighbor as ourselves and to apply this all-embracing principle of love in the golden rule, to do to others as we would be done by. We thus have six fundamental social principles in the teaching of Jesus—personality, brotherhood, service, liberty, justice, and love, the fulfillment of them all. Let us examine these six principles and ask what is their application to the industrial problem of our day.

PERSONALITY

Jesus teaches the incalculable and equal worth of every man as brother, before God as Father. Man is a child of God, made in his image, with the power of an endless life, capable of infinite development. Man is always recognized as an end, never a means to an end. We are to seek first the kingdom of God, which is a brotherhood of men, and "things" will be added. Jesus teaches that a man is worth more than the whole material world. He especially bids us care for the lost, the poor, the disinherited, the unprivileged.

If man is of infinite worth, is not the supreme test of industry, as of every other institution, its social value, its effect on men, whether it makes or mars manhood? Thus labor is more than a commodity; it is more than a means to the end of property; it represents living men of infinite worth.

Should not the first charge on industry be the adequate support and protection of all the workers, including:

- a. A standard of living in decency and comfort?
- b. Provision for continuity of employment or social insurance against forced unemployment?
- c. The regulation of hours for the social good?
- d. Provision for health and safety, with special safeguards for the work of women and children?

A practical application of the worth of the individual is found in the growing recognition of the importance of the human factor in industry on the part of the more progressive employers in America, and in Great Britain. The work of Mr. Seeborn Rowntree in the Rowntree Cocoa works of York, England, affords a good example. Over half of the profits of the firm have already been returned to the community, invested in education, investigation, a model village, and an effort to raise the standard of living, not only for his own employes, but for the labor of Britain. With practically all the employers of England, he recognizes that labor has the same right as capital to organize and choose its own representatives. He says he would prefer to have collective bargaining, recognizing the right of workers to choose their own representatives in or out of his shop, and get a settlement based on justice that will be kept, rather than to be always settling difficulties with irresponsible and discontented labor. Under present conditions in industry, he believes in five legitimate demands of labor:

(1) The fixing of a minimum wage for all workers, which would enable a man to marry, to live in a decent home, and to bring up a family of normal size in a state of efficiency, leaving a reasonable margin for contingencies and recreation. (2) the limitation of hours of the working week, and a bill to secure a forty-eight hour week as a maximum for all England. He himself, always in advance of the legal minimum, has adopted a forty-four hour week. (3) Insurance against unemployment, which shall be universal and compulsory. It is this fear of unemployment that haunts the worker and is often his chief cause of discontent. On an average, only five per cent of the men in Britain are out of employment. Mr. Rowntree proposes a plan entered into by the workers, the employers, and the state to remove this fear forever. If the worker pays one per cent of his wages, the industry two per cent of the wage bill, and the state makes a relatively small grant, all bona fide labor can be guaranteed either suitable employment or adequate maintenance during unemployment. Mr. Rowntree already has a similar plan in operation in his own factory. (4) To give the workers some share of democratic control in determining the conditions under which they shall work. He has already instituted a series of industrial councils in his own works. (5) Labor should have a larger share in the product of industry, and more adequate remuneration for services rendered. To secure the worker's cordial support for increased output, he must be given a more direct interest in the prosperity of the industry.

BROTHERHOOD

Before God as Father, we are brothers in the one human family. We are to love our neighbor as ourselves, and to do to others as we would be done by. We are members of one social organism, bound together in social solidarity, mutually dependent, and inevitably affecting one another's welfare. Brotherhood involves friendly relationship each for all and all for each, the sympathetic knowledge of and concern for all associated in industry, employers and employed alike, but it also involves co-operation, precluding selfish competition based primarily upon private gain, which produces mutual fear, bitterness, and class strife.

If brotherhood implies friendly relationships and precludes merciless competition based upon selfish gain, is this an empty utopian dream of an impractical idealist, or a practical principle that may be realized in the modern industrial world?

Among countless illustrations of the principle of brotherhood, we may take the co-operatives of England and the continent. In 1844, in the mutual endeavor to escape debt and penury, twenty-eight humble weavers of Rochdale, England, started a co-operative movement, each investing one pound, taking turns in managing their little store. Today, instead of twenty-eight men, four million families, embracing some fifteen million persons, or a quarter of the population of Great Britain, are enrolled in more than fifteen hundred co-operative societies with annual sales of approximately a billion dollars, and a bank turnover of two billions, or an amount greater than the annual budget of the American government up to the outbreak of the war. These humble toilers by mutual co-operation have not only escaped debt, but now own their own coal mines in Britain, their wheatlands in Canada, their tea and sugar plantations in India, their factories for the making of clothing, shoes, and furniture, their fishing fleets and dairy farms. They have vindicated the practical application of the principle of brotherhood. It is maintained by some that men will not work unless given unlimited right to the amassing of huge personal profit. This, if true, would be a terrible indictment of human nature. Christ believed in men, and the society of the future will progress in proportion as it has the courage to live in his spirit and to apply his principles to life.

SERVICE

Service is the highest expression of life according to the teaching of Jesus. His purpose was to minister, not to be ministered unto for his own selfish profit. He clearly calls all who would follow him to this dominant aim of service rather than private profit. Whatever we do to the least of men whom he counts as his brethren we do to him, and this is the final test and judgment of our life.

If, then, service is the supreme expression of all life, and man is capable of responding to the highest, should not the dominant motive of industry be service to the community, rather than profit to the individual? Should not production be primarily for use rather than for private gain?

Does not service involve the maximum development of industry for the social good—not the selfish limitation of production either by capital or labor? In the spirit of service, neither capital nor labor will seek to get a maximum and give a minimum, but both will aim to produce the maximum for the common good.

If service and not private gain is the test of life it would be an insult to ask what profit the great Wilberforce made in the freeing of the slaves of Britain, or Abraham Lincoln in the emancipation of those in America. What profit did Livingstone make in his vast service for the Dark Continent? It would be an insult to ask what profit Herbert Hoover has made in feeding the starving children of Belgium and the continent of Europe. He is poorer by a large fortune, but the world is richer for his great human service. Let each individual student and business man ask whether service or profit is the final motive that dominates his life today. Which controls our ambition for the future—the amassing of a fortune for personal profit, or the measure of service by which you can enrich humanity? Are we seeking primarily to get or to give; are we living for selfishness or service, for mammon or God? Are we living under a pagan or a Christian conception of life? Let us not render idle lip-service to Christ and call him "Lord, Lord," if we are not willing to do the things he says, if we are going out merely for our own personal profit and the crucifixion of Christ afresh in the least of these his brethren, the hungry, the sick, the homeless, the penniless, the unemployed.

The development of personality requires freedom for self-realization, self-expression, and self-determination. "Lordship" or "authority" from without implies the repression of personality, treating the individual as a thing controlled by and for another. Christ, in his opening sermon at Nazareth, proclaimed his program for humanity, as good tidings to the poor, release for captives, freedom for the oppressed, and the year of jubilee or liberty for all.

The whole history of humanity shows the development of the idea of freedom. The test of every human institution is its development of "the good life," whether it liberates or enslaves, realizes or represses the higher life of man. Christ tests the law, the sabbath, pharisaism, and the institutions of his day by their contribution to life. His great work was to liberate from bondage, to make men whole in body, mind, and spirit. Centuries later, in the light of his teaching, men tested slavery by its fruits and abolished it. In like manner political liberty was gained as a necessary requisite for man's highest development. So today, we must test our social and industrial life. Does modern industry develop man or often make him a cog, a hand, a machine, a commodity to be bought and sold in the labor market, with little or no control over the conditions of his industrial life, or over the adequate sharing of its production?

Does not the liberty of the individual for full development exclude the autocratic control of one person by another and require the gradual growth of democracy? We conceive that democracy not only applies in government, but that all of wealth, education, leisure, culture, art, religion, industry—in short, all of life—should be in the interest of all the people, growingly administered by all the people, for all the people.

If men are more than a commodity or a mere means to an end for the profit of others, have not all who toil in industry a right to some share in determining the conditions under which they shall work?

Have not all who labor, whether as employers or employed, the right to organize for their mutual protection and welfare, or is this the right of employers alone?

Under the principle of liberty, have not all workers, employers and employed alike, the right to choose their own representatives for industrial conference? Or, should the workers who constitute the large majority be compelled—uneducated and inadequately represented—to be subject to the autocratic control of a minority which exercises the right of collective organization, possessing an overwhelming financial, legal, political, and commercial concentration of power, which it denies to the majority?

From the first chapter of the Bible which contains the Magna Charta of human liberty, man was created "to replenish the earth, and subdue it; and to have dominion," not over his fellow-men to exploit them, but over the forces of nature in the full development of his free creative spirit. For many centuries man has been struggling on toward the realization of this God-given heritage of freedom. Yesterday, today, and forever there is a deathless demand in the depths of his soul for democracy, for liberty, and for justice.

We may, by coercive laws administered in the interest of a special class, deny the right of men to strike. But the only ultimate prevention of strikes is the justice and humanity of a square deal for all. Nor can the measure of justice be determined by the privileged minority for the majority whose life they do not share or understand.

When the writer asked Mr. Whitley, founder of the Whitley Councils, speaker of the house of commons, and himself a great employer, his views concerning collective bargaining, he replied, "We employers in Great Britain regard collective bargaining, or the right of workers to choose their own representatives where they will, as both inevitable and desirable. It is inevitable and cannot be successfully resisted. It is desirable in that we get better results by the cordial recognition of the unions, by mutual co-operation and good will, rather than by repression and the denial of their equal rights."

JUSTICE

Jesus warns against the folly and wrong of the selfish accumulation of wealth. He utters his woes against the selfish rich, and says how hardly shall they enter the kingdom of God, repeatedly calling men to give, and to share their possessions. He bitterly denounces the pharisees for their neglect of justice and mercy, for their covetousness and exploitation of the poor.

In the light of Jesus' stern denunciation of the selfish accumulation of wealth, and of failure to relieve the poor, can we justify and accept as final and inevitable the present unhealthy congestion of wealth for the privileged few and poverty for many in the unprivileged class of society? Is it Christian to seek to grow rich in a poor world?

Does not justice involve the right to democratic equality of opportunity for the highest and fullest life of all?

If justice and righteousness are fundamentals in the teaching of Jesus, if he condemns the unlimited, selfish accumulation of wealth, and arraigns the pharisees, with all their religious zeal, for their neglect of justice and mercy, their covetousness and exploitation of the poor, how does this principle apply to the present social order? Was it justice in Russia when the czar and the privileged aristocracy and plutocracy possessed vast estates of hundreds of thousands of acres in extent, while the masses of the landless peasants toiled in poverty, crushed by inhumanity for centuries?

Is it justice in aristocratic England if seven men own a large portion of the city of London, if five hundred peers own one-third of England, and four thousand landlords own nearly half of Britain, if one-tenth of the people possess nine-tenths of the wealth and the remaining nine-tenths have but one-tenth of the wealth?

As in Britain and Europe, so in America, approximately one-tenth of the people possess nine-tenths of the wealth, and at the bottom of the scale nine-tenths of the population possess the remaining one-tenth. The vast majority are born without land, without a home, tools, or means of livelihood save as they depend without security upon casual employment, at the mercy of our present unequal and unjust industrial system.

LOVE

The social teachings of Jesus are summed up in the all-inclusive principle of love, or self-giving. He views the world in the light of the ideal of the kingdom of God, involving a Christian social order, the moral organization of mankind, summed up in the command to love our neighbor, and applied in the golden rule, to do to others as we would be done by.

If the golden rule is the end of the law and the prophets and the very essence of the gospel can we say that it is being widely applied under present conditions in industry? Are we prepared to apply it so far as in us lies in our personal, social, and business life? Was not the whole world war one terrible lesson of the result of failing to apply these principles of Jesus to life? Was not the war simply one symptom of the underlying strife of the present unjust social and industrial order? Peace is the result of a way of life which largely we have rejected in our industrial, social and political life.

How can this great principle of love, or self-giving in service and sacrifice, be translated and incarnated in life? Let us take an illustration of an Oxford student, Arnold Toynbee. Instead of seeking a selfish vacation in idle ease and pleasure, he went down one summer into the London slums to share the privilege of his education with those to whom it was denied. This work carried on by Canon Barnett and others led to the founding of Toynbee Hall. His successor, Mr. J. J. Mallon, is conducting this work of social service, where a score of university men are sharing their education with the unprivileged mass in the poverty-stricken slums of London. Sharing their life and knowing their conditions led Mr. Mallon and others to the founding of the Anti-Sweating League which has largely driven sweated labor from the shops of Britain. This led on to the passage of the Trade Boards act. Now, instead of settling wages by heartless competition with the most merciless employer, they are settled by legal sanction by the best minds of England. On a Trade Board half the members are appointed by labor, half represent the employers, while three neutral experts are appointed by the minister of labor on behalf of the government. The wage scale of an entire industry is thus settled impartially, nationally and legally. Thus the standard of living has been steadily lifted for some five millions in labor.

Are not these six principles of personality, brotherhood, service, liberty, justice, and love, grounded alike in the authority of conscience, and of reason and experience? Are they not the only solution of the crucial problems of the age, and does not the hope of the world lie in our applying them in our own lives and to the present social order? Do not the social principles of Jesus stand in clear contrast with much of the practice of the world today, in the ultimate issue between idealism and materialism, God and mammon, the Christian and the pagan view of life?

Poincare—A Bad Omen

THE resignation of Briand and the calling of Poincare to the premiership of France is a bad omen for the future of the Anglo-French entente, and for a pacific future in Europe. The only hope is that Poincare will fall soon. Poincare is not only ambitious but is a nationalist of the narrowest type and has small confidence in the league of nations, or any method other than "the good old method," as Clemenceau called it, of a balance of power. That is doubtless the secret of his proposition to put a stop to "supreme councils" of premiers and to resort to the conventional and cumbersome machinery of the embassies. The possession of power and influence of a steadily emerging liberal opinion in France may curb his radical nationalism and intransigence, but so far as his record since the war goes it is one of bitter-enderism, rabid, almost chauvinistic nationalism and the last-pound-of-flesh policy toward Germany. His intimation that the Briand-Lloyd George agreement for a guarantee by England against possible German attack is not satisfactory unless it offers a compensatory guarantee by France to England means a demand for an alliance—a strong link in the chain French diplomacy has been attempting to forge through alliances with Poland, Hungary, Turkey and the Balkan states, Bulgaria excepted.

* * *

Poincare's Nationalism

The new Premier has expressed his policy in a relentless warfare upon every proposal to modify the peace terms in favor of reconstruction. His ambition has shown itself in his opposition, first, of Clemenceau for, as he accused, allowing Lloyd George to outwit him at Versailles, then of Briand for pursuing more pacific means toward reconstruction. He has successfully opposed the Rathenau-Loucheur agreement by which Germany would repay some seven billion marks in kind. He declared in the Silesian dispute that "Germany must not be left in the possession of those powerful industries which permitted her to continue the war in spite of the blockade," i. e., she must be sheared clean of iron and coal. He is the titular leader of that strident party of the far Right which demands that France keep the Rhineland forever and occupy the Ruhr upon the first pretext. His theory has consistently been that France will never be safe with any but a ruined Germany, therefore she should make the Rhine a permanent, "natural" barrier and take over those great industrial districts, such as the Ruhr and the Saar, while giving Poland, her military ally, the rich Silesian industrial district. He has recently said, regarding Germany's petition for a moratorium on reparations—"The time has come to tell the Germans, as at Verdun, 'Stop—thus far and no farther,'" and but for England he would doubtless celebrate his winning of the premiership by marching into the Ruhr and assuming charge of German finances in her richest industrial centers.

The grim ruthlessness of his viewpoint was recently expressed by one of his supporting organs in the following words: "German resources are not to be measured by a depreciated paper mark, but by Germany's labor, Germany's exploitation of her natural resources, by German commercial and industrial yield, upon which we have first option and from which we are entitled, by the treaty of Versailles, to help ourselves by the methods we care to choose." England looks upon his coming into power gravely, but doubtless Lloyd George will try his amazing arts upon him with confidence. The Italian press is almost unanimously apprehensive, the most favorable editorial quoted, so far as we have seen, saying that "a grave threat to the peace of Europe arises with Poincare, a threat of renewed penalties, renewed occupation of the Ruhr and renewed rattling of the saber on the Rhine." Its hope is that these threats cannot be carried out, for "it is a very different thing to talk about guarantees and sanctions and to transform them into political reality." It adds that failure to his policy must surely come, either through the fortunes of politics compelling him to change his bitter-ender policy or through failure—"a failure which will humiliate and bring France to a clear conception of reality and to a greater control of herself."

Poincare vs. Clemenceau

It is rather contradictory to find a feud between Clemenceau, supported by Andre Tardieu, and Poincare. It began at Versailles and illustrates very poignantly the intransigence of the new premier. Clemenceau had no use for Wilson's idealism. He sneeringly referred to him in asides as "the savior of the world." But he did feel the need of England's good will, so he maneuvered to keep Lloyd George in bond. Poincare demanded the permanent occupation of the Rhineland. Clemenceau had to face Lloyd George's desire for a very short occupation of two years and preferably none. The best he could do was to get Article 430 through with a provision that should full satisfaction not be given by Germany by 1935 the occupation can be continued. Clemenceau, speaking through Tardieu, claims this will make occupation permanent because it not only provides that Germany must give full satisfaction on indemnities but that France must also have the guarantee of both America and England as proposed in the treaty accepted by Wilson and Lloyd George but refused by the U. S. Senate.

Tardieu hints that Clemenceau never conceived that America would accept that treaty and therefore craftily played Lloyd George and got just what Poincare demands. But Poincare replies that the fault in the Articles from 429 to 431 is that they do not allow France to act alone. He says with brutal directness, we cannot say to Germany "we are going to remain on the Rhine because the United States and Great Britain have not ratified the promises of ex-President Wilson and Mr. Lloyd George. Germany would reply to us, 'Article 431 forbids you to raise that pretext.'" He argued, at Versailles, that even if America and England signed such a treaty of guarantee the treaty itself should provide for permanent occupation of the Rhine because no guarantee could bring instantaneous help or insure the indemnities. Lloyd George opposed on the grounds that such occupation meant sure war in the future and Poincare called that an "obsession" of the British premier's. He is said to have agreed with Foch who exclaimed "the high court for Clemenceau," meaning he should be impeached because he failed to make the Rhine France's frontier. He has been the leader of those who out-Clemenceaud Clemenceau in his theory that there were twenty million Germans too many and that therefore Germany should be skinned and boned by taking away all means of industrial progress or recovery; in other words the only safe Germany is a ruined Germany, and her ruin must yet be accomplished by a strong policy of literal enforcement of the treaty.

The French- English Rift

Lord Derby and Briand may talk tremulously of the unbreakable bonds between England and France, but Lord

Curzon speaks more by grim reality when he says "the conscience of the world will not tolerate the reappearance in the heart of Europe of a great and dangerous power which is always rattling the sword." His words were aimed undisguisedly at France and caused a diplomatic sensation, but extremist editors replied, "England needs us more than we need her. She has illnesses from which we never suffer. We have the military power. If we only wished it we could have freedom of movement. The opportunity is a good one for France to free herself and to take a role other than that of a controlled power." The Temps says, "However faithful our friendship to England it is our right to be ourselves and to carry out a French policy in Poland and Upper Silesia." The Liverpool Post replies that "to leave a friend in the lurch is not the British way, but the friend must be reasonable." Her (France's) policies of huge military expenditures and impossible indemnities will bring her sure disaster." We have before told in these columns of an English statesman of the old school, a man often talked of for a future premier, saying to us last summer that it was quite possible that, unless France changed her ways, England and Germany would enter an understanding to curb her within the next fifteen years. The reply of the French nationalist is that "a proud solitude is better than a gilded leash." The extremists make no hesitancy to say that France has the most powerful military force in the world and can afford to cut all bonds if she can keep political alliances with Poland and the new Balkan states.

The divergence of French and British viewpoints is implicit in their national interests; England's is economic; France's is political. England is a manufacturing country and lives by export trade; France is largely agricultural and supports herself. Before the war Germany was England's best customer, buying a billion dollars worth of goods from her annually, and the slogan now being sounded in Britain is "trade is better than any amount of indemnities"; some are frankly advocating the abrogation of all German payments and the cancelling of all debts by one nation to another as a means of restoring credit, deflating money and resuming international commerce. France has $46,000,000,000 of debt and thinks Germany should pay a large part of it. This huge sum equals one-half her total national possessions and is growing greater daily. She clings to the political as against the economic method of reconstruction and relies upon the balance of power idea plus the serfdom of Germany for a half century to pay and keep the peace.

Signs of Sanity in France

Signs of sanity are not wanting in France. There is a growing number who feel the old balance of power idea is insanity. They are not satisfied with Poincare's lip service to the League of Nations and practically every by-election has gone in their favor. They demand the demobilization of at least one-half the huge army of six hundred thousand and the approval of the Rathenau-Loucheur contract for reconstruction through the Germans furnishing some 7,000,000,000 marks in goods and services. They accept the Briand-Lloyd George arrangement for British help in event of attack by Germany without an old type alliance such as Poincare demands. They are willing to make the demand for "moral disarmament" something other than the hypocritical assertion that France, with the greatest military establishment Europe has seen in a century is "morally disarmed," but must keep a million men in barracks and on armed reserve because, as a deputy recently pictured to the chamber, Germany is laying military railroads toward Strasbourg, hiding great military stores in the Black Forest, manufacturing artillery at Koenigsburg and secretly training millions for a sudden descent upon a disarmed France.

"To be a good Frenchman one must be a good European," says a French Liberal. There is a choice of ways, says The Europe Nouvelle;—"to crush Germany to assure France's future" or "to connect France's cause with that of world reconstruction," and it ably advocates the latter. "Briand," writes Anatole France, perhaps the greatest living Frenchman, "tell a victim to this chamber, which is ignorant and violent, whose international motive is hate, which sees dangers that do not exist and not those that do, which has behind it the army and the capitalists and the clericals. What is not sufficiently understood here is that the fate of France is bound up with that of Europe as a whole. France can not be prosperous in a Europe which is suffering. We are faced with a great danger today of a France isolated in the midst of a Europe which is not yet pacified."

British Table Talk

THERE has been a remarkable chorus of hope to greet the new year. All our philosophers and teachers agree that the turn has been taken, and we have begun to recover from the fever of the "peace." Mr. Garvin's headlines in The Observer are significant:

"LIFT UP YOUR HEARTS"
 "NEW YEAR AND NEW HOPE"
 "A FORCED LIQUIDATION OF FOLLY"
 "REUNION OF EUROPE"
 "THE SAVING POLICY"

From these heads it is not difficult to construct the counsels of cheer which this eager and masterly writer pours forth this week. But he is not alone. So far as the press speaks the mind of our people, we are beginning the year with a good heart. Punch has represented the old year as bequeathing to the new year "peace, falling prices and an umbrella nearly as good as new." Amid this chorus there is room for someone to point out, as Mr. Basil Mathews has done, that everything depends upon the question, Who is to take the helm of the barque of humanity? His words are addressed to the Congregationalists, but they need not end there; they are not signed but no one who knows Mr. Mathews could fail to detect his hand:

"The supreme and decisive issue for ourselves, and the world, is that Christ should take the helm. Everything begins there. Without him there can be no forward movement for ourselves, or for our church, or for the world. To have him in control—seated there at the helm—is already to have, in the fullest and most glorious and final sense, our forward movement. With Christ at the tiller our church will go forward to meet, with conquering vitality, every difficulty and danger that confronts her, triumphant in achieving the purpose for which she was created—the world-wide kingdom of God."

Memories of 1921

This hopeful outlook goes along with a very general admission that 1921 was a dark year. "The year 1921," says The Times, "inherited from its predecessor a peace so imperfect and burdens so heavy that from the outset it could hardly be expected at the best to prove other than a period of slow and tortuous recuperation." In the same review the writer describes the political year in one phrase—"Pliable's Year"; but he hastens to say that there is no discredit in this title. The country was governed indeed by opportunism but with the assent of the governed. For those who look for a new earth the year will not be remembered with any great joy. But perhaps it was the darkest hour before the dawn.

The Redemption of 1921

"For those who read the story of 1921 according to the spiritual values, there may be already in their personal lives some enduring gain which singles out this year. One hour of vision, one word of courage spoken, one deed of service, in which they took up their cross—these things may live and mark this year. But when mankind seeks to know what has redeemed 1921 in the whole range of its life, no one can say yet with any finality. All the reports are not returned yet; some gain, unknown to men now, may make this year shine out in undying splendor. One thing alone can be said with assurance before the world turns its face forward: out of the past year only that can live which belongs to the kingdom of God, and nothing that belongs to that kingdom can ever perish. But the book, so far as that year is concerned, is closed."

For this again I am indebted to The Times, which does not hesitate to allow its columns to become a pulpit now and then; and always on Saturday. There are some journalists who still think articles frankly religious to be poor copy. But most of our alert editors are quick enough to see that there is a widespread eagerness to listen to a spiritual message. Only it has to be of the right character. The conventional sermon is not needed in the press. Is it needed anywhere? No one wants what school boys call "pi-jaw."

The Free Catholics

Tomorrow it falls to my lot to represent before the Free Catholics why there was and is in the Reformed Churches a rejection of the ancient ceremonial of the church. The general subject of the conference is worship. My friends among the Free Catholics—a remarkably able and gallant band—have asked me to tell them why. It has been a valuable discipline to think out the answer. It amounts to this: When the experience came to men of a direct personal relation through faith with a sin-bearing and sin-forgiving Lord, they found that there was no expression possible for this reality within the confines even of the wonderful ritual of the medieval church. That had become first of all an institution; and its ceremonial was that of a sacred court: they needed a fellowship with opportunities of fresh, simple, spontaneous outpourings of the soul. And when they were told that the entire system of worship in all its parts and in all its details was ordained by God's will they could not help thinking of God as they had come to know and love him, and they said to themselves, "It is not like Him!" It looks as though the ancient distinction between the synagogue and the temple is still valid. Some of us are not ashamed to belong to the meeting-house; we are not without love and sympathy for the temple, but we are not altogether at home there. It is more than likely that even in the Roman community there are some with a leaning towards the synagogue; but speaking on general term, Rome stands in the tradition of the temple, Protestantism in that of the synagogue. They do say that some recent converts to Rome have been shocked by the "low church" ways of certain Roman communities.

"If Winter Comes"

The novel by Mr. A. S. M. Hutchinson with the title, "If Winter Comes," stands out among the novels of 1921. It is a story throbbing with life and passion; and it raises many questions of life and death; the reading of it came late to me, but such a book is not one to be taken at the moment, and afterwards laid aside. One fine passage from the hero—and he is a real hero,—must be given; it sets forth a point of view not uncommon in these days; and the church must pay heed to it:

"But I tell you, Hapgood, that plumb down in the crypt and abyss of every man's soul is a hunger, a craving for other food than this earthly stuff. And the churches know it; and instead of reaching down to him what he wants—light, light—instead of that they invite him to dancing and picture shows, and you're a jolly good fellow, and religion's a jolly fine thing and no spoilsport, and all that sort of latter-day tendency. Why man, he can get all that outside the churches and get it better. Light, light! He wants light, Hapgood. And the padres come down and drink beer with him, and dance jazz with him, and call it making religion a Living Thing in the Lives of the People. Lift the hearts of the people to God, they say, by showing them that religion is not incompatible with having a jolly fine time. And there's no God there that a man can understand for him to be lifted up to."

Losses in 1921

Among the eminent divines who have died during the past year there must be mentioned Dr. F. F. Ridgeway, Bishop of Salisbury; Dr. Hodgson, Bishop of Ct. Edmundsbury and Ipswich; Canon Edgar Sheppard, Subdean of the Chapels Royal; Dr. Jayne, late Bishop of Chester; Dr. Walsh, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin; Dr. A. Whyte, formerly Principal of New College, Edinburgh; Principal Forsyth; Dr. Monro Gibson; Dr. G. P. Gould, Principal of Regent's Park College; Canon J. W. Horsley.

A Resolve for the New Year

Here is a great passage from that noble painter, Burne-Jones; it deserves to be set up in big type:

"Here's this rickety old mactocosm of a world full of maladies and evil humors, purblind, decrepit, paralytic, stumbling and staggering along through a welter of thick mist where she can only just see to take her next step towards nowhere by the 'wan waters' in the puddles. Poor old thing! What does she know of beauty or truth, or love, or God? She has heard tell of such things, but where are they for her? If she did but know! If she did but know! Listen, you can hear her: 'Who will show us any good?' . . . Why then, yon little, tiny, insignificant whipper-snapper of a microcosm he ups and says, says he: 'I will! Mother! It's little enough as I or any can do for you, but what I can do by the splendor of God I will!'"

Ambassadors of God

By S. PARKES CADMAN

In this book, just from the press, Dr. Cadman, well-known Brooklyn preacher, maintains that the outstanding truths for preachers to proclaim are few, simple and experimental. He bids them find these truths in the Scriptures and shows how their greater peers in the Christian church through all the centuries have taken this Scripture material, and shaped it, each to the needs of his own generation.

The Promise of His Coming

An Historical Interpretation of the Idea of the Second Advent

By CHESTER McCOWN, Ph. D.

Professor of New Testament Religion, Pacific
School of Religion.

DR. McCOWN argues that we cannot continue to maintain a doctrine (as men do the buttons on their coat sleeves) because it was once useful. But he characterizes as dangerous presumption the confession of complete indifference to the Second Advent made by so many clergymen and laymen.

His deep respect for Scripture compelled him to believe that the Second Advent could never have played so important a role in the early church, and in the thought of Paul and Jesus, except for the presence of values that should be an indispensable part of Christian thinking and feeling in every age.

Not as a controversialist out for a partisan victory in the feud between pre- and post-millennialists, but as a reporter, he here sets down the rich discoveries that have rewarded his search for this overlooked treasure.

"A Double Portion of Thy Spirit"*

HERE are men of such impetuous, daring and dramatic lives that only death in a storm, or in battle, or in a fire seems climactic. Such was Elijah. He was a man of blood and fire, as the story goes, he rode to glory in a chariot of flame. Just what this was I do not know. It sounds like folk-lore. Whatever it was it has no effect upon our character. Stories gathered about the hermits and about the medieval saints, why not around the heroes of this childish age? Elijah was a man who stabbed the priests of Baal, who rejoiced in the desert storms; in death he rode the fiery chariot and was drawn by the fiery steeds. I cannot find bread for my soul in this unless it be the manner of death of the righteous. They say that Alexander Campbell died triumphantly, that the grand old man lay looking out of the western window watching the heavy clouds break for the setting sun, and that as the last golden rays of the king of day broke through he murmured, "At evening it shall be light," and passed to his reward. Moody rode to heaven in a chariot of fire. His last noble words were, as the chariot swung into the sky, "Earth is receding, heaven is opening, God is calling me." Goethe cried out, "Light, light, more light." Wiclif died in the afternoon just as a storm was ending and over the English landscape the flood of golden light of the setting sun was sweeping. He too rode to heaven in a chariot of fire. Noble men die nobly and dying they pass into the light of eternity. But this is poetry. Get what you must out of the chariot of fire. Believe it was a real chariot of flame if you will, believe the steeds of living fire if you must—what of it? No essential doctrine is disturbed thereby. Many a fiery soul has leapt into the sky. Read of the death of Savonarola. Read about Latimer and Ridley, burned at the stake near Balliol College, Oxford. Read of the fire-swept Christians in Nero's gardens. Read of the saints who have burned themselves up in holy service. But this is poetry again. Elijah's death does not trouble me, for he lived a glorious life of battle and struggle. The way in which he got to heaven does not much perplex me, for I feel sure he arrived. I feel sure he is there now—the method of the transportation of a soul does not worry me, however interesting it might be to discuss in the light of modern science. We believe that our friends do live on and that they will know us and we them. That is enough.

But that prayer of Elisha—that does interest us—that spells power. "Let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me." He was a young man. He faced tremendous problems. The old conditions still persisted, the old false religions still had to be dealt with. Not tasks for his powers, but powers for his tasks, was his prayer. And so as the old man, ready for translation, and the young man, ready for his testing, walk together Elisha, with commendable wisdom, with beautiful meekness, asks that as the mantle is transferred to his shoulders a double portion of the old prophet's spirit may be his. Spirit was all that Elijah had to give; silver and gold had he none. There was no quarreling over his will. He left a great spirit—what richer heritage! It is soul that the world needs in these dead days after the war—soul in business—soul in art—soul in music—soul in workmen—soul in employers—soul in sermons—soul in parents—soul in teachers—we are in danger of losing our souls in these mechanical days. It was not that Elisha felt that he would need twice as much power as Elijah possessed, but that he desired above all things twice as much spiritual strength as any other young prophet might possess under similar circumstances. Fathers have given this spiritual power. At a banquet given at Yale the elder Dwight listened to the praise of his son, then the president, unable to stand the praise in silence longer, the old man rose to his feet and said: "He ought to be a taller man than I; he stands on my shoulders." What spiritual gifts disciples have received from their masters. Who can measure the gift to the young men who followed Socrates, who attended him as he rode into the heavens by the road of the fiery cup? Who shall tell us what Angelo bequeathed to his brilliant pupil? Who can estimate what St. Francis gave to his order in the days of simplicity? And Jesus—our blessed Master—consider his heritage to the twelve—and his rich gifts to us. We would do well to pray for his spirit—more of his spirit. Going away, he promised us this gift. As disciples of this Master what prayer could we more fittingly make—"Let Thy spirit be upon me."

"If No One Else Has Anything to Say, I Will Say a Few Words About California Climate"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR—Greetings from southern California in mid-winter. The morning sun streams through my open study window. The honeysuckle hedge below is gorgeous, and the geraniums are in flower. The peas are in bloom in my winter garden and I pulled fresh radishes for this morning's breakfast. Yesterday afternoon I tramped out past the rows of peppers and eucalyptus to the great orange groves of Arlington Heights. The ragged robin rose hedges were red by the roadside. The golden fruit hung in myriad riches on the bending trees. Miles of this green and golden glory were spread out before me. I climbed a nearby hill, sat for an hour in the sunshine, with my book on my knees. My reading was interspersed with raptures and thrills as the snows of Mount San Jacinto, glistening in the sun, rose majestically beyond the intervening miles of ripening oranges and green barley fields. And this is the end of December! Thanks for especially helpful and inspiring recent numbers of The Christian Century.

Evolution and the Popular Mind

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your contributions on the subject of evolution are very timely and significant. When the masses understand what the scholars have to teach about the harmony of science and religion some great changes will occur. The doctrine must be appreciated by more than the intellectuals if it would save many by its message of a great hope.

It has been well said that infallibility is the curse of the church. Not until we get beyond the first of Genesis and see in all our forms and doctrines historical growth are we going to get the results we should. This attitude of mind will mean much to hasten efficiency by union or cooperation among the churches. Differences will seem small because they are not essential. In a spirit of liberalism, values alone will count. Christians will work together as never before knowing something of the methods by which individuals and institutions develop.

The Strength of Universalism

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue of December 8 there is a statement which requires some correction, with reference to the membership of the Universalist denomination. It says that "there are only 75,000 members of this communion in the United States, most of whom are to be found in Massachusetts and

*Lesson for Feb. 5, "Elijah Taken Up Into Heaven." Scripture 2 Kings 2:5-11.

New York." Whereas, according to the Universalist Register for 1917, giving the latest statistics that I have at hand in regard to the matter, there were at that time 704 Universalist churches in this country, with 51,362 families, a communicant membership of 55,515, and church property valued at $13,851,598. Since then there has been an increase in every one of those particulars. The communicant membership includes only those who have formally united with the church, and who come to the communion table. Unfortunately, as in other denominations, they are only a minority of those who attend the church services. It is safe to say, I think, that the 51,362 families represent at least 200,000 persons who belong to the denomination. Considerably less than half of these are in Massachusetts and New York.

Let me add that the Universalists are naturally proud of the fact that Dr. Joseph Fort Newton is not only a member of your editorial staff, but is the pastor of their strongest church in the city of New York. His admirable contributions are helping to increase the circulation of The Christian Century among them.

VERSE

Kingdom of the Innermost

BOUNDLESS is life's inmost domain of heart,
There time and space defer to spirit's sway;
And springs of feeling give creative play
To mystic powers, by whose hidden art,
External things are shaped. But this high part
Of fashioning forth my world of every day,
I cannot play, O God, in worthy way,
Till Thou art Master-Artist in my heart.

Since being man, I must creator be,
Whether of beauty or of forms of sin,
Give, Lord, Thine own creative ecstasy,
The Man-Christ's matchless artistry within.
Then shall I live with all my soul unfurled,
Freed to express Thy beauty in my world.

ELEANOR INGLE PILSON.

The Unlifted Veil

UNTIL the veil be put aside
That bars the great Unknown,
In patient hope we must abide,
Or walk the world alone.

And if the veil be rent, and sheer,
We fall into the dark,
Perchance, in dreams, we still may hear
A bluebird or a lark.

And, hearing them, we may arise,
And make within the gloom
A joyful sound, or feast our eyes
In gardens full of bloom.

Whatever fate shall us befall,
We shall not endless lie
Without a magic sense of all
The beauty passing by.

Therefore, O Soul, forget thy fear
And put thy grief away,
For never yet was darkness here
But blossomed into day.

CHARLES G. BLANDEN.

Good-Bye to Conscience

“‘GOOD-BYE,’ I said to my conscience,
‘Good-bye for aye and aye,’
And I put her hands off harshly,
And turned my face away;
And conscience smitten sorely
Returned not from that day.

“But a time came when my spirit
Grew weary of its pace;
And I cried: ‘Come back, my conscience;
I long to see thy face.’
But conscience cried: ‘I cannot;
Remorse sits in my place.’”

PAUL LAWRENCE DUNBAR.

The Narrow Way

THE way is narrow? Ay, but think how wide
The fields it leads to. Wide as hope are they.
Into a larger life the path will guide,
What matter then if narrow be the way?

That the Ministry Be Not Blamed

By John A. Hutton

Author of "The Proposal of Jesus."

THESE "Warrack Lectures on Preaching" should be read by all ministers seeking assurance and consolation after battling with a hard and oftentimes unresponsive world. Dr. Hutton has brought forth treasures of wisdom not only for the beginner but for the hardened campaigner as well. Rare commonsense and practical helpfulness characterize the book.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Methodists Lead in Baptist School

Three-fourths of the trustees of the University of Chicago must be "regular Baptists," and the president must be a Baptist. Nevertheless the Baptists do not lead in the student body by any means. Exclusive of University College, there are 6088 students this year, and for the first time there has been an effort to get a complete religious classification. Of these students, 1118 did not fill out religious preference cards, and only three preferred to enumerate themselves as agnostics. The denominational groups are arranged as follows: Methodists, 529; Presbyterians, 472; Jewish, 323; Baptists, 322; Catholics, 269; Episcopalians, 266; Congregationalists, 246; Lutherans, 221; Disciples 138; Christian Scientists, 116. About three-fourths of those signing up are actually members of a church or synagogue. The Y. M. C. A. of the university urged that each denominational group establish a "Y" secretary whose business it shall be to relate students to the local churches. Baptists and Methodists have already made appropriations to this end. It is rumored that the University of Chicago is seeking a charter change which would annul the provision that three-fourths of the trustees be "regular Baptists." With the premillennialists threatening to secure control of the machinery of the denomination, and to test all churches by a "fundamentalist" creed, university authorities are reputed not to be very happy over the present charter provisions of the university.

Pastor Endeavors to Make Worship Real to Labor Constituency

How to reach the working man with religion is the perennial problem of the church. Rev. W. H. Allen, the versatile and virile pastor of First Church of Disciples, Danbury, Conn., is working at the task this winter. He recently outfitted his church with Hymns of the United Church, the hymnal that "sings the social gospel," and making large use of the hymns of brotherhood and social idealism which it contains. His sermon topics are also chosen with reference to this problem. Some recent topics are "Relation of the Church to Labor," "Characteristics of a Manly Man," "A Message to Men Who Think."

Congregationalist Has a New Editor

The veteran editor of the Congregationalist, Rev. Howard Bridgman, has laid down his pen to take up the work of teaching. He is being succeeded by Rev. William E. Gilroy, who will direct the official journal of his denomination after February 1. Mr. Gilroy has been pastor of Plymouth Congregational church, Fond du Lac, Wis. He lived in Canada until about three years ago, and his early ministry was in the Methodist church. He won his editorial spurs as editor of the Canadian Congregationalist. Dr. Charles R. Brown, president of the Congregational Publishing Society, asserts that Mr. Gilroy's articles in The Christian Century had much to do with his selection as editor of the Congregationalist.

Apostle of Peace Making Wide Tour

Dr. Peter Ainslie of the Christian Temple, Baltimore, has a sabbatical year during 1922 which he is using to tour the country in behalf of peace in international affairs and unity in church life. His visits from city to city through the middle west recently have brought continual ovations. At Fulton, Mo., he declared the next war, if it came, would wipe out the white race. At Fulton he spoke in the Disciples church in the morning to a big union service in the afternoon and to another union service in the evening. He also addressed the students of William Woods college, Westminster college and Synodical college.

Disciples General Convention City Not Determined

The committee on location of the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ finds itself in some embarrassment this year. The convention was invited to Denver by the Colorado state organization of the Disciples but the pastor of Central church, Denver, Rev. J. E. Davis, has been publicly criticising the Disciples missionary organization and seems now unwilling to cooperate in entertaining the convention. Once there was no more excited debate in Disciples circles than that occasioned by urgent invitations from different cities. Ordinarily the convention location has been chosen at a relatively much earlier date than the present.

Eminent Ministers Come to Chicago

The first two Sundays of the new year the University of Chicago pulpit was occupied by Rev. James E. Freeman of Washington. On Jan. 15 and 22 Dr. Samuel McChord Crothers was the preacher. The coming of Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick on Jan. 29 is an event to be looked forward to. The first preacher in February will be President J. Ross Stevenson, of Princeton Theological Seminary, who will be followed by Dr. David Jones Evans, of the First Baptist church of Kansas City, and Dean William Wallace Fenn, of the Harvard Divinity school, Cambridge, Mass.

Pastor Defends Labor Unions

The labor unions of Denver invited Dr. George S. Lackland to act as the spokesman of their cause before the Civic and Commercial Chamber recently. Dr. Lackland is pastor of Grace Community church. He said in his address before the business leaders: "The question is not one of open and closed shop, but rather of organized and unorganized labor. The trade union movement has made mistakes. No true friend of labor will try to defend or condone them. There are shop rules that are petty and stand as a hindrance to the true aim of organized labor. There are leaders who have been stubborn, crooked or short-sighted. Why the mistakes and the poor leaders? Simply because unions are composed of human beings. Ninety per cent of the mistakes of labor are caused by lack of education which is the result of low wages."

Association of Church Colleges

The Association of Church Colleges concluded its sessions in Chicago on January 11 after a most fruitful discussion of the problems of education in the United States. Dr. H. O. Pritchard, the senior secretary of the Disciples board, was chosen as president of the association. He was formerly president of Eureka college, and is a strong believer in the church college. Dr. Pritchard took his A. B. at Butler college and his B. D. at Yale. Dr. Kelley continues as the secretary of the organization.

Dr. McElveen is Asked to Remain with Portland Church

Recently Dr. W. T. McElveen resigned as pastor of First Congregational church of Portland, Ore. He had received a call to Associate Congregational church of Baltimore. The executive council of the Portland church met and voted unanimously to invite Dr. McElveen to remain. Unless he receives also the vote of the church, he will not do so. Consequently, a meeting of the congregation has been called at which time it is expected that the action of the executive council will be ratified by a strong vote. Dr. McElveen was for a number of years at Evanston, Ill., where his unique methods attracted much attention. He has also served as pastor of Shawmut Congregational church of Boston.

Baptists Survey the Denominational Progress

With closer denominational organization, the Baptists are now able to mobilize their forces for common ends. Evangelism has been one of the leading interests the past year, and in this task Baptist ministers have been very efficient. The denomination ranks second among the Protestant forces of Massachusetts, and because the Baptists more than some other denominations are able to reach foreigners, they are forging ahead in this state. Illinois has been a very fruitful field the past year, the denomination gaining over 15,000 in this state. Dr. Frank Goodchild of New York City reports the situation there very difficult for every Protestant organization. Only one-third of the children of the city are receiving any religious instruction—Catholic, Jewish or Protestant. The Baptists find that their negro work is growing but the situation with the self-supporting American churches tends to be depressing. In Michigan the emphasis has been upon religious education, and nearly every association in the state now reports a director of religious education and training classes for teachers.

Congregationalists Find a New City Leader

The Chicago City Missionary Society, an organization supported by Congregational churches, has recently called to the secretaryship Dr. Frank Nichols, pastor of Rogers Park Congregational church. Dr. Nichols has been pastor for twelve years in this parish, and his church is the largest Protestant organization in the suburb. He will henceforth be the virtual bishop of nearly a hundred Congregational churches in the city which contains more Congregationalists than any other in the country, including Boston. He represents the very best of the New England tradition in religion, being favorable to union projects of all sorts in religious work, and combining in his experience careful scholarship and an evangelical faith.

Natives Revolt Against the Missionaries

Bishop Gore startled the English speaking world recently by his statement that most of the native churches of the mission fields are in revolt against the missionaries. Two Japanese Christian organizations have barred foreigners from participating in the church courts. In India because the government subsidizes much of the educational work being done by the missionaries there is a strong anti-foreigner prejudice in the Christian church. This feeling manifests itself less in the Chinese field and in the countries with low cultural levels. The exception of China is due to the fact that the missionaries have not received favors from the government.

Heresy-Hunting Spreads
in the South

While preachers manage to claim a good deal of liberty these days, the teachers in denominational colleges are having a hard time of it. The Baptist denomination is in a furore over evolution, as though they had recently heard about it. The Tennessee Baptist organization has recently appointed a committee to hunt heresy in the Baptist colleges of the state. If they find any professor who believes that it took longer than 144 hours to create the universe, woe be to him. His job is not worth a last year's bird's nest.

Presbyterian Ministers Will Know Their Neighbors

Ignorance of the history, doctrines and spirit of their religious neighbors has been one of the big supports to denominational spirit among ministers of the past generation. The new kind of Presbyterian minister coming out of McCormick Theological Seminary will be of a different sort. Dr. Cleland B. McAfee is giving this winter a series of eighteen lectures which will interpret to the students of the seminary in a sympathetic way the history and characteristics of the religious bodies that these students are most likely to come into contact with. This course of lectures by Dr. McAfee is rather an innovation in the seminary world. Some theological seminaries not only fail to interpret the de-

"Dad" Elliott Is Still Popular With Students

One of the best known figures in the educational world is that of A. J. Elliott, who is familiarly known as "Dad" Elliott. The evangelistic phase of his message has always been prominent, and he presses for decisions in every school which he visits. Mr. Elliott has been using Rev. J. Stitt Wilson in many of the colleges for evangelistic work. He attained eminence as the socialist mayor of Berkeley, Cal. In Mr. Elliott's meetings with boys during December there were 3,300 decisions.

Presbyterian Professor Dies

Rev. John H. Boyd, professor of homiletics in McCormick Theological Seminary, is dead. He took his position in the seminary in 1919. Before that he was an eminent Presbyterian minister. During his ministry in Evanston, Ill., he became the foremost figure among the ministers of the city. When he left Evanston he went to Detroit for three years. After three years in the automobile city he went to Portland, Ore., where he became one of the leading citizens of the town. His sermons were frequently printed, and the local Rotary Club made him a member. Since going to the seminary he fell a victim of pernicious anemia and finally fell asleep. His funeral was held in Evanston, Illinois. The services were conducted by Dr. David Hugh Jones, President James K. McGuire, Dr. Joseph A. Vance of Detroit, and Drs. W. S. P. Bryan, J. T. Stone and C. B. McAfee of Chicago.

Broader Views Expounded by Episcopalians

The Episcopal church in this country is having a revival of the broader teaching which would recognize the ecclesiastical status of non-conformist ministers. The Churchman has recently dealt the high church view some masterly blows, and is at the present time engaged in reprinting a work by Dean George Hodges of Cambridge Theological School which argues historically against the notion of apostolic succession. The Churchman and its many friends rejoice that the Lambeth proposals were rejected by the free churches, and insist that a much more generous proposal must be made.

Prominent Unitarian Minister Becomes Home Missionary

Rev. William L. Sullivan, pastor of All Souls Unitarian church of New York, has resigned his church in order to become a home missionary under the direction of the Unitarian Laymen's League. He assigned as the reason for his determination to leave the metropolis and enter the new task his desire to help in launching the new movement in the right way, for it has its traditions all to form. Unitarians have done but little church extension work in the United States and it is thought that Mr. Sullivan knows how to present his denominational cause to the people of a new city. He was once a Paulist father of the Roman Catholic church, which is a most valuable preparation for his work.

Business Man Lectures the Organists

The National Association of Church Organists met in Philadelphia recently and decided to hear from the pew. They called upon Herbert J. Tily, a business man with fine musical appreciations, to speak on "The Pulpit and the Pew as Twin Evangelists." Tily said among other things: "Unless church music really leads to devotion, it fails utterly to fulfill its high mission. No matter how soundly artistic a composition may be, it is the subjective reaction and not the objective quality that is supremely important in determining its value as spiritual food. The tune 'Bethany' may irritate you, and yet beside you some good soul in tears finds in it an emotional significance that justifies its being rendered. On the other hand, some fine masterpiece thrills you to your utmost being and leaves your neighbor cold and disappointed. Each of you must be willing to compromise with your ideals if a rigid insistence on your ideals jeopardizes the full achievement of the end needed. Your playing, your singing, must be understandably devout to your particular congregation. I think there are few organists who do not realize the necessity of giving choir and congregation that which they should have. In every case this will surely be—if the proper compromise is effected—music which is not above the comprehension of the worshipers, yet not so debased as to be unworthy. Happy indeed is that community which has the gospel preached to it with equally compelling eloquence from both pulpit and choir."

Rural Church in Massachusetts Studied

With most denominational year books showing a steady decline in the number of members in rural churches, in many sections of the country church leaders are giving accurate study to religious conditions in the open country. The Massachusetts Federation of Churches has recently held a conference on the rural question at which the facts about churches in Middlesex county were given. Seventy-two churches in the county have an average membership of 99. The average attendance was 63 per cent of the membership as compared

Home Mission Leaders Hold Conference

THE annual meeting of the Home Missions Council was held recently in New York jointly with the Council of Women for Home Missions. This was the fifteenth annual meeting. The number of cooperating denominations has steadily increased until at the present time there are 24. The A. M. E. Zion church affiliated itself with the movement at this meeting.

Miss Florence C. Quinlan reported the activity of the women among the seasonal workers of the country. Two centers were maintained the past year among the Poles in Maryland, and one among the Italians of Delaware. The women's organization gets out a study manual each year.

The work among the immigrants is very encouraging. An effort is being made to create a literature for the use of these peoples. Leaflets in foreign languages have been printed. The council is lending its efforts to the merging of competing journals for foreign language groups and the founding of other journals to meet the needs of groups that have not been served by a journal. Cooperation is making possible better work at Ellis Island with a committee representing thirty-two different denominations, a kindergarten and day nursery, a guide for immigrants, Christmas and Thanksgiving celebrations, maintenance of general supply closets and a room for distributing clothes to needy immigrants and poorly clad babies, and better arrangement for religious services.

In reporting as executive secretary of the Home Missions Council, Dr. A. W. Anthony put the new conception of home missions succinctly when he said: "Our vision of the home mission task has become clearer as a geographical mission and less as a sectarian issue. We see entire communities much more clearly; we think of an entire city better than we did; we have entered upon programs and discovered in some of the simpler cases how they can be carried out for an entire state, and we come nearer to thinking in terms of the entire nation and of whole groups and races and classes than we ever did before." In referring to the work done by eighteen standing committees, which are joint committees of the Council of Home Missions and the Council of Women for Home Missions, and composed of men and women whose daily tasks are in the field in which the committee serves, Dr. Anthony illustrated by a recital of cooperative tasks accomplished that "the office of Home Missions Council is a clearing house of Christian service."

The budget of the council is a modest one, considering the importance of its task. During the past year the organization has been carried on with $23,540.21. The budget for the coming year will be somewhat larger.

with a 30 per cent average attendance at lodge and grange meetings. The salaries of the ministers were shown to be totally inadequate. This average for the county is $1,121. Two federated churches pay over two thousand dollars a year. Congregationalists, Methodists and Baptists are the leading religious organizations in the field.

Want Change in Term of Assembly Commissioner

Continual agitation in the ranks of the Presbyterian church makes it probable that some time the term of the commissioner will be made two years instead of one. Under the present system the General Assembly is made up almost entirely of new men who are inexperienced in parliamentary practice. With a two-year rule, one-half of the assembly would carry over from the previous year, and provide that continuity which is lacking in the legislation of the church at the present time. When that change comes the action of one assembly will not so likely reverse that of a previous assembly.

Congregational Students Will Go Out Again This Summer

Last summer the Congregationalists tried the experiment of enlisting the young people in home mission work. The result of this experiment was so satisfactory that the work will be continued again this coming summer. Students are paid fifty dollars a month and expenses to go to fields where religious work has come to a standstill for lack of leadership. The program put on in the community depends in considerable measure upon the needs of the local community, but includes recreation and educational classes as well as the more formal religious exercises of a church. The young people who try out this work often decide to go into the Christian ministry as a life vocation.

MOFFATT'S Translation of the New Testament

THE author is recognized as one of the most distinguished living scholars of the Greek new Testament. His translation is notable for its apt usage of words as well as for its originality of thought. A new meaning is given to the old version which is supplemented and not supplanted. It is the only version which makes use of the recent discoveries in Egypt and the Holy Land. No Bible student's library is complete without this marvelous translation. It will elucidate difficult passages and call forth expressions of surprise, delight and gratitude. Its every phrase is a new text for the preacher and a new idea for the Christian layman.

Presbyterians Would Revive the Defunct Stereopticon

Presbyterian leaders believe that the defunct stereopticon can be revived as an agency in church work. Foreign mission secretaries point out that it has not been the unsatisfactory character of the pictures so much as the monotony of the lecture which has banished the stereopticon as a tool in church work. In many ways the stereopticon excels the moving picture in depicting missionary scenes, and its greater economy is one of the arguments for its use in thousands of churches.

Over Fifty Years in One Church

Dr. Charles Little of Wabash, Ind., probably exceeded the record of any American preacher of this generation by serving fifty-one years in a single charge. First Presbyterian church of Wabash, Ind., was his only church. Probably no man in the community ever contributed so much to the development of the community spirit. That his service was not unappreciated is shown by the fact that he was made moderator of the 120th General Assembly of the church. Dr. Little recently died and the funeral procession was four blocks long, and a carriage was entirely filled with flowers, the tribute of a grateful city to the man of God who had served so long in their midst.

Dr. Cadman Has Big Sunday Schedule

An amazing capacity for work characterizes Dr. Cadman of Brooklyn, who often speaks five times in a single Sunday. One of his most interesting meetings is that which he is accustomed to hold at four o'clock on Sunday afternoon at the Bedford "Y." This is said to be the largest men's meeting in the United States. The meeting opens with music, and then Dr. Cadman speaks. Questions are sent up to the speaker, and the concluding part of the address is taken up with the answer of the question. His quick repartee stands him in hand in this arduous task. On a recent Sunday he spoke on Russia as a nation in ruins.

Church Passes Commendatory Resolutions

While the great body of Disciples churches have expressed their loyalty to the United Christian Missionary Society by the practical method of sending their contributions regularly, the churches led by ministers of the ultra-conservative sort have in some instances voted to withdraw cooperation from the society. Litchfield, Ill., Christian church felt that something besides money should be sent to the society and recently passed by unanimous vote a ringing resolution in behalf of the work. Among the statements in this resolution is the following:

"We believe that constant agitation and advising churches to withhold their contributions to the United Christian Missionary society will result in strife and division, paralyzing our educational, missionary and benevolent work and imperiling the many worthy missionaries, aged ministers and orphans. We strongly recommend that constructive methods be employed to correct any imperfections that may exist. We plead for greater fidelity to the word, which enjoins love and cooperation as certainly as it does baptism or the Lord's Supper, believing that God has never looked down with greater promise upon his chosen people than in this good year of our Lord, 1922."

Methodists Go Into the Hotel Business

The Board of Home Missions and Church Extension is planning to enlarge their building in Philadelphia so that the upper floors may be used as a hotel. Annuity money will be invested in the enterprise. The new structure will furnish accommodation for 208 people. It is the plan to conduct the hotel at moderate rates for the benefit of people who cannot pay the high rates in prominent hotels. At the same time it is believed that a good return on the investment can be secured.

Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones, pastor of Central Christian church, made nearly as many addresses outside his church around the city as he did in the church last year. He was recently invited by the Detroit Daily News to join up with some actors and musicians in sending a program out into the air by radio. The minister was invited to speak a sermonette into the receiver which reached thousands of people around the city. Central church raised $26,000 for all purposes last year, and received into its fellowship 144 new members. One of its noteworthy enterprises of the past fall was the presentation to the city of the message of Dr. Peter Ainslie, the apostle of Christian unity, who attracted wide attention by his appeal for the wider fellowship of Christ's believers.

Successful City Church Meets Problems

When Union Avenue Disciples church of St. Louis some years ago placed upon itself the burden of an unprecedented debt in the erection of a beautiful building, there were certain wise ones who shook their heads. The chairman of the building committee is now able to announce that the last of the indebtedness is subscribed, and will soon be paid in. Meanwhile the missionary spirit of the church has grown apace. Last year $18,926.44 was given to various benevolences, and about the same amount was applied to the building debt. Among the slogans for the new year is a new member every day of the year. The publicity committee of the church has made a noteworthy record in keeping the organization before the public. It will be of interest to other committees to know that fifty per cent of the money used by the committee is spent on newspaper advertising.

Warns Girls Not to Come to Philadelphia

The Industrial Relations Committee of the Church Federation of Philadelphia plans this year to help decrease the number of girls who every year disappear in the big cities. It is stated that 65,000 girls are lost to their friends every year in the United States. The commission issued a published warning that employment is difficult to get in that city, and the living expenses are high. A budget has been worked out for a self-supporting woman and on a very modest living scale it is shown that a woman must have eighteen dollars to subsist. The Y. W. C. A. of the city has been doing some hard work in getting up lists of desirable places where a girl may room while in the city.

Denver Revival Ends as Usual

REVIVALISM is one story no matter where it is recorded. The Christian Century described the revivalistic excitement in Denver last August. Mrs. Aimee Semple McPherson was invited to the city by two Congregational churches, Second church and People's Tabernacle. Ten thousand converts were claimed as a result of the meeting. A careful enumeration of the converts shows that the net result in new members to the Denver churches was 150 members. Mrs. McPherson carried away as her personal reward $3,646 and in addition to this $17,763 to help build a tabernacle for her work at Echo Park, Cal. The ministers of the two supporting churches who were sympathetic with the revivalist make a very conservative report about the cures. One had no members cured, while in the other church seven members are reported as permanently cured. One of the cooperating pastors states that he would like to have Mrs. McPherson back to preach the gospel but would hope that she would discontinue her healing activities. An interesting by-product of the meeting has been a serious split in one of the churches. A considerable element decided that the Methodist Episcopal church furnished a more congenial home for revivalism, and has agitated for the change of the church into a Methodist church. This resulted in division. Meanwhile the medical men of the city have been scandalized to find the churches connecting up with the quackery of the faith-cure movement, and these men, as well as nurses, and other professional people have felt it to be far more difficult to cooperate in a religious cause which could so easily relapse from the good program of worship, education and social service to the kind of superstition that flourished in the middle ages.

Public Opinion and the Steel Strike

By the Commission of Inquiry of
the Interchurch World Movement

Of no other book published in the troubled days since the war can one more truly say, "Here is something every American citizen should read." No matter what he thinks of industrial relations, no matter what his politics, his social position or his creed, every American, in simple duty to his country and himself, ought to read "Public Opinion and the Steel Strike."

Though limited in scope, the report is of more importance to Americans generally than the first and more comprehensive book was. It strikes deeper. It goes beyond the steel strike, in implications if not in facts. It studies, in the light of the western Pennsylvania phases of a single industrial conflict, sets of circumstances which are neither local nor temporary.

Propaganda is the theme. Presuming that public opinion often is the decisive factor in industrial war, what feeds public opinion? When an army of workmen walked out of steel mills throughout the country, stopping a great basic industry, how accurately was the interested public informed?

Public opinion was misdirected systematically, according to the commission of inquiry. Pulpit and press, unions and companies, public officials and welfare organizations—all failed, for one reason or another, to provide the public with accurate information.

Trained students of social phenomena, indorsed by a commission of which Bishop Francis J. McConnell is chairman, here present detailed evidence in support of their contention that public opinion was scientifically poisoned and American law was brazenly betrayed by press, church and government in order that strikers might be beaten—all with the implication that the same thing may be expected elsewhere in America tomorrow.

Prof. Alva W. Taylor commends this new book as one of the most challenging published in many years.

The Prophetic Ministry For Today

By BISHOP CHARLES D. WILLIAMS
The Lyman Beecher Yale Lectures for 1920

FOR years Bishop Williams has tried hard to do the work of a prophet to his own times. He has practiced a persistent faith in the power of the spoken word to keep before men the high and unwelcome standards that alone save a people from perishing.

He talks here most intimately of the calling and work of the ministry, so understood, in the hope of aiding his colleagues and himself to stand fast in their allegiance to this great Commission to the end.

Genuineness, earnestness, courage, intellectual honesty, spiritual passion—these are some of the fundamental characteristics of Bishop Williams, according to Dr. Joseph Fort Newton. An outstanding preacher-prophet, he is well able to discuss "The Prophetic Ministry for Today."

The Big Novel of 1921-22

If Winter Comes

By A. S. M. HUTCHINSON

More than 225,000 copies of this book have already been sold, and it was issued only last Autumn. Note what Dr. Frank Crane says of the book:

"I have no doubt that the year 1921 will be known to the next generation as the year when Mark Sabre was born. Mark Sabre is going to be as real to me as long as I live as any man I have known in the flesh. For there are two sorts of inhabitants in this world: (1) Book People; (2) Flesh People. The second kind is a more or less developed animal; the first is a pure spiritual creation.

"For instance, these people just as really inhabit the earth as President Harding or Jack Dempsey; these people Pantagruel, Don Quixote, Wilhelm Meister, Jean Valjean, Micawber, Little Lord Fauntleroy, Becky Sharp, and Uriah Heep. These are the true immortals that walk among us. And I have a strong suspicion that Mark Sabre belongs to the company."

The Fruits of Victory

By NORMAN ANGELL

Author of "The Great Illusion."

NO ONE is really prepared to face the questions which the discussion of disarmament is bringing to the fore unless he is informed of the economic facts underlying such discussion. Norman Angell has furnished just this information in his new volume, "The Fruits of Victory." The argument of the book is that from an economic viewpoint war is utterly futile. Every minister who plans to take his part in the coming campaign for disarmament should have this volume and master its contents.

Dr. Lyman Abbott of The Outlook
says of Lloyd C. Douglas'

Wanted—A Congregation

"Mr. Douglas's volume is not a story with a moral, but a moral in a story. A minister who is preaching to a small and eminently respectable congregation in a large church is invited to a birthday dinner with a college classmate; meets there three successful men—a manufacturer, a doctor, and an editor; is inspired with a new spirit of energy, enterprise and initiative, and goes home to put into his business the spirit which they put into theirs and to employ much the same sort of methods. It is a good book for ministers to read, because a spirit of energy, enterprise, and initiative is a good spirit for ministers to acquire. But to imitate the Rev. Dr. Preston Blue's methods and expect from the methods the Rev. Preston Blue's success would be a great mistake. Mere imitation rarely achieves a great success, and never in any form of industry which requires spiritual power. And methods which are employed by one minister in one community with good results may, when employed by a minister of a different temperament and in a different community, be fatal to results. I commend the book for inspiration but not for imitation."

James Bryce: Lover and Interpreter of America

THE death of Lord Bryce is a bereavement to the whole English-speaking world. Alike in character, in intellect and in disinterested public-mindedness he was perhaps the outstanding figure of our generation; and by a gracious destiny the night came down suddenly upon an unclouded mind. Certainly no man of Britain has ever held, or may ever hope to hold, a higher place in the esteem and veneration of Americans than Lord Bryce, who was not only the greatest ambassador England has sent to our shores, but a sincere friend and profound interpreter of our country. Only a few weeks ago Lord Bryce was in America, and looked well and hearty, albeit friends could see that he was frail. A small man physically, he seemed even smaller; but his mind was as alert and far-ranging as ever, remarkable in its capacity for detail and for comprehensive generalization, two qualities which with a calm, judicial judgment aglow with deep sympathy, have made his writings so fruitful and valuable. Alexis de Tocqueville was the first great observer of our democratic experiment in America, but he came too early to judge results. James Bryce, by virtue of his long life, shared a large part of our stupendous development, witnessed it with keen, intelligent and discerning eye, and wrote the noblest interpretation of it ever written in his "American Commonwealth." Always a convinced believer, without being an inflamed enthusiast, he lived to see the glowing promise become a perplexity. He closed his "American Commonwealth" with a question mark, wondering what would happen when America had ceased to be an economic utopia of free lands and endless room. His monumental study of "Modern Democracies," published last year—a survey of all the free states of the world, except Britain, which he modestly left for a more impartial hand—closed with even deeper questionings; often, indeed, hard to know from misgivings, though he wisely put aside "the pessimism of experience."

If Democracy Fails, What Then?

DEMOCRACY, Lord Bryce saw at the end of his life, has not brought us much nearer to the goal of human brotherhood. Freedom has not proved a panacea for our ills, much less a reconciler of our disputes. Self-government has not purified politics or redeemed us from the pernicious power which money exerts, nor has it exorcised the spirit of revolution and unrest. But, he added, "If democracy is flouted, what remains? There was a Greek proverb, If water chokes, what can one drink to stop the choking? If the light of democracy be turned to darkness, how great is that darkness!" He lived to see democracies turned to autocracies for purposes of war—suspending the very liberties which it had cost so much to win—and none knew better than he that it was a step back toward the old night. No sentence in his later writings is more poignant than that in which he says that one of the keenest woes of life is for a man to see his race choose the wrong road, and be unable to prevent it. Lord Bryce was not only a great statesman, ambassador, and publicist; he was a sincere and humble-hearted Christian. He saw that democracy is the inevitable destiny of humanity, but he feared for its future unless it is to be led by moral intelligence and spiritual vision. The stately closing pages of his "American Commonwealth," if put alongside the chapter on "Democracy and Religion" in his last volumes, tell us what was in his heart. "Christianity has never been put into practice," alas, that tells the tragedy of it all. But there lies our hope, if we are to defeat the "new, uprising, emancipated, atheistic democracy" which is at our door. But neither Christianity nor democracy has failed, so long as they can give us men like James Bryce—men of exalted character and clear intellect, touched with human sympathy and Christian vision, dedicated to the disinterested service of the common good.

Ecclesiastical Politics and a New Pope

THE college of cardinals, meeting next week to elect a successor to Benedict XV, has the handicap of being predominantly an Italian chamber. If the Italian members should stand together they would be able with but little reinforcement to hold the reigns of power in their hands. However, even a secure majority often breaks up in faction, and it is reported that the Italian cardinals are sharply divided in ecclesiastical policy between those who would reconcile the vatican with the Italian government at the expense of the doctrine of the papacy's temporal power, and those who would face reality in the political world and drive the best bargain possible with the kingdom of Italy. It seems probable that an Italian pope will be elected, as is usually the case, but the real test will be over a question not particularly germane to the spiritual welfare of the millions of Catholics throughout the world. Meanwhile, the secondary questions of the relation of the church to modern thought will doubtless weigh somewhat, though it is not likely that any candidate would stand for a policy tolerating such an organized and self-conscious movement of modernism within the bosom of the church as was that which Pius X suppressed. The American cardinals take a more generous attitude toward progress than do the Spanish and Italian cardinals. Being only two in a college of sixty they will not be able to produce any large results at this time. It is a curious fact that the United States, which is the church's most important source of money, has an almost inappreciable influence upon the church's policy. Whether it may be hoped that the new pope will take any more generous attitude toward the reunion of the church is problematical. The attitude of Benedict was traditional, and papal infallibility prevents any reversal of fundamental attitudes.

The Crisis in Foreign Missions

NEWs from every one of the great mission fields where Christianity comes in contact with the ethnic faiths indicates that the expansion of Christianity is confronting an increasing obstacle in the nationalistic pride which resents its promulgation by foreigners. Rev. Masahisa Uemura, a Christian Japanese, declares: "To depend upon the pocketbook of foreigners for money to pay the bills is not a situation which ought to satisfy the moral sense of Japanese Christians. Likewise in the realm of religious thought, is it not shameful to accept opinions ready-made, relying on the experience of others instead of one's own? Is it not a duty we owe to God and to mankind to develop the religious talent of our people and to contribute our share to the religious ideas of the world?" In every mission field there are mutterings on the part of native Christians because of the too long continuance of missionary control of the young church. On account of economic dependence they accept foreign government in religion, but dream of the time when Christianity can be freed of its occidental shackles. On this side of the water, the tendency is quite in the opposite direction. The trouble in the Disciples camp, now reaching a decisive stage, was correctly phrased by the reactionary critics. They accused the missionaries of not following the customs of the American churches in Chinese mission work. It is to be hoped that every missionary in China of every denomination is guilty of this charge, and there is considerable evidence that most of them are. The missionaries have recognized the need of a readaptation of Christianity to the needs of the orient. When the work is done, our religion will reappear in its original form, minus the complexities of European philosophical thought and the tyranny of the western modes of organization. The missionaries will be needed on the foreign field for a long time yet, but they must be able to labor in the humility of John the Baptist, who asserted that Christ must increase, and he must decrease. The missionary must in the end be eclipsed by the native preacher of the gospel.

Spiritualism is a Misnomer

NAMES of religious movements are given in a haphazard manner and often a name given sticks, even though it is utterly inappropriate. If we judge the so-called spiritualists by their literature and the character of their doctrine they are decidedly misnamed. They should be called spiritists rather than spiritualists. The great mystics would find no kinship with modern spiritualism. In "Raymond" the disembodied spirits still have most mundane appetites, even including tobacco, at least it is so of those who lived upon earth since the Indian weed was discovered. It is not stated whether any of these spirits of recent departure have corrupted the more ancient spirits in the matter of cigarettes or not. In the communications there is an earthiness that quite comports with the mental and moral qualities of mediums but that is strangely out of accord with the character of the saints and sages of the race. It is this attempt to materialize spiritual realities that has been the distinctive thing and the mischievous thing about spiritism. Not many of us would resent receiving a communication from our dead, or even a decent scientific experimentation in that direction. But we do resent having our dead represented as living at the present time on a lower intellectual plane than they lived while upon earth, and more materially minded than they were before. If this is what immortality means, most of us will not be strongly drawn to it. While most religious sects produce their share of spiritually minded people, it is the peculiarity of spiritism that instead of increasing spirituality it decreases it. In the periods when the mind of man is most material in its interests, spiritism flourishes. At other times it languishes.

Cold and Famine Doing Their Worst

A RUSSIAN winter is the real thing. While western Europe is protected by the warm Gulf stream, eastern Europe faces the rigors of the northern winds with no such protection. The people are this winter enfeebled by famine and their blood is thin. The result may be left to the imagination. But even the imagination falters before such a tragedy. It must be seen by the traveler before it can be adequately comprehended. What relief means to people under sentence of death by such a horrible route as starvation is indicated in some measure by the letters that are beginning to come to America from the school children of Russia. Many of the little boys and girls of Russia, who are not in school this winter, are receiving at this time the warm dresses and sweaters which help them to face the perils of the winter. American food has revived the desire to live, and the grateful children have written to many American friends expressing as best they can their thankfulness for deliverance. These boys and girls are the citizens of tomorrow. With no political motive in her charity, America has, nevertheless, wiped the bitterness out of the hearts of millions of Russians. The bolshevik scorn for "bourgeois" nations must give way in the presence of Christian philanthropy. As usual, this philanthropic burden falls chiefly upon Christian people. The generous man of the world exists, but usually he is the man who has had a good Christian mother. The church must create and keep alive the sympathy and the sense of universal brotherhood without which the human race would sink back into barbarism. The latest opportunity is Russia. It is the biggest challenge that has ever come, for the need is on so colossal a scale. Local churches all over the land are being asked by the Federal Council of Churches to remit their funds to New York, where they will be sent with greatest speed to the parts where they can most readily be transformed into food for those who for the lack of it lie at the door of death.

Religion in Industry is News

JOHN J. Eagan of Atlanta, Ga., was recently elected president of the American Cast-Iron Pipe Company. In taking office he remarked upon the fact that he was a professing Christian, and that his board of directors were all members of the church. He announced that the principles of Jesus Christ would be the ruling principles in the business. Making application of this statement, he asserted that a reasonable living wage would be paid to the lowest paid workman, constant employment would be given to all members of the organization, and the daily problems would be solved in the light of the golden rule. As Mr. Eagan himself justly observed, it is a sad commentary on our civilization that such an announcement should be considered news, and be broadcasted from one end of the land to the other by the press. The story of Arthur Nash and his golden rule was told with the same amazement by the press. Roger Babson and his talks on Christianity and business have drawn amazing crowds in various large cities of the land. It has been the novelty of his idea that has gathered together the big audiences of men. The orthodox view of business men during the past generation has been that business and religion would no more mix than politics and religion. Many a Christian man solved his problem with a two compartment brain. As a Christian he was devout, believing and loyal to the church. As a business man he was ruthless, selfish and sometimes untruthful. This unethical dualism has become obnoxious to the more intelligent view of business. The spirit of utter selfishness and ruthlessness was reduced to an absurdity by the war. Men who have recognized the meaning of that demonstration want to try a new experiment—the serious application of the teachings and spirit of Jesus to the affairs of every day life. The church cannot do better than to lend active and intelligent support to the pioneers of the new idea of Christianizing business. The labor problem will be more than half solved when the church so conceives its function and mission.

The Snipers Become Bushwhackers

DURING the past two years the attacks on the federal constitution which prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor have been carried on by snipers. The cartoonist has been hired to draw funny pictures directed against law enforcement, and sly references in the editorial columns of the wet press have built up among the people an impression that law enforcement has been a huge failure, and the federal amendment a big joke. At last the snipers have come out into the open. They are organized into the Association Opposed to National Prohibition. We are to have a little bushwhacking expedition against the fortress of the federal constitution. It is well to have an excuse for presenting the facts about law enforcement throughout the country, for the law should be more rigidly enforced and will be when the bushwhackers get through raiding the windmills in their quixotic fashion. It is in the atmosphere of conflict that we are often best able to bring the truth to the public mind. Such a serious-minded journal as the Survey, published not for profit but for social uplift and truth, prints occasionally the facts gathered by reliable investigators with regard to law enforcement in the most difficult spots of the country, the cities with large immigrant populations. Cora F. Stoddard has been making surveys both in New York and Boston of a sort that commands respect among sociologists. She is authority for the statement that both cities, even with their imperfect administration of the laws, show a big falling off in the arrests for drunkenness and a very noticeable increase in the consumption of milk. The privations of the beer guzzler have meant a better living standard for the babies. The need of the hour is to remove the appointment of dry commissioners from party politics and put it under civil service. The country must elect a dry congress this coming year, and thanks to the efforts of the bushwhackers probably will. The judges of the land should be reinforced by churches and all moral agencies in giving the whisky runners and moonshiners jail sentences.

The Enlarging Roosevelt

THEODORE ROOSEVELT made an impression upon American life which grows rather than diminishes with the years. Since his death one after another Roosevelt book has appeared, and these have been seized upon eagerly by the public. On January 6 a group of sixty eminent Americans, representing an organization for extending the Roosevelt ideals, gathered at the grave of Roosevelt and held simple commemorative exercises. Dr.

Lyman Abbott is president of the organization. James R. Garfield read Roosevelt's Nobel prize speech, and a wreath was placed upon the grave by Mrs. Thomas Robbins. Later the company was entertained at luncheon by Mrs. Roosevelt. During the past year there has been fresh recognition of those religious principles which undergirded the life of this great American. His gospel of a square deal, his interest in clean politics and his aggressive championship of the rights of the people against certain selfish interests have made him beloved by millions. Few of our Americans have been so complete an embodiment of the American life. Though a city man with the prestige of an old American family, he knew the vast western country as cowboy and explorer. Few men in America have loved the out of doors as did he. He was a great campaigner, never fearing to face large audiences in any section of the country. Though not a spellbinder, his well-organized speeches carried conviction. While his doctrine of the big stick has been emphasized by his enemies, and with some degree of justice, his service to the cause of world peace is being appreciated more and more. He was a believer in arbitration, and during the eight years of his administration the United States was able to do much to define the peace ideal. Men of his size are not born every day, and one need not wonder that the circle of his influence, like that of Lincoln, grows larger from year to year.

The Field of the Spiritual

EVERY once in a while some scientist openly confesses his ignorance in the matter of a more or less vital fact when certain champions of religion leap forward to assert the potency of the spiritual. The impotence of human knowledge is the seal of their religion. Their faith feeds upon ignorance, and an invasion of its pasturage by human intelligence is resented as an act of impiety. How many congregations have settled back in a profound religious comfort on being assured by their preachers that the chemist has not been able to generate life! The abiding mystery in which the beginning of existence is enshrined is a holy of holiest to many theologians. If life should actually be generated in some laboratory by chemical processes, the throne of deity himself, their deity, would come tumbling down upon their heads.

Such persons must live in the most harrowing anxiety. Their resentment against a science which braves the mysteries of their religious terra incognita is comparable to the rage of the primitive man who cannot abide the incursions of civilization. A newspaper in Arkansas the other day displayed a leaded editorial announcing the final disposal of the vagary of evolution, it having been demonstrated that a skeleton of a human being not structurally different from the present inhabitants of the region, had been discovered in Africa buried deep in a mound believed vastly to antedate human history. The wild leap of the editor's conclusion, and his readiness to base a biological theory on such inconsequential and doubtful data, are not the most amazing feature of his reasoning. Why should he be so eager to reach his conclusion? Why should he be willing to make a laughing-stock of himself in fretful zeal to disprove the doctrine of evolution? Why should not evolution be allowed to remain true, if it is found to be true? Why should he and so many like him catch at every straw which promises the veering of the wind in a direction opposite to that in which it has been steadily blowing ever since Darwin published his Origin of Species? Darwin was not malicious. Few of his disciples have been other than sincere searchers after the truth. Even though they have gone astray in certain byways here and there, why should any of us gloat over them? If their theories are demonstrated to be unsound they will be among the first to change them. That is the kind of persons they are. They do not love their theories because they are theirs, but because they consider them true. The only kind of religion which is worth professing is that which inspires the same attitude toward all questions of fact or theory.

On the contrary part, the religion of vast numbers of us can survive only upon special pleading. It has been driven out of every field invaded by human knowledge, and since this invasion has been so bold and triumphant in modern times, our particular type of religion has been thrust into very cramped and uncomfortable quarters. Many of our churches are founded upon that kind of religion. That is perhaps, fundamentally, the reason they are compelled to fight so anxiously for their life. They have so tenaciously restricted their dominion to the unknown and the mysterious, that with the persistent conquest of the unknown and the clearing up of the mysterious, numerous churches have lost their mission, and the religion which they assume to mediate has been banished from the field of direct human concern. To be sure, the unknown is still vast, and one conquest of knowledge only opens new and wider fields of mystery. But this type of religion, and the churches inspired by it, have grown weary of repeated disturbances in their old quarters. They are like the aboriginal Indians who resented being driven out of their wide and wild hunting grounds by the orderly institutions of civilization. One of the old-timers in Wyoming a few years ago remarked to a pal, "Gol darn it, Bill; we've got to make up our minds that civilization is comin' in!" Hosts of us profess a religion, and build upon it institutions, which cannot stand the prevalence of an order of society inspired by human intelligence.

The way to insure the stability of our religious institutions is manifestly to get a better kind of religion. It ought to be one which rejoices in the truth, which revels in every new conquest of the unknown, which hates frightful mysteries as cordially as does every true scientist, which finds divinity in a searching human intelligence and makes a shrine of every mode or method or program or mechanism through which that intelligence wins its holy triumphs. For many of us religion remains the blind spot of human vision. God rules the unknown, and he has necessarily demitted his office in all that realm which the impious mind of man has invaded. We cherish the superstition that only miracle can demonstrate deity. The explanation of a miracle is sacrilege. The discovery of causes for divine events is robbery of the divine glory. Our conceptions of eternity and immortality and the hereafter are of a piece with these perversions. We perpetuate meaningless antitheses such as geographical delimitations of the material and spiritual, temporal distinctions between time and eternity, between the mortal life and the immortal life.

We have blighted the spiritual. We attach it to our pet mysteries, and when those mysteries are dissolved our life grows sodden and gross by becoming "material." Harnack used to say that Christianity means eternal life in the midst of time, and Dean Inge has been saying the same thing of late. That is gibberish to hosts of us. It involves a contradiction in terms, in the vocabulary to which we are accustomed. Spiritual realities which inhere in and are inseparable from material facts and conditions we have no conception of. And yet they are the only realities which can survive expanding knowledge. The other kind feed upon ignorance and starve as life widens to embrace ever new areas of material conquest. The preaching of this kind of spirituality bemoans the increasing "worldliness" and "materialism" of the people and of the age, while, in truth, the refinement of life through material progress is the most momentous spiritual fact of our age. The call of vital religion is for an interpretation of this material progress which shall reveal its spiritual essence and potency. We need a religion and religious institutions which shall revel in these material facts, shall subject them to holy baptism, shall make shrines of factories and machine shops and power plants. We are urging business men and industrial leaders and workingmen to come to "church" in the attempt to "redeem" them from the holiest rites which have ever fallen to the lot of man, namely, the production of those material goods which give the life of today its chief spiritual charm. To make men spiritual many of our churches are seeking to wean them away from what most graces them with the divine favor. We are turning our world of realities upside down, and converting our holiest truths into a lie. Some of our loudest voiced church leaders apotheosize the greatest foe of man, ignorance, and hallow an estate from which it should be the holy passion of all good men and true on hot foot to escape. They have got God and the devil mixed, would shut men out of heaven, and people the hell of fear of the unknown with those whose real salvation lies in the courageous conquest of ignorance and of cheap mysteries and of false reverences. True reverence respects the truth, because it is the truth, and it cries shame upon him who will gloat over the limitations of human power and skill and wisdom to fathom the deeps and to scale the heights of the unknown.

If we could only realize how thorough must be the reshaping of our religious order we would not be so content to putter over inconsequential schemes of church "efficiency," nor grow so despairing of the "times" because our blundering church programs fail to work. We are anxiously devising plans to win back to God men who are finding God in a glorious revelation to which our eyes are blinded. The dedication of material facts and forces to the refinement and ennobling of human life is the holiest reality of the times, and our cloistered churches instead of bewailing the "materialism" of the age should open their doors and their eyes to give to the age an interpretation of the spiritual life which its heart hungers for and knows not is so accessible.

The Religion of Lincoln

AMERICA makes a profession of high principles when it pays tribute to Abraham Lincoln. No taller soul has walked with us in the new world, and no other words that haunt our hearts are so like the mighty voices that speak to us out of the old Hebrew centuries. More than once it has been pointed out that his style had something of the spirit and quality of the days when the prayer book was written; as if by a sure instinct his mind laid hold of the creative forces and impulses of our civilization. No wonder something of mystery, a sanctity half tragic and half triumphant, gathers and lingers about such a man, who seems destined to become "a Christ of the new social faith of America."

Carlyle said that the religion of a man is the chief fact concerning him, meaning by religion, as he went on to explain, not the creed to which he subscribes or otherwise gives his assent—not that necessarily, often not that at all, since this assertion may come from the outworks of a man, if even so deep as that—but what he practically believes, lays to his heart, and acts upon, and therefore knows concerning the meaning of the universe and his duty in it. That is in all cases the primary thing in the life of a man, and creatively determines all the rest; that is his religion. It is this primary thing that we seek in Lincoln—what Emerson called "the doing of all good, and for its sake the suffering of all evil"—because there we may hope to find the sources of his power, the secret of his endurance, his gentleness, and his infinite patience.

Where is this divine secret to be found? Not merely in his use of Bible imagery—though the cadences of the great Book echoed in his eloquence—nor yet in his words of goodwill to the men of this or that sect; and still less, as John Hay warns us, in "those who, with the most honorable intentions, have remembered improbable conversations which they bring forward to prove at once his orthodoxy and their intimacy with him." No, the religion of Lincoln is to be found in the fiber of his soul, the qualities of his mind, the principles on which he acted, which gave form and color to his character; that is to say, in the open book of his life. He belonged to no church, he signed his name to no creed; yet he was profoundly religious, and his faith was so much a part of his own being that one must analyze the man to find it. His mind was so moral, and his morality was so intelligent, as Phillips Brooks said, that one cannot be set over against the other. "It is a kind of poetry," said his wife, when some one asked her about his religion; and therein she was right, though he was too wise to be wholly a poet, just as he was too much of a poet to be implacably wise.

In a recent study of "The Soul of Lincoln," Dr. Barton has brought together all available testimony respecting the place of religion in the life of Lincoln, doing his work with admirable thoroughness and interpretative insight. Unlike many other Lincoln books, it is no indistinguishable blur of eulogy, blinding us to the real man and his lonely struggle with the deep issues of life and death. It shows us the limitations of Lincoln, no less than his power—his blindness to the beauty of nature, his tinge of superstition, his "morbid cautiousness" of mind, his lawyer-like habit of taking nothing for granted. The author sees that one of the greatest facts about Lincoln was his "capacity for growth," to use the phrase of Bushnell; so that what may be said of his religious attitude in one period of his life would not describe him later. His unsettlement of faith in youth was such as often comes to young men who think, and doubly so in his case, remembering the crude theology of the pioneer preachers to whom he listened. It is not true that he wrote an essay attacking Christianity, but, instead, a paper in which he made a plea for the universal and unfailing love of God. The document snatched from his hand and put into the stove in the New Salem days was not an essay on theology, but a love letter. In the midst of his perplexity of faith his sweetheart died, plunging him into profound sorrow, and making his fight for faith the more ardent and agonizing.

Despite his struggle and sorrow—perhaps because of them—Lincoln came to a faith of his own, a kind of sublime moral fatalism, in which right and truth will prevail as surely as suns rise and set. This faith fed his soul and was the hidden spring of his strength, his valor, his unbending firmness, and his patient pity, which are among the sacred things of our history. Holding to the moral order of the world, he knew that truth will win, whatever may be the posture of the hour. Men may delay it, but they can in nowise stay its slow, inevitable advance. In his moods of melancholy, which were many and black—the shadow, it may be, of some pre-natal gloom in the soul of his mother—he threw himself upon this confidence, not so much in formal prayer as in a quiet, inner trust; though, in later years, prayer became first a necessity, and then a habit. The spiritual drama of his life was the struggle to free himself from the clutch of fatalism; and he won his victory through prayer. In the terrible days of the civil war, when the weight of a nation rested upon his soul, and he was driven to his knees because, as he said, he had nowhere else to go, he learned that God does hear and help, that he is personal and loving and, in the awful ordeal preceding the battle of Gettysburg, that it is in Christ that we know what God is.

In order to understand the slow, hard struggle of Lincoln for spiritual faith, we must know the quality of his mind—a profound and penetrating mind, but essentially practical and more contemplative than speculative. Of the skyey genius of Plato he had none. Emerson he did not understand, except when he talked of the conduct of life. For Lincoln the sunny upland where our Yankee Plato walked was an unknown country. By virtue equally of his temperament and his intellect he lived in a dim, dun-colored world, under a sky as grey as a tired face. He thought as if no one had ever thought before him, and when his mind carried him to the frontiers of the Unknown, into the shadow of that obscurity beyond knowledge, he drew back, trusting the reality of moral law within and the eternal Will whose way he sought to know. His mind was ultra-conservative, and such a man sees life for less than it is. Naturally, to a mind of that kind faith is difficult, and many things which are clear to others are dim to it. For such a mind, when it comes to the edge of thought, three avenues are open—agnosticism, superstition, and faith; and while Lincoln was tempted by the first two, he was wise enough to go forward led by a dim, great Hand.

For all his fine poise of reason, and his wise humor—which is easily exaggerated, owing to its exceeding aptness—Lincoln, like all other mortals, was at bottom a mystic; that is, he felt that the Unseen has secrets which are known only to minds fine enough and pure enough to see and hear them. His humor taught him humility and kept everything in its place—including himself. None the less there was a window in his mind open toward the Unseen, and through it came influences and intimations not justified by his relentless logic, influences softening his fatalism and giving his spirit a nameless grace. One has only to study his dreams to know something of this mystery. He set little store by such premonitions; but, as a fact, at times of danger and disaster he was warned—and before his death he saw himself stretched upon his bier and heard the sobs of the mourners. It was this seer-like quality of his soul, if we may name it so, hinted at in his fore-feelings, that more and more swayed Lincoln toward the end, softening all that was hard within him and hardening all that was soft.

Was Lincoln a Christian? The question has been much debated, but the answer depends on what we mean by a Christian. If by a Christian we mean a man who holds certain dogmas about Christ—the manner of his birth, the nature of his person, and the works he wrought, as set forth in the creeds—then Lincoln was not a Christian. The simple fact is—confirmed by the testimony of those who were closest to him and knew him best—that he did not attain to faith in Christian theology, as that theology was interpreted in his day. Indeed, some of its dogmas he definitely and repeatedly denied, among them the ghastly dogma of eternal punishment. But if by a Christian we mean one who honors Christ as the Teacher and Redeemer of men, and who tries, both in private life and public office, to obey what the mind of Christ would command, then Lincoln was a Christian. If to have the spirit of Christ is to be a Christian, then, surely, if ever of anyone, we may say of Lincoln, as Tolstoy said, that he was "a Christ in miniature." He had a wise humility, feeling that what he did was done through him by Another; he saw something divine and God-made in every man, even in his enemies, and he was endlessly, foolishly, incredibly merciful. It is a part of the surprise and grandeur of his life that, with his early skepticism and his growing cosmic piety, he should have been accounted the most Christ-like man who has sat in the white house.

Nothing more noble than the character of Lincoln has ever been seen in the new world. The nearer one comes to him and the more one knows about him, the more stainless and just he seems to be. Here, in these elemental qualities of the man—his courage, his honor, his delicate justice, his melting pity, his scorn of baseness and brutality, his self-control, his championship of the weak, his sense of the public wrong as a personal bereavement; here the faith on which he acted is revealed as it never could be in any list of dogmas. His life, like the life of the Master, was founded on love, and the justice that is born of love. That love made him suffer, as love always does, and he became one of the great sacrificial spirits of history. As meditative as Marcus Aurelius and as blithe as Mark Twain, as simple as Æsop yet as subtle as an oriental; a calm, grave, strong man, formidable and sad; he stood in the white house a high priest of humanity, an awe-struck ministrant in the temple of God performing the rites of liberty, justice and pity. He was a man of God, divinely trained, plain, homely, kindly, who knew that humanity is deeply wounded somewhere and tried to heal it—his life was his religion, and of his fame there will be no end!

The Lack of Opportunity

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came unto me a young man, who sat before me in Creased Trousers and in Spats, but his spirit was in Sackcloth and Ashes. And he mourned unto me, saying:

The world doth no longer offer an Opportunity to an Enterprising Young Man.

And I answered and said unto him:

Five years ago there were players in the National League who mourned because it was no longer possible to make an Home Run under the conditions of Modern Base Ball.

And they longed for the Good Old Days when a Tick and a Ketch was Sure to Fetch, and Over the Fence was Out. And about that time along came Babe Ruth. But thou wilt never get to First Base on that line of Patter.

And he said: Alas, it is even as I said: the Opportunities have all been Monopolized by the Older Men, and there is now no Further Opportunity.

And I said, When Columbus set forth to discover this Land of Opportunity, there were multitudes of young men like unto thee. And they said unto him, At the Western End of the Great Sea are the Pillars of Hercules, above which are the words in the Latin tongue, Ne Plus Ultra, which meaneth, being interpreted, There is Nothing Doing when thou gettest west of here. But Columbus kept on, and made it possible for thee to lament the passing of Opportunity.

And I said, I am no longer young, but I see so many Opportunities that I would fain be young again to improve a few of them; yea, even now am I younger than thou art.

And I said, It is no more possible for one generation to use up the opportunities of the next than it is for one generation to breathe up all the air, or than it was for Noah to drink up the Flood. For Love groweth anew with each generation, and Hope springeth up afresh, and Faith lighteth up its Fire upon the altar of the soul. No generation can use up for the next the capacity for Loving, or the ardor of Hoping, or the Incentive of Faith. And I said unto him, There is Opportunity in abundance. Go to it.

VERSE

The Wind's Word

A STAR that I love,
The sea, and I,
Spake together across the night.
"Have Peace," said the star,
"Have power," said the sea;
"Yea!" I answered, "and Fame's delight!"
The wind on his way
To Araby
Paused and listened and sighed and said,
"I passed on the sands
A Pharaoh's tomb:
All these did he have—and he is dead."

Via Lucis

I F ever I dig out
Into the upper air—
Through dogma, creed and doubt—
I'll surely find Him there.

But ever as I mount,
I hear some wise one say:
"Your striving does not count;
Truth walks the priestly way."

Credo

NOT what, but WHOM I do believe,
That, in my darkest hour of need,
Hath comfort that no mortal creed
To mortal man may give;—
Not what, but WHOM!
For Christ is more than all the creeds,
And his full life of gentle deeds
Shall all the creeds outlive.
Not what I do believe, but WHOM!
WHO walks beside me in the gloom?
WHO shares the burden wearisome?
WHO all the dim way doth illumine,
And bid me look beyond the tomb
The larger life to live?
Not what I do believe, but WHOM!
Not what, but WHOM!"

Gifts which all their love might hold,
Searched He earth and heaven, and then Gave me you, my Heart of Gold.

The Religious Revolution

By Charles A. Ellwood

[A new book, a part of whose manuscript we have been privileged to see, entitled, "The Reconstruction of Religion," is now in the Macmillan press and will be published in early March. In it the author, Dr. Ellwood, interprets the spiritual need of our time in a fashion as sympathetic with religion as it is loyal to the standards and ideals of science and democracy. The book will, without doubt, create widespread talk and deep thought. The present article will appear as a chapter in Dr. Ellwood's forthcoming volume—
THE EDITOR.]

IT is commonplace that a crisis confronts religion in the modern world. Like all our other institutions, religion is in revolution. Says one of our great biologists, "Today we are in the midst of a religious revolution which is going on so quietly that many do not notice it, although it is a greater and more fundamental revolution than any since the early years of the Christian era.".. He asks further, "Can Christianity become the religion of reason and science as well as of emotion and faith, and be made the power for individual and social progress which its founder intended?" It may be objected that while the present is an era of transition in religion it is not one of revolution. Of course, it is not meant that the changes which are taking place may be accompanied by violence, but rather that a great transformation is in process in the religious world similar to that transformation in the industrial world effected by science, which we call the "industrial revolution." The Protestant reformation was a religious revolution in this sense. But a new reformation is now in process within the Christian church which will in time make the Protestant reformation seem insignificant. The phrase "religious revolution" is therefore a justifiable one.

THE PRESENT CRISIS

Many explanations have been offered of the present crisis in religion; but there is only one explanation which will stand sociological analysis. And that is that the crisis has been brought about by the failure of existing religion to adapt itself to the two great outstanding facts in our civilization, namely, science and democracy. The church must learn to adapt itself to these two mighty forces which are building modern civilization if it is to survive. Of these two, science is the more outstanding and dominant. It is the foundation of our views of life and of the universe, as well as of our material progress, and so it has largely created the conditions which have favored the rise of modern democracy. Yet the maladjustment of religion with science remains pronounced. The representatives of religion often openly oppose modern science and accepted scientific theories, such as the doctrine of evolution, and not infrequently proclaim religion as outside of the field of science and resent its scientific evaluation as a species of "sacrilege." On the other hand, we are often assured by someone in the name of science that science can find nothing in religion except superstition, error, or "the will-to-power" of some privileged class. Both attitudes make difficult the attainment of rational religion, that is, a religion in accord with the established facts of human experience.

But if religion is a vital element in civilization (and all unprejudiced social investigation shows that it is), then the attainment of such a rational, ethical religion is one of the greatest and most fundamental of our social needs, and nothing could be more short-sighted and stupid than an irrational attitude toward religion, whether on the part of its defenders or of its critics. A new religion radically different from Christianity is impossible and socially undesirable. But a more rational and socialized form of Christianity—a Christianity in harmony with modern science and modern democracy—is needed if the modern world is not to be dominated by sheer atheism or an agnostic scientific positivism. The final outcome of the religious revolution through which we are passing may not yet be discernible; but its possibilities are, and it is time for thoughtful men to choose among these possibilities while they are still free to shape the future of religion. It is time that scientific thinkers and the representatives of religion join hands in seeking to promote the development of a rational and socialized religion which will meet the world's supreme needs.

SCIENCE AND CIVILIZATION

Science, as we have noted, is the outstanding and dominating fact in modern civilization. A religion which is "adapted to the requirements of modern life" must, first of all, be adjusted to modern science. A religion which is not in harmony with modern science cannot possibly remain the religion of the thinking classes of the future. It is regrettable, therefore, because harmful to the true interests of religion, that some religious people resent all criticism of religious beliefs and institutions by scientific men, even when made with constructive intent. Constructive criticism should always be welcome in all phases of our social life, for it is the very method by which human institutions are normally improved. The hope for religion, as for our social life generally, cannot lie in thwarting rational thinking but in following it.

This may be evident, but there are many difficulties in the way. Strangely enough, the defenders as well as the critics of religion have often held that to make it rational would be to destroy it. Ever since Immanuel Kant wrote his treatise on "Religion Within the Limits of Mere Reason," there has been continual controversy between those whom we may call (for want of a better term) the rationalists in religion and those who have stood for some form of irrationalism, whether traditionalism, mysticism or some other. Without denying that there are necessary elements of tradition and mystery in all religion (just as there are in science, for that matter,) it would seem that this controversy is no longer excusable. For the issue is not the exclusion of traditional and mystic elements from religion, but rather whether the rational elements in religion shall dominate. In part, the continuance of this controversy is due to the narrow definition of "the rational" which its friends have insisted upon. "Much of the prejudice against reason," says Professor Hobhouse in his recent remarkable book, "The Rational Good," "is due to a misconception for which its friends are as much responsible as its enemies. By both alike, reason is often taken as a thing apart. On the side of knowledge, it is divorced from experience, on the side of conduct, from feeling. In both cases the divorce is fatal to a true understanding." Reason, he goes on to tell us, is not a name for simply one side of our mental life, but is rather a general expression for all that is used in the careful and critical testing of experience.

IS FAITH UNREASONABLE

Now scarcely anyone would be willing to acknowledge that his particular religious faith is unreasonable. Everyone acknowledges in one way or another the supremacy of the human reason as the ultimate means of testing beliefs and actions. This is simply the scientific spirit. The whole world has become rationalistic in the sense that it acknowledges that the validity of everything must ultimately be tested through critical rational processes; that is, that everything may be brought within the purview of science. Religion can scarcely hope that the processes which men make use of in judging other affairs of life will not be applied to it also. Religion must square itself with science. A religion which will meet the needs of modern life must be not merely remotely in some possible harmony with science, but it must be directly indicated by the development of "a humanity adjusted to the requirements of its existence."

It will seem sheer audacity to some to declare that a rational religion is possible which is not merely reconcilable with science, but is directly indicated by developed and completed science. It is necessary here to guard oneself against being misunderstood. Of course, fragmentary science, science which sees the universe only in bits, and which fails to recognize the social and spiritual life of man as subject matter for its understanding, will see nothing in religion. Of such science, there is unfortunately an abundance in the world at the present time; but it would be as unfair to judge science by it as it would be to judge democracy by the pitiful examples of it also to be found all too frequently in our world. A science which envisages the total reality, which aims at accurate knowledge of everything which exists, will surely neither leave religion out of account nor be found antagonistic to rational religion. When we assert that science leads to, and will become a support of, religion, we only mean, therefore, that accurate knowledge of the universe and of the total life of man will do this. Surely the more we know of the universe and of man, the more we shall know of God! It is time that religious people stop being afraid of knowledge!

WHAT IS SCIENCE?

But some one may say that science is only a method, "the quantitative measurement of objective relations," that it is not coextensive with accurate established knowledge, and furthermore that the accurate knowledge which we have or can get concerns such a small part of the universe or of human life that it cannot possibly have anything to do with religion; and that we must be content, therefore, to keep our science and our religion apart. Science and religion, it is said, have nothing to do with each other and should leave each other alone. It is this attitude which creates the maladjustment of religion with science which we spoke of at the beginning of the article. The obvious reply is, that science is not merely a method, but "critically established knowledge." It aims at accurate knowledge of everything which exists, including religion itself, and while its work is far from complete, its trend, its general direction, is such that we are able to see, in part at least, which way we must go if we follow its lead. Science is progress toward knowledge of reality. It is the result of the rationalizing activity of the human mind brought to bear upon the tangible problems of life. It may and does regard its work as incomplete, wherever the evidence needed for a judgment upon those problems is incomplete. Thus it hands over to philosophy the work of formulating rational inferences regarding ultimate problems. But modern philosophy aims more and more to base itself upon science; and religion, though it deals with the ultimate values of life, if it is to survive in a scientific and rationalizing world, must move along the same path.

As a recent writer has well said: "If religion is nothing but the submission to mystery, it is doomed. If it is the trembling register of fear, transmuted maybe into softened keys, but always fear—if this is all there is in life that is religious—it is not enough to satisfy the rational intelligence. Yet that is what a theology based upon the irrational background of life demands. In short, there must be religion of the head as well as of the heart, if the head is getting control of the situation—or else religion will share the fate of the emotions in which it has been enthroned. It will be disbarred from directing the life of intelligence, both individual and social."*

RATIONAL RELIGION

Another misunderstanding must here be guarded against; and that is, that rational religion is necessarily a weakened, emasculated religion taking no account of man's impulses and emotions, but as arid and lifeless as the so-called "rationalism" of the eighteenth century. Indeed, a small group of people still exist who call themselves "rationalists," and who display as their chief justification for this self-bestowed appellation a negative attitude towards all religion. Whether or not such persons are entitled to be called rationalists in any sense, it is evident that a religion adapted to the needs of human life cannot be a weak, colorless, largely negative intellectual belief, but it must enlist the whole nature of man. It must appeal to his impulses and emotions as well as to his most highly developed reason. A rational religion is one which can meet all of these tests. That, indeed, is the very mark and criterion of its rationality, that it is in harmony with the whole life of man; only in that life of man it finds the developed reason to be the highest and the ultimate guide. It would be an irrational science which would fail to take account of the whole nature of man, and which considered him merely as an intellectual creature; so, too, it would be an irrational religion which would regard man as a creature of "pure reason," or would attempt so to appeal to him.

Even Kant did not mean that man is a thing of "pure reason." What he meant rather was that religion, so far as it was true and useful, like everything else true and useful, could be stated in rational terms; that is, that it could be rationalized, even though from its very nature it comprehended, in one sense, the whole life of man. Rational religion will still have its appeal to the emotions and to the impulses, as much as rational patriotism or rational morality. It is the function of the reason, as the universally relating activity of mind, to harmonize everything in life, assigning to each factor its proper value in the whole process.

A DEVELOPING REASON

It is for this very reason that we trust the rational human mind to be the final adaptive organ in the process of human living. We need to recognize fully the worth of other elements in human nature; but we must realize that in the complex world in which we live these other elements cannot furnish the ultimate test of our values. It is the reason which must lead us upward and on in our struggle to get a human life more completely adapted to the more complex requirements of our existence. But it is not the reason of the individual which we modern men thus trust to lead us on to higher and better things. It is rather that developing reason in the whole life of human society which we call "science."

The individual reason, we all see, is narrow and limited; but the possibilities of handing down and accumulating the tested product of the rational activities of many individual minds, that is, accurate knowledge, from generation to generation are unlimited; and thus rational knowledge is bound to perfect itself in the race, if not in the individual, provided, of course, that some calamity to civilization does not interrupt its work. The modern faith in science is thus a faith in "the rational," and rests upon a secure foundation of knowledge.

AXIOMS IN RELIGION

It may be objected that there is another element in religion which gives us a surer foundation of certainty than any critical, rationalizing process either in the individual or in the race can do; and that is the element of "revelation," "inspiration," or "intuition," as modern philosophers prefer to call it. Even if there is such an element, however (and no psychologist would deny it), it is bound to work with and submit to the reason. This is shown by the fact that the reason has often undermined the religious and moral "inspirations" or "intuitions" of other ages. Not that these inspirations or intuitions did not have a value for the particular time and occasion when they were delivered; but like everything else in life they were bound to submit to the criticism of reason, and as a consequence many in time have been rejected. Those that we still accept we accept only because thus far they have been found to be rational when tested by critical reasoning.

There are axioms and postulates in religion and morality, in other words, just as there are in science; but like those of science they must be found rational if in the long run they remain accepted. The critical method of science does not leave unexamined even its own postulates, much less can it leave those of morality. In the one case as in the other, however, we may rest assured that "the intuitions of common sense" will, in the long run, be rarely overthrown when they are well grounded in total human experience. The fundamentals of religion, like the fundamentals of life itself, are not going to be thrown out of the window by science in the name of reason, but rather are going to be tested by reason. If anything is finally rejected by science it will be because, being tested, it is found wanting. Thus a rational religion which shall be far stronger than dogmatic theology in its hold upon human belief in the future because resting upon adequate and secure foundations, is clearly possible. It is time for religious people to stop fearing the work of science and of critical reasoning!

Nevertheless, the struggle to secure a rational religion in the modern world is accompanied by the most profound social disturbances. Our whole modern life is a scene of confused and conflicting values, ideals, and standards. Now there can be no doubt that the main element disturbing the habits, standards, and beliefs of the past in the modern world, is science. The new knowledge which it has brought has often been difficult to assimilate with the old beliefs and standards. Hence, it has precipitated what we have called the "religious revolution," even as science precipitated an "industrial revolution" a century earlier.

DECAY OF THEOLOGICAL VIEWS

Not only have old theological beliefs crumbled, but the theological way of looking at life and at things generally is seen to be of much less importance than former generations supposed. The entire edifice of speculative theology has, indeed, been undermined, and by many scientific thinkers it is assigned to the same rank as the mythologies of primitive and barbarous peoples. Because of the identification, moreover, in the popular mind, of religion with theological beliefs, religion itself, as a "control" over life, has greatly suffered. Not only have religious beliefs and values changed but they have been immensely weakened. Says Bertrand Russell: "The influence of the Christian religion on daily life has decayed very rapidly throughout Europe during the last hundred years. Not only has the proportion of nominal believers declined, but even among those who believe the intensity of belief is enormously diminished." The truth of this statement, as regards Europe, even though it is made by one avowedly hostile to Christianity, can scarcely be doubted by anyone who has carefully studied the facts.

The confusion, doubt, and uncertainty which pervades our world of religious beliefs and values is, of course, not an isolated phenomenon. It is only one manifestation of the general confusion which exists in the whole modern world as regards the values and standards of human living. All the institutions of the modern world may be said to be at the present time in the melting pot, being tested in the crucible of fiery criticism. Such confusion is to be expected in all ages of transition; for in the transition from one way of thinking to another, from one form of institution to another, there is always opportunity for confusion and uncertainty. No individual, to say nothing of a whole civilization, ever radically changes his habits without such a period. The danger in all such cases is that confusion and uncertainty may last too long, and that instead of new and higher adjustments being made under the guidance of reason, human nature may fall back upon primitive and irrational adjustments. For adjustment upon the plane of instinct, or reversion to old habits and emotions, is always easier than adjustment upon a new and rational plane. To guard against such danger it is time that religious people recognize the reality of the religious revolution and seek to control its outcome while there is still opportunity to do so.

REVOLUTION AS OPPORTUNITY

There is, of course, no cause for despair in all this confusion, doubt and uncertainty regarding religious and other social values, provided we can get light upon the reconstruction in religion which is needed to meet the requirements of modern life. A period of revolution and change gives opportunity for advance not less than for retrogression. Whether we shall have advance or retrogression as the outcome of the religious revolution depends upon the rational guidance which can be given to religious movements in the present time. It is foolish to expect that religion and morality can escape the criticism which is being applied to all other institutions. Their friends can best serve their interests not by seeking to shield them from criticism, but by seeking to guide criticism into rational channels. Unless, however, the religious revolution through which the civilized world is now passing has rational scientific guidance the chances are wholly upon the side of readjustment upon a lower plane.

MODERN NEED OF RELIGION

But is not the religious revolution leading us straight into atheism? someone may ask. There is no reason for the movement to do so if it has rational guidance. Nor is the general trend of the movement in that direction. The monotheistic stage of religious evolution, we have every reason to believe when we carefully examine the facts, has only just begun. The religious revolution which we are now undergoing, if it does not fail, concerns the transition from a theological to an ethical monotheism, from a purely metaphysical to a social conception of religion. Monotheism is not outgrown, for rationally understood it can never be outgrown; we have not yet grown fully into it. We need a more social form of it; but we cannot escape the necessity for faith that the system of things is not alien to ourselves. If man is to have a vital, social religion he cannot believe that the universe is "a fool's house" which will bring to naught his highest endeavors. He must have confidence in his world if he is not to despair. He must believe in the possibilities and the value of life if his energies are to be fully released—if he is to function efficiently as a member of society, even to the point perhaps of complete self-sacrifice. He must be able, in a word, to confront the issues of life and death with a supreme faith.

The modern man with the immense complexity and specialization of his activities needs religion, if anything, even more than did primitive man, to safeguard his social life. He needs it because he lives in a more complex world in which the difficulties of adjustment are greater. He needs it also because of his higher intellectual development which makes it more necessary for him to see a meaning in things beyond mere appearances if he is to adjust himself successfully to them. He needs it, finally, because a stronger and more universal good will are necessary as social interdependence in a world-wide social life develops.

But there is no argument, someone may say, for the truth or validity of religion in the fact that man needs religion. Even if this is so, there is plenty of argument for the truth of religion, just as for the truth of science, in the facts of human experience. Science affirms to be true what is tested by experience. It does not proceed wholly by doubt. Faith in the world of human experience, when taken as a whole and its errors allowed to cancel one another, is the supreme faith of science; and it is a rational faith. It is even so with sane religion. It, too, builds itself up out of the experience of life. If it affirms as true certain beliefs and values, it is because it finds these to be justified by their works in the lives of men and in the whole structure of human society. The chief difference in the history of religion and the history of science is that science has kept the open mind and has revised its appraisals of truth as experience has widened; but religion, becoming immeshed in traditionalism, has too often refused to do this, and so remained static while society has been evolving. Is it not time that our religion become suffused with the scientific spirit?

A DYNAMIC FAITH

The religious revolution has now given religion the opportunity to become a dynamic rather than a static thing—to become "experimental" as it were; to base itself upon the experience and needs of men in a present world. Thus between science and religion opposition should lessen. When science becomes fully positive and constructive it will point the way to rational religion; and when religion becomes rational, it will itself become suffused with the spirit of modern science and will seek in science, particularly in the social sciences, its ally. The religious revolution need not end in chaos and irreligion. The sociologist believes it can and should end, if guided by intelligence, in a new era of rational religious faith.

The great English painter, Watts, symbolized the faith, or rather the lack of faith, of the nineteenth century in his picture of Hope seated blindfold upon the earth. But such a view of man's relations to the universal reality can hardly be taken as the final verdict of the rational mind. The absolute agnosticism and skepticism of the nineteenth century can scarcely be regarded as more than an abnormal mental attitude brought about by the confusion and uncertainty of a transitional era in religious beliefs. Beyond it surely lies an era of rational and understanding faith.

The ages of faith are not past, as we are often told; for faith is of the very essence of normal human life. The ages of irrational faith, we may hope, are past or passing; but the age of a rational and understanding faith is still ahead. We doubtless need the maximum of faith, not the minimum, but it must be a faith built upon facts. To reach such faith we cannot turn our backs on knowledge, on science, and revert again to mysticism. We must not fear intelligence. Our safety must consist in following it in building up, on the facts of life and of the universe, a reasonable faith.

Says Prof. Gerald Birney Smith: "Beneath the stirrings and seethings of modern unrest, one discerns dimly the outlines of a religion which shall trust in the larger future instead of being bound literally to the past; which shall glory in the capacity of man to use God's resources to remake this world instead of inculcating a passive dependence on supernatural forces which lie out of man's reach; which shall develop scientific control into a mighty instrument for the welfare of man instead of uttering warnings against the 'dangers' of scientific theories."*

It is such a religion to which the religious leaders of vision are pointing, and which we shall attempt to outline.

My Layman Friend

By William E. Gilroy

IT IS related of Spurgeon that on one occasion, when a church committee had applied to him to recommend them a pastor, and had given innumerable details as to the requirements and abilities, the great preacher replied by sending a large sheet of brown paper, which he asked them to cut into the size and shape of pastor desired. All laymen are not so exacting and specific, though we are very familiar with descriptions of the ideal minister, and with criticisms of the ministry from the layman's standpoint. The average layman knows about the sort of minister he wants, but how seldom, unless it be that in some indirect way in which the minister is always harping upon it, do we hear the latter speak of the sort of layman he wants.

It is, perchance, a somewhat perilous topic. It is a peculiar function of the ministry to be criticized, but laymen are a privileged class. The "hard-headed," plain, practical man, accustomed to prompt and sweeping decisions, especially if he be "successful," is privileged to speak dogmatically by ministry and church. He usually knows exactly what is wrong, and he is prepared to find his way about with ease, where less practical, spiritually timorous men feel a sense of mystery, if not a degree of doubt. The average minister knows the sort of layman he wants, but he is a little diffident about expressing it. He is somewhat over-awed, and distrustful of his own demands. But here and there, even in the ministry, someone blurts out what other men are thinking; and that is the raison d'être of this article.

The sort of layman I like must be first of all a man who will regard and treat me as a man. I do not want him to think of me as in a class apart, or as a sort of member of a third sex. The ministry, to me, is a "man's job." If I did not think so, I would not be a minister; and if the layman sees it, as I see it, he will understand that because I am a minister I am none the less a man. I want him to treat me upon a plane of frankness and straightforwardness. I do not want any artificial reverence for my "cloth," or any undue deference to my opinions. On the whole, I want no special privileges, though I am not sure that I must entirely renounce these, if they are offered or conferred in the spirit that appreciates some of the special sacrifices and limitations to which the minister still is subject. I want no privileges that have the taint of tips and concessions. Mine is a high calling. I have no desire to see it debased, or commercialized, even if it should mean a fairer reward and more "pay." The sort of layman I like, if he appreciates my calling and my manhood, will never think of rating me according to my "pay." There is all too common a tragedy underlying the words of the young minister, who had brought high training and noble ideals to the field where he worked for a pittance: "I did not object to my pay, but I did object to my rating."

The difficulty of securing today sufficient ministers of the right sort does not lie entirely, nor even principally, in the meagerness of salaries. Deeper than that is the consciousness that too often a man's real worth is estimated according to that very meagerness of salary; and the man of high abilities, who is giving sacrificial service and doing his best, knows that, if he were called somewhere else at double the salary he is receiving, he would immediately rise in the estimation of those who ought to value him for the spiritual worth of his character and services, and all the more because he is so little concerned about material reward. The sort of layman I like must understand that I am a man, who by deliberate choice has renounced the ordinary competitions and ambitions of life, in behalf of a high calling. I desire that he shall treat me as a man in relation to that calling, and judge me only by my manhood, and by my fidelity to the standards of my profession.

A SUPPORTER OF THE MINISTRY

The layman I like must remember that his obligations are not fulfilled, either toward God or toward me, when he shares in employing me and in paying my salary. In supporting me he is supporting a minister and a ministry. He must think of me primarily, not as a hired man, nor even as the servant of the church. As a minister I am trustee of truth, a minister "of the gospel," responsible to God for that trust and ministry. The conscientious, Christian layman will realize that in his gifts to the church he is endowing a ministry, and not supporting a man in a certain position. Only this realization can enable him to assume toward me the proper attitude. Paul was very insistent that he was not to be judged by those to whom he ministered, nor was he even to judge himself; he was to be judged by the Christ to whose ministry he was pledged.

*"Social Idealism and the Changing Theology," p. 154.

The layman who understands this will have toward me a great sympathy, and a great expectancy. He will be kind toward my faults, because he rightly assumes that I shall attempt great things. He will understand that the height of one's standard suggests the measure of one's possibility of failure. As man to man, understanding how consecrated I am toward the great purposes of the ministry, and sharing these great purposes with me, he will not hesitate to tell me where he thinks I am failing, and in what respects he thinks I might make my ministry more effective. Nor will he feel sore, or disappointed, if I fail to see that he is right, and stand to my guns even in a course that he deems inadvisable. I like a layman who will be free, frank, and brotherly, in advice and counsel, but who will realize that I must ultimately make the decision—that advice that I am bound to take, or suffer dire penalties in the estrangement or opposition of the counsellor, is not really advice, but dictation. I like a layman with whom I can share in a brotherly way the visions and purposes, the hopes and disappointments, of a Christian ministry. If I am what I ought to be, and he is what he ought to be, there should be no difficulty in our entering freely and fully into such trustful and helpful relationships. And I desire, also, that when he thinks my opportunities of usefulness, for any reason whatever, are weakened or ended, so that it is advisable to seek some other field for my ministry, he shall, not as critic or foe, but as friend or brother, tell me just how he thinks matters stand. He will not shrink from an unpleasant task, if love and sincerity point the way, and, if his actions toward me are all motivated in love and sincerity, I shall have no cause for complaint.

AS A SYMPATHETIC FRIEND

I like a layman who will appreciate the special difficulties and conditions of my life as a minister. If he sees beneath the surface he will perceive that far from being a safe life it is a life of special temptations. If he is the right sort of layman he will help me to avoid the pitfalls. He will help me to be honest by never expecting me to hedge or equivocate in the proclamation of what I believe to be true. No matter how important they may seem to him he will not expect me to utter opinions that are not my own, or demand that I preach doctrines that I do not believe. He may feel free to express his own judgments; if my ministry does not appeal to him as essentially a gospel ministry, he is free to tell me so. I shall respect him if he refuses to support me. But if he is my friend, and my professed supporter, he will accord me a large freedom, he will help to safeguard me against temptation, and he will help me to be honest toward myself and toward God.

He must help me also to avoid the temptation of prostituting my pulpit and ministry to trivial things and superficial subjects. He may demand that I make things interesting, that my thoughts be mature, well-chosen, and properly clad in speech, but he will strive to see that my ministry moves upon the high planes and among the great things. Let him remember that even in the world of the highest spiritual things, demand in some measure affects supply.

If he is puzzled, or distressed, by anything in my public utterance, if he is my friend, he will come to me. Perhaps he has misunderstood my words, possibly he misses their implication, possibly I can show him that they are justified. But let him come to me; no minister wants the sort of layman, who half-understands or wholly misunderstands, and who goes babbling around making trouble.

The sort of layman I like will help me against the most deadly of all enemies—discouragement, by a judicious and timely word of uplift. He will know that I am not looking for adulation, or fulsome words of flattery. He will know, perchance, that an indication that he has seen, with sympathy, my failure in the high thing I sought to do, means far more at times than any amount of appreciation of what I have actually done. How pitifully harsh laymen are at times toward our failure, and how can a minister who has as high a standard as he ought to have do anything but fail? I should like my layman friend to come at times into the inner sanctuary of his minister's soul, and view with sympathy the doubts and fears, the aspirations and longings, the disappointments and shortcomings, the loves and sympathies, pangs and heartbreaks, that fill his life. And I should like, also, for him to see at times a touch of the minister's glory. It is when a minister finds a layman who can see these things, and feel them, that he feels that all the limitations and sacrifices of his calling are worth while, and he is inspired to go on.

AN EXPECTANT CRITIC

I like the sort of layman who will expect a great deal. Why should he not have a high standard for me, and for himself? I hope he has it for himself as well as for me, but in any case let him expect a great deal from me. I want him to be in the truest and best sense of the word, a critic—a man who wants to see me at my best, and doing my best, and who will help me with kindness, co-operation and counsel, to attain it. I want him to accord me great liberty, but I desire also that he shall demand from me the sort of liberty he accords. Intolerance is no more virtuous in a minister than a layman. He must not lord it over me, and he must not allow me to lord it over him. I want him to think for himself, and to tell me very plainly and frankly what he thinks. If he desires any help from me, he must be as frank as he would be with his physician were he seeking remedy for bodily ills. I should like him to remember that the true critic approves and commends, quite as often as he condemns. Also, that in a Christian fellowship all criticism should be from within rather than from without. If the layman is to help in my life and my work, he must approach it with the thought that it is his as well as mine. I do not want any irresponsible criticism; if it is to be of help to me criticism must be inspired by the passion to make everything better, and that passion is quickened by love.

I like the sort of layman, in short, who will be a Christian friend and brother. If he is that first of all, and all the time, the details will take care of themselves. And, lest the things I have specified should not appeal equally to other ministers, the wise layman will study his pastor before conforming to them too literally.

A Poet of the Social Gospel

By William L. Stidger

WILFRED WILSON GIBSON, from "Livelihood" to "Neighbors"; through "Hill Tracks," "Woman-kind," "Daily Bread," "Borderlands and Thoroughfares" sets flames of faith burning on the slag heaps of life, along the common highways that men and women of toil are compelled to tread; down in coal mines; in factories and mills; in dirty village streets, in dirtier village homes; amid smoke, and ruin, and death and decay.

Kilmer's flames of faith are set burning on city streets, roofs, and shops; Angela Morgan's on mountain peaks and in the heart of home; Millay's flames of faith are set burning where death hovers, and graves are flower bedecked, and loneliness lifts feebly its weary head. Gillilan and Guest and Riley have flung the flame of their faith upon the hearth of homes to keep burning forever these fires. But Gibson has set his fires above the dump piles and the slag heaps, and in the furnaces of factories burning with a great light of Faith in Humanity; the humanity that toils and sweats and breaks and dies that others may live. That is a vivid, burning, flare of faith he has lighted.

Poet Gibson is an English writer, from that land which has given us in recent years, not only some of our greatest contemporary poets but some of our greatest world-poets, including Alfred Noyes, John Masefield, Rupert Brooke, and Francis Thompson. All of this new poet's sermons are on the every-day, common things and needs of life and they are full of heartaches, full of want and need and seeming hopelessness, as some of the unique titles to his books and poems will indicate. The titles to his poems themselves will indicate how close to earth and how close to the common, human needs of men, women and children his writings are: "The Wife," "The Machine Shop," "The Shop," "The Brothers," "The Crane," "The Money," "The Ovens," "The Slag." All of these titles are selected at random from "Fires." "Old Skinflint," "Ambulance Train," "The Mugger's Song," "Pity Me," "Pedlar Jack," and "The Lonely Tree" are some selected at random from "Hill-Tracks"; while from "Livelihood" are selected the following enlightening and suggestive poem titles: "The Old Nail Shop," "The Shaft," "The Drove Road," "The Plough," "The News," "The Blast-Furnace," "The Lamp," and "Make-shifts."

The new social gospel is here. It is rolling in like a full swinging tide. Lowell well said a good many years ago, that the New Testament contained "social dynamite" as soon as the preachers and the teachers and people found it out. It contains more than that, as the world is discovering these days. It contains social T.N.T. And yet, it also contains the very oil of peace for the troubled waters of the social world if we will follow the leadership and give to the world the gospel in its full.

In a little verse that is used as a prelude to "Fires," Gibson paints a pretty good portrait of many of us who are "well-fed":

Snug in my easy chair,
I stirred the fire to flame.

Fantastically fair,
The flickering fancies came,
Born of heart's desire;
Amber woodland streaming,
Topaz islands dreaming,
Sunset cities gleaming
Spire on burning spire;
Ruddy windowed taverns,
Sunshine-spilling wines,
Crystal-lighted caverns
Of Golconda's mines;
Summers unreturning,
Passion's crater yearning,
Troy, the ever-burning,
Shelley's lustral pyre,
Dragon eyes unsleeping,
Witches' caldrons leaping,
Golden galleys sweeping
Out from sea-walled Tyre;
Fancies fugitive and fair,
Flashed with singing through the air,
Till, dazzled by the drowsy glare,
I shut my eyes to heat and light,
And saw in sudden night,
Crouched in the dripping dark,
With steaming shoulders stark,
The man who hews the coal to feed my fire.

Most of us too easily forget "the man who hews the coal to feed my fire" in the day dreams that come out of the burning coal; and we forget the man, aye the hundreds of men, women, and children, who toil in the night watches that we may have our milk and our bread for breakfast; and we forget the slaves who burn their eyes and their souls, that we may have the very clothes that make us feel so sanctimonious of a Sunday morning at the church, when we preach and when we pray. God pity us, and make us see, back of the flames that leap and make us warm, the man who "hewed the coal."

Help us to see it, but if we cannot with our imaginations let us read; especially those of us who are preachers and who want to know the signs of the times. For must we not remember that, as Shelley said, "poets are the trumpets which sound to battle; poets are the acknowledged legislators of the world"? Let us see the picture of "The Brothers" who worked in the mine where that coal came from that we spoke of a minute ago; the coal that started this book in the poet's mind; let us hear the crumpling of the roof of that coal-mine, and the rumbling of the falling slate; and let us see two brothers; brothers who had quarreled in the morning, as they face death in the cold dampness of the mine saying to each other:

Bob gripped Dick's hand; and then no more was said,
As slowly, all about them rose
The deadly after-damp; but close
They sat together, hand in hand,
Then their minds wandered; and Dick seemed to stand
And shout till he was hoarse
To speed his winning whippet down the course . . .
And Robert, with the ball
Secure within his oxter charged ahead
Straight for the goal, and none could hold,
Though many tried a fall.

Then dreaming they were lucky boys in bed,
Once more, and lying snugly by each other;
Dick, with his arms clasped tight about his brother,
Whispered with failing breath
Into the ear of death:
"Come, Robert, cuddle closer, lad, it's cold."

And if you don't get the scene of these boys dying and delirious in the "cave-in" of the mine wall, then go to William Allen White's great book, "The Heart of a Fool," and have your souls thrilled with the dramatic scene of the "cave-in" of the mine. It's good for us to keep these pictures in mind as we think and write and live for they are the stuff out of which the lives of the vast bulk of humanity are woven.

In "Strawberries" one gets a picture of the toiler who works that others may have the luscious fruit of early spring; that fruit which only those who are wealthy can afford, but that fruit which means bended, weary, crooked backs of human beings everywhere:

And every woman plucking in the row
Had husband, son or brother overseas,
Men seem to see things differently; and still
She wondered sore if even they knew why
They went themselves, almost against their will.

But sure enough, that was her baby's cry.
'Twas feeding time; and she'd be glad to rest
Her back a bit. It always gave her ease,
To feel her baby feeding at her breast,
And pluck to go on gathering strawberries.

Or maybe this picture will make us see a bit more clearly the connection between the weariness of a worn-out body and soul with the spiritual implications of a decent working hour:

He lay, beside his sleeping wife all night,
Too spent, too weary, even to toss and turn.
Dawn found him lying, strangely cold and white,
As though still listening to the Otterburn.

Gibson burns into our souls in the figure of a lonely, wind-beaten, fighting, struggling tree; a tree that, like our ocean cedars, has been struggling with the winds against fearful odds all the years, bent, old and worn, like the human figure which inspired Markham's "The Man With the Hoe." So many of the toilers of earth have been broken and bent like the old trees we have seen along the ocean shore. I have a dear old man in my church. No sweeter soul ever lived. He is so bent and twisted from the hips up that he almost makes a right angle with his upper body. I asked him how it had happened. He replied simply, "I worked in the mines from childhood; coming from England to the quicksilver mines of California twenty years ago!" He was an old, broken tree, bent to the ground:

A twisted ash, a ragged fir,
A silver birch with leaves astir.

Men talk of forests broad and deep,
Where summer-long the shadows sleep.

Though I love forests deep and wide,
The lonely tree on the bare hill-side,

The brave wind-beaten lonely tree,
Is rooted in the heart of me.

A twisted ash, a ragged fir,
A silver birch with leaves astir.

Does this give you a picture of an old workingman, who has toiled all his days until he is bent and worn; a "lonely tree on the bare hillside" of a New York, or a Pittsburgh or a Chicago industrial center?

Do you wonder that the cry of such a toiler, a toiler here in America who toils in the heat and dirt, walking his worn paths to his little hillside home or shack or shanty up there where the smoke belches and the sunlight never comes, dreams of his old "Northumberland" home across the seas? Do you wonder that his heart grows as weary as his bent back with the struggle to live? Do you wonder that he gives up hope when it seems that there is none to care? Do you wonder that when he sleeps he dreams? God, the very dream itself is the thing that tears one's heart out as he reads it and sees the old bent back:

Heatherland and bent-land—
Black land and white,
God bring me to Northumberland,
The land of my delight.

Land of singing waters,
And winds from off the sea.
God bring me to Northumberland,
The land where I would be.

Heatherland and bent-land,
And valleys rich with corn,
God bring me to Northumberland,
The land where I was born.

As we, who preach Christ and love human beings walk along the streets of our cities and watch the immigrant toiler who is bearing the brunt of the toil of earth, the toil that makes us free, the toil that digs our coal for us to make us warm, do we ever think of him in the light of a man or a woman far from the land of his birth, lonely, homesick for the green fields and the hillsides, but who is bound, a prisoner in iron chains for life because of his economic condition? God pity us and help us to see back of that old man and that old woman from Italy, from Russia, from England, a dreamer still in spite of fate and hurt and hate.

In "Oliver and Ursula Reed" from "Neighbors" Gibson sounds as if he were letting the light of Faith go out:

It's useless, wife, to turn it up; the oil
Is done, and you'll just char the wick.

The oil
Lamps take to keep them going! It's not long Since last I filled it. Surely something's wrong
With a lamp that burns so quickly.

Ay . . . the light
We thought would burn a lifetime, in one night Consumed its fuel in a wild flare, and we Are left a charred wick, smouldering smokily,
To work by till, at last, a dull, red spark,
It shall wink out and leave us in the dark.

But the flame of faith is still burning in "April":

Over the rain-wet bells
Of scilla and daffodil
With April in their voices
The blackbirds pipe and trill.

And lucent yellow and blue
 Its clear notes bubble and throng
 As daffodil and scilla
 Sing in the blackbird's song.

And faith triumphant comes to its flaming own in a poem called "Elegy" the first stanza of which rings out:

Stars that fall through crystal skies—
 Winds that sink in songless death—
 Are the light within man's eyes
 And his body's breath!

The glory of things made right in death; the everlasting Faith that somewhere, sometime the common, toiling, moiling man of work will come to his glorious own is implied in "Peter Proudfoot":

He cleaned out middens for his daily bread:
 War took him overseas and on a bed
 Of lilies-of-the-valley dropt him dead.

Gibson has faith in the Flame itself. His poems are shot through with figures of speech of fires, flares, flames, candle lights, window lights, lamps, bonfires, flaming slag-heaps, burning coal; and the fire of eternal faith in humanity and God and eternity. I have counted fifty poems that have as their strongest figure of speech the flame, or light. At sunset, I have seen a great factory, its western exposure of windows one tremendous, flaring, blaze of beauty reflected from the dying day. One evening as I was driving through the city a great automobile factory, with a solid mass of windows facing the west suddenly seemed to burst into flame. "The factory is on fire!" one person in the automobile exclaimed.

"Yes, it is on fire with sunlight!" I replied.

It was a glorious sight; a half acre of windows blazing with reflected glory of the glowing sun.

So are Gibson's books. They are full of flame and fire and reflected glory! Beginning with "Fires" and through every book flames leap up through the pages; leap up to mountain peaks and set beacon lights burning; lights against which the tall, gaunt chimneys of factories silhouette themselves; flames against which mighty steel derricks and cranes; flames against which dirty wooden shafts; and weary human beings stand gaunt and appealingly.

But these flames leap beyond the slag piles and the furnaces and set beacon lights burning along the hills of eternity; and then leaping higher and higher at last; they blaze along the Milky Way and light new stars of hope in the breasts of the common man of earth.

In "Windows" he sets new lights burning.

If I could live within the ray of light
 That runs through all things everlastingly—
 Not only glimpse in moments of clear sight
 The glancing of the golden shuttles that ply
 'Twixt things diverse in seeming, stars and mud,
 Innocence and the deed in darkness done,
 The victim and the spiller of the blood—
 The light that weaves the universe is one,
 Then might my heart have ease and rest content
 On the golden upland under the clear sky:
 But ever must my restless days be spent
 Following the fugitive gleam until I die—
 Light-shotten darkness, glory struck from strife,
 Terror to beauty, kindling death, to life!

And what wonder-filled lights of hope and love gleam in "To Audrey":

A crocus brimming with morning light
 Burning clean and amber-clear Single on the wet black mould—

So to me you come who hold
 Heaven in your heart, my dear,
 Every morning out of night.

Then, in a flash of glory comes his reference to the "Everlasting light" in a poem which he calls "Houses":

The house we built with hands
 To shelter love's delight
 From the pitchy night,
 Dark and empty stands.

But from our house of dreams
 Everlasting light
 Through the pitchy night
 Pours in golden streams.

The Lion in His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

ONE of the Lion's musical friends was staying in the house at the time. From the music room down stairs came the sound of the piano. First there was the exquisite dreamlike beauty of the Moonlight Sonata. Then came all the vigor and climbing energy of the Pilgrims Chorus. After that there was silence and we knew that the man of music having tuned his mind was applying himself to some work of his own.

"It comes to about the same thing whether it's music or poetry, doesn't it?" inquired the Lion.

"Probably it does," I replied, "but I won't entirely commit myself until I have a suspicion of what you are talking about."

My friend lay musing for a little while. Then he said:

"Put Tennyson in the place of Beethoven, and put Browning in the place of Wagner and you have it."

"You mean that just as Wagner used dissonance skilfully in musical composition, so Browning used dissonance skilfully in poetry?" I ventured. "I mean that every movement in one art can be paralleled in the other," replied the Lion. "You can carry it as far as you like. Whitman has his musical kin. And syncopated compositions are of a close kin to some very characteristic aspects of the most emancipated writing which is willing to call itself poetry."

There was a little wrinkle on the Lion's brow. He leaned toward me as he continued:

"There is a wonderful correlation between all the arts and all the movements of the mind. Take a great spring-time of the human spirit like the Renaissance. There is the brilliancy and beauty of new life everywhere. There is motion and energy and adventure in the very air you breathe. Then all this uprush of new vitality subsides and you have the creaking of the hard bones of a new scholasticism. You can find just that thing once and again in the history of music. There are the times when the very secrets of the soul seem whispered in haunting and glorious sound. Then there are the periods of correct and unilluminated dullness, the period of barren scholasticism in the musical world."

"How do you account for it? Why do all the arts tell the same story in their own individual way?"

"That is just because they are all the expression of the same struggling aspiring human spirit. The one vital energy moves through them all."

Now the musician below began to play one of Chopin's Nocturnes. And we sat quite silent letting it speak to us. Then the Lion went on and it seemed as if his speaking was actual thinking aloud.

"There really isn't much place for scorn," he said. "Even the movements which seem most bizarre and barbaric come from some actual thing in human nature. They need to be understood and disciplined and then bent to some fine artistic and human purpose. The great builders of the thirteenth century understood it. Think of how they used gargoyles. There does not seem to be anything very prepossessing about these grinning leering devils. But the architects of the middle ages understood them and used them. But they put them into the total beauty and serene joyfulness of their great cathedrals in such a fashion that the total effect of perfect and aspiring beauty was enhanced by their presence. The petty mind despises the new and raw and crude thing. The wise and understanding mind takes it up with a certain masterful sympathy and includes it in a total work in which all the raw crudity is lost in the ample fullness and maturity of the completed work."

"There's something like a philosophy of art in that attitude," I remarked while the Lion puckered his brow in further thought. He went on quite as if I had not spoken: "You cannot go back to Athens. You cannot go back to Florence. You cannot go back to anything. You must always go on. But you can carry on the rarest beauty of Greece and the ripest charm of Italy. Only to keep it all alive you must be uniting it with something deep and characteristic and vital which comes out of your own age and your own land."

"Then you see more hope for the future in Vachel Lindsay than in Alfred Noyes?" I enquired as I rose to go.

"I know what you mean. But you must not forget that Noyes wrote 'The Flower of Old Japan,'" the Lion threw after me as I passed out of the door.

Syud Hossain in New York

By Blanche Watson

AMONG the many able Indians that have been heard in New York during the past few years, it is doubtful if there is one who has appealed so thoroughly to all sorts and conditions of men as Mr. Syud Hossain. Clear thinking, informative, and wide-visioned—this man has left on all who have been privileged to hear him, an impression that will last. Deliberate and forceful in speech, impressive with not the slightest trace of heaviness, truth-telling without being antagonistic—he has created an atmosphere that will no doubt bespeak for anyone of his compatriots who may follow him, somewhat of the ready and sympathetic response that he has had on each of the many occasions when he himself has spoken.

From the Get-together Club of the Community church, that knows all about Gandhi and has several Indians among its members, to the exclusive Sorosis, oldest of all the women's clubs of the country—many of whom probably never saw an Indian before and knew next to nothing about "the greatest man in the world"; from the Town Hall that bears on its facade the words, "Hear the Truth and the Truth shall make you free" (while it consistently rules out certain brands of truth), to the all-inclusive Civic Club that welcomes every kind of truth, Syud Hossain has gone with the story of India, with the inspiring message of the democracy of Islam, and above all with the unique and lovely message of Mahatma Gandhi and the non-violent, non-cooperationist movement that he is heading. It has been my good fortune to hear Mr. Hossain before seven absolutely different audiences, but it was as he faced the crowded Saint Mark's-on-the-Bowery, after a service in honor of Jeanne d'Arc, that I shall remember him most clearly.

Saint Mark's adores ceremony and ritualism and changing colored lights. Convention holds sway there, and the curtain has to be drawn in front of the altar before any outsider can take his place at the reading desk. It was the holiday season, and the speaker stood beside a Christmas tree lighted with tiny colored electric bulbs. It was a strange setting, in more ways than one, and decidedly a far cry from the Community church where I had first heard him speak. Saint Mark's is the oldest church site in the city, and the second oldest church edifice. It carries one back to the early English settlers; it calls to mind the tradition of former days; it clings to ritual and the incense-pot; it delights in cassocks and candles. It is religious conformity objectified. The Community church, on the other hand, breathes religious radicalism. Should a member-in-good-standing from Saint Mark's set his foot within its heretical precincts, he—well, he might possibly jeopardize that "good standing." The Community church spells not only religious but social and political radicalism.

But, there is a likeness between these two religious groups, in that each is presided over by a man of power. Tolerant, sympathetic, broad-minded—loving humanity of all types, of all races, of all religions—William Norman Guthrie and John Haynes Holmes may be said to be as near together as their churches are far apart. To both men, Syud Hossain was a brother, Gandhi a prophet, and the Indians a people who have a God-given right to be free—a nation deserving of a future as glorious as their past has been.

I divided my attention between the speaker and his audience. As he was earnest and fine-spirited, so were his hearers absorbed and sympathetic. It was not alone the ability, the charm, and the earnestness of the man that held the audience, nor yet the beauty of the message that was his; there was something more, and that something, I could not but feel, was the result of an intense personal contact with a great movement, and rare insight into a great man. Mahatma Gandhi, symbolizing India, was in the speaker's heart and mind, and one could not but feel that every one of the men and women present carried away a vivid picture of the revered leader, and a very real understanding of the thing that he is so miraculously carrying forward on the far side of the world. The story of the non-violent revolutionary movement that possesses India today was not wholly new to the audience. The letter of it, so to speak, was theirs, but Mr. Hossain imparted to them the spirit of it. He gave them the inner meaning of the message that, if accepted, spells surcease from war and all its horrors and awful aftermath, and holds out promise of universal peace.

I found myself wishing that everyone of the intent audience had been a child, for the hope of the world is in the youth—a youth that shall have learned the power of love and the true inwardness of the golden rule. Syud Hossain has brought to thousands of Americans the personality of the man who has learned the one, and is living the other. He has made us realize as we have not realized before, the type of people to whom God, as some of us believe, is today intrusting the doing of his word on earth. He is urging the fulfilment of the teachings of the Prince of Peace—teachings that the west has so miserably failed to grasp—and this, not wholly by what he says, but by what he is. He has brought home to our hearts what others have held up to our minds, the thought that the east and the west are one. We need both messages and both kinds of messengers, and that in increasing numbers. "Before there can be peace in the world," this man insists, "the people of the world must understand each other, and before they can do this they must know each other." Both Syud Hossain, a Mohammedan, and "Saint" Gandhi, a Hindu, are saying with some of us: When people know each other they will love each other, and then, and not till then, shall there be "no more war."

British Table Talk

London, January, 9, 1922.

THE London Missionary Society has received much attention in the press during the last week. Since it is more than likely that echoes of echoes may have crossed the Atlantic, a precise statement of facts will prove timely. In two high schools at Bungalow an experiment has been tried. Non-Christians in these schools are 8 to 1, but all the students receive definite Christian instruction; of that there is no question. The difficulty begins with the prayer offered before the time of instruction. The heads of the schools are quite clear that it is wrong to invite non-Christians to use language in prayer which they do not believe. In a class for instruction they do not commit themselves; in prayer they do, if they use Christian language. The alternatives are, therefore, either in so religious a country as India to have no united prayer, or to provide some form of prayer which may be used without committing the students to a Christian profession. The directors of the school resolved to try as an experiment the second of these alternatives and they issued a book of prayers and hymns for that purpose. These are not non-Christian in spirit; they are, for the most part, prayers such as might be used and are used in most Christian churches. These facts have been lost sight of in the controversy. It is an experiment tried in two schools, it does not apply to the Christian instruction which is sound and definite; it concerns say the time from 9 a. m. (supposing that the school began at 9) and 9-10 a. m. and not the time between 9-10 a. m. and 10 a. m.

The Board's Action

Even so, this experiment has not received the sanction of the board. It was indeed resolved in June, 1921, that the heads of these schools should not be forbidden to use the book; the main reason lay in the general principle that we must trust the workers on the spot. But in December further action was taken. Realizing that this problem was part of the much larger problem of religious instruction throughout the range of Indian missions, the board held in abeyance its previous resolution and determined upon a complete investigation of the larger question. With this, nearly all of its members, even of those opposed to the action of the missionaries, agreed. An amendment, with a bearing upon the Bungalow issue was not passed, partly because, though its terms were general, it seemed likely to commit the inquiry upon specific matters. As at present the matter stands, the board is committed to nothing but to a searching and inclusive investigation into the character of the Christian education provided throughout its missions in India.

Dr. Jowett and Others

By publishing simply the amendment and the voting upon it, some journals have left the impression that the board of the London Missionary Society by a majority of 180 to 2 is unwilling to pledge itself to keep the name of our Lord forever in the heart of its Indian work. The impression has been conveyed that Dr. Jowett, of all men, is a ring-leader in this startling movement, away from all that the society has ever loved. Nothing could be more misleading as Dr. Jowett himself has shown. His letter to the press goes far; but alas! when once a misrepresentation, even if it is unintentional, has a start, it is hard to overtake. It may be put on record, however, that the board on the same morning in December passed a resolution on another matter which contained the confession of its belief that in no other name than the name of Christ is there salvation. It may be taken as a grotesque travesty to declare that the board of this society is disloyal to Christ. After explanations are given and the facts are known, such a travesty can no longer be believed.

Ceremonial in the Church

The Free Catholic conference has met and carried through its very interesting discussion of worship. At the session in which I had to state, as indicated in my letter of last week, the reasons for the Protestant revolt against ceremonial, there was another paper by Dr. Biggs of Oxford, a great authority on the history of worship. The Free Catholics listened to my defense of the "Protestant revolt" with the utmost fairness and yet with a certain feeling that while the Protestants could be defended historically as against the church of the sixteenth century and its customs, it was no longer necessary to continue their protest.

At the same time they seemed quite agreed that there must be freedom offered to the Christian experience to shape for itself new expressions within the catholic church. The morning, however, was memorable to one at least of those present for the beautiful and gracious spirit of Dr. Biggs, who, like so many of the children of the tractarians, is passionately seeking for a fellowship with others of other schools of experience. It is in the spirit of such men that our best hope lies, not perhaps of corporate reunion—that is not yet within sight—but of a spiritual fellowship. And which of our free churchmen would not feel in the presence of such men that he has much to learn, both from their vision and their devotion?

An Election

The air is full of election rumors. The chief matters at issue do not appear to concern the national welfare; there is rather a tug-of-war between various political parties within the coalition. It would be unprofitable to take up the time of American readers with nice points of political strategy. It is admitted that there are several good hands at tactics. Among our politicians there is Sir George Younger and Lord Birkenhead and Mr. Churchill. But as a somewhat detached observer I should doubt whether there is anyone comparable to Mr. Lloyd George in the field of strategy. He has an immensely strong position and if he can carry through his Cannes program, this, after the Irish settlement, will make him stronger than at any previous time. But coalitions are never popular here, and it is an open secret that the conservative wing is more restless than the other. If an election comes swiftly, it would present a strange scene of comparison. But one thing is clear, there will be no eclipse of the premier.

The New Year's Honors

It would be an embarrassing question for most of us, if we had to annotate (without being coached) the list of those who received honors at the beginning of the year. We always expect, and nearly always find one distinguished brewer or distiller. There are sure to be one or two leading actors; several proprietors of newspapers. But one at least of the names will receive no criticism. There is an honor which cannot be depreciated. Of knights and baronets there may be many, but of those who can sign O. M. (Order of Merit) there is a severely limited number. To this inner circle Sir James Barrie has been admitted; and no one will doubt his fitness. It is long since we learned to admire the Auld Licht Idylls; but throughout the long years of his literary life he has never failed his readers. Latterly he has limited himself to the theatre, and as a playwright he has a place of his own for tenderness and humanity, for his command of tears and laughter and for his appeal to all ages; and he has not yet lost his old power of surprising his readers. They have not yet exhausted his rich imagination.

And So Forth

The death of Sir G. Sims Woodhead removes from our nation a great scientist, a powerful temperance advocate and an earnest and faithful member of the Congregational church. One of the last writings of his I have seen is a long and most interesting review of Dr. Balone's book on Medicine in China. During the war Sir Sims Woodhead served as brevet-colonel in the R. A. M. C., being twice mentioned in despatches for his services. He invented a process for chlorination of the water supplied to the troops, in order to prevent the spread of disease through contamination, and acted as Inspector of Laboratories of military hospitals in the United Kingdom, and was for some time adviser in pathology to the war office. Two years ago he was created a Knight of the British Empire. He leaves a widow, but no family. . . . There is much theological controversy proceeding. The head of Ripon Hall, Oxford, has been attacked for his attitude towards the resurrection. Dr. Rashdall, The Dean of Carlisle, has been using plain language to Dr. Gore; the dean is inclined to hit back. . . . Westhill College has had great success in its courses of study arranged in different centers for Sunday School teachers. Altogether in the autumn during nine weeks over 2,000 students have been affected. . . . Dr.

Schweitzer is to deliver the Dale lectures at Mansfield twice a week during February. He will receive a welcome not merely from Oxford theologians, but from its musicians, for Dr.

Schweitzer is not only a doctor and a theologian of European eminence, he is one of the leading exponents of Bach. . . . From the Life of the late Lord Salisbury, "The worship that emerged and that governed his maturity was wholly personal in its inspiration and knew nothing of metaphysical abstractions. He worshipped Christ—not the Christ-type or the Christ-ideal or the 'divine revealed in the human.' The vision though clothed always with the mystery which to him was an essential and indeed in itself an evidential condition of man's approach to God was to the end apprehended with all the direct simplicity of childhood."

CORRESPONDENCE

Cheapening Religion

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Yours is a great paper and leads in a sane, correct, modernism which I heartily endorse. Its ideas of the Bible are right. Its theology is not hampered by the sixteenth century traditions. Its evangelism is against the dreadful "Billy Sunday" kind. But my special purpose is to commend most unqualifiedly Rev. L. C. Douglas' article, "The Galilean Psychology." We have cheapened truth, our churches and ourselves by doing what this article inveighs against and which I abominate.

Differs With Douglas

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The reading of the article, "The Galilean Psychology," Rev. Lloyd C. Douglas, was both a delight and a profit. I do not, however, agree with all he sets forth. I altogether disagree with him in what he terms "bad publicity" or church advertising. He holds Christianity does not need to be advertised because "Christianity is unique." He further says, "In Christian civilization it has no competition worth mentioning." By this he evidently means Christianity in Christian civilization has no competition worthy of itself.

As an analogy he writes: "If castile soap were the only soap on the market with no other to be had it would be doubtful if advertising would be of any value." The fact is this, that even if castile soap were the only soap on the market it would be necessary to advertise it and to carry on such advertising quite extensively. All people need soap, but people always do not use what they need. Cows' milk is the only product of its kind on the market, it is something all people need. Yet the Dairymen's League is carrying out a very extensive program of advertising to urge people to use what they need.

Now then it happens that there are many varieties of castile soap on the market and advertising of these different brands is necessary. It also happens that there are many varieties of Christianity in the world. These are giving legitimate, pure Christianity a hard struggle. Moreover, there are other religions giving Christianity a hard rub. Christianity does have competition worthy of notice in both Christian and pagan civilizations. To mention some of this competition is easy, there are Mohammedism, Romanism, Mormonism, Bahaism, Christian Science, Unitarianism, Premillennialism, and many others of the kind. The publicity these give themselves and have given to themselves by the press is indeed a challenge to the Christian church.

The idea of discipleship on the job in constant personal work is splendid. Every member of every Christian church is not, however, on the job and until every member of every church is on the job it behooves the church to utilize whatever medium it has at its disposal. As long as the church refuses to use the press as a medium of reaching the millions unchurched, so long is it indeed missing one of the greatest servants of the age. Preachers, teachers and evangelists may reach their hundreds, but it is the press that reaches the millions day by day.

If Rev. Mr. Douglas thinks the printed page is not an efficacious medium for reaching the many why does he write books and publish articles? Is it not after all but another way of advertising?

The Cult of Dying

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Shall the widespread publicity through the daily press given to the passing of Benedict XV go without comment touching its effect or purpose as Catholic propaganda on the essential dogma of dying, and the hereafter of a Christian soul? All agree that the pope was an estimable and useful man, a great figure for a brief time in his own communion of the faithful. But now again the cult of dying and of death, as taught in the church of Rome, comes into the foreground. No anti-Catholic jealousy, nor pro-Protestant pride moves one to an inadvertent on this open, painstaking, continuous publicity of Benedict XV's dying, the expose of frequent masses, the use of the repetitious rosary, of extreme unction, of invocations and prayers, and the sacrament for the repose of his soul. All these rites of a Catholic cult of dying and death and the hereafter doubtless are of intense and sincere interest to the Catholic world. But why parade these intimacies of a soul—these privacies of dying, before the vastly greater number of people who hold and practice a very different faith as to God, whose goodness allows not a sparrow to fall to earth unnoticed, and the faith in Jesus Christ, who stands for an immediate, absolute forgiveness of sins, whose grace toward sinful men is free and full, whose salvation is made complete on man's acceptance?

Only two days later than the pope's demise occurs that of Viscount Bryce. The papers pay tribute to his inestimable services as statesman, scholar, world-student-traveler and writer. But in his case no mention is made of his dying—save that it was a sudden death. There was no meticulous narrative of funeral rites—as of a nine days wonder—such as attends a pope; only that his body was cremated at Golders Green cemetery outside London. Why this difference? Do we not well recall the facts relating to a Protestant belief and cultus as to dying and death at a moment of Christian versus Catholic suspense now manifest?

All too early the primitive gospel fell into monarchic official hands. A religious autocracy was set up in the church. The official, whether secular or religious, feels duty bound to be officious, i. e. to dominate, guide, train the general mass and mind. Hence the slowly growing supervision by the church of Christian living, doing and dying, leaving no most intimate affair of day and night, no privacy of faith and salvation, but must be invaded and ruled by the priest. A Christian man could in no sense or degree call his soul his own, or even God's.

The dying of a pope, or other member of the hierarchy now assembling at Rome, but emphasizes by contrast the beautiful, joyful freedom of the faith belonging to the humblest Protestant believer in and possessor of the life in Christ triumphant over sin and death.

It is a gracious offset to Benedict XV's dying ceremonies and ostentatious parade of holy sacraments to have in mind the pure, simple obsequies that celebrated the passing of so great a spirit as that of James Bryce of England and America.

Letting the Bible Do Its Own Preaching

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I am wondering if our minister is not accomplishing something that no other minister in America is even attempting.

For years our boroughs have been content to attend church in the morning and call that a day's service. Consequently only the faithful few were at the evening service. When Rev. H. E. Stafford took the work two years ago he tried in several different ways by the preaching of the gospel through sermon to "fill the house" in the evening. He increased the crowd materially by "special" sermons, but the increase was not regular. Then he asked the board to give up the evening service and put on an afternoon vesper service and provide special music. As his part Mr. Stafford compiled Bible readings, dramatized books of the Bible, or episodes in the life of Bible characters, using the exact Bible text wherever possible, committing these to memory and rendering them in dramatic form. Sometimes he chose materials from other writers of Bible dramas, such as the work of Miss Miller, or that of Miss Russell. From the first these readings commanded the attention and held the interest of the people. And though we have had the best soloists and quartettes from Pittsburgh, yet it is the reading of the scriptures that grips the people, for there is a most intense silence always during the rendition of any drama or reading. After all when the Bible is really read it grips far more than the best sermon. Consequently without advertising, save as the services advertise themselves, the audience has grown until even on bad days we are forced to use the Bible School room to contain the crowd.

Mr. Stafford prepares his readings and dramas so as to appeal to the imagination, create a conflict in the emotions and then by a high dramatic incident sets forth the truth he aims to teach. If any other minister is doing this—preaching by reading the word—we would be glad to learn about his work.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: All thoughtful readers of The Christian Century will gladly acknowledge their gratitude to Mr. Archibald G. Sinclair for his scholarly and conclusive discussion of the authorship of the 46th Psalm. The argument is overwhelming as far as it goes; but as is so often the case with many first-rate Bible exegetes, he fails to carry through to the end and prove that the author was WILLIAM, and not Joseph Shakespeare. This is highly important, for unless it can be clearly established it was William the Psalm has no proper place in the Sacred Book and should no longer be read from the pulpit.

Let us then take up the pursuit of this matter where Mr. Sinclair has left off. The first syllable of Shakespeare is revealed to us in the third verse. The second syllable is carefully concealed from us until the ninth verse. So far so good.

Now we may be very sure that the author having taken such pains both to reveal and to conceal his surname will be equally careful to at once conceal and reveal his Christian name. So we continue. In the very next verse, the tenth, we find that the two most emphatic words are "I AM" and "I WILL." The second of these is the more emphatic both by reason of its position in the sentence and by its repetition. If then, we give them their proper form and order we have "WILL-I-AM," which by all proper standards of orthography is W-I-L-L-I-A-M, William—Q. E. D.

This is guaranteed to be a product of American scholarship which I think you will admit is not only similar but also quite the equal of the English brand imported by Mr. Sinclair.

How the Prophet Brought Life to the Boy*

THE boy was dead. Elisha put his mouth to the child's mouth, his eyes to the child's eyes, his hands upon the child's hands—and the child lived. As a little boy I very much disliked this picture and I have never been able to get away from that feeling. Immediately, therefore, I am going to turn to the thought of a wonderful sermon which I once heard from this text. The great preacher sought to show that in order to save a boy you must put your eyes to his eyes and your hands upon his hands. With your saving superiority (which must be superior, else you could not save him) you must come into the boy's world, your eyes to his eyes, your hands to his hands. For all that the psychologists have to say about the immaturity of the seeming mature, the childishness of the grown-ups, adults have a fashion of hardening and setting into another realm. Too frequently they lose all sense of the children's wonder world. The best man with boys that I ever knew possessed the soul of a boy and the brain of a man. Without difficulty he could live and move and have his being in the boy's realm. To see him build a fire in the woods, fish in the river, erect a cabin, plan a game, was to be aware of this ability of his to think a boy's thoughts and see with a boy's eyes. It is pathetic for parents and teachers to lose touch with their children, yet this is always happening.

Down in Tennessee a doctor's mule strayed away. Five dollars reward was offered anyone who would bring the mule home. All the men and boys tried to earn that five, but without success. In the little town was a half-wit named Jim. He came to the doctor and asked if the money would be given him if he found the donkey and was assured that it would. The next day at noon Jim came down Main street triumphantly leading that donkey. He got the reward but as he turned smilingly away the doctor said, "Jim, I want to ask you one question—How did you find that donkey?" "Wal," said Jim, "I just went out thar and sat on that-er stone an' axed myself where would I go if I was a jackass, and I went thar and thar he was." This same philosophy applied to boys instead of to mules would go far toward the solution of the so-called boy problem. If you were a boy where would you go? When you were a boy where did you go and what did you do? What outlets did you have for adventure? What elements in adults did you dislike? What was there in the Sunday-school that got on your nerves? What kind of books, people, ministers, games, schools, did you like? It is all so simple. Strange we wanted to mold the lad to our world!

Jane Addams wrote a book called "The Spirit of Youth and the City Streets." The trouble with most of us is that we were reared in rural districts where we had fields, woods, rivers, horses, pets, orchards, watermelon patches and boundless liberties. But our children must live in the city streets. The only field is the park more than a mile away. The horse is a bicycle or car, the woods is a telephone-pole, the orchard and melon patch is Tony's fruit stand, the liberty is gone. How shall we afford a boy his natural realm when he lives in a flat and has no place to play but the pavement? The Boy Scout movement has come to our aid, but our problem is to get the money-mad adults, the social-climbing adults, the thick-headed unimaginative older folks to take an interest in the Boy Scout and Girl Scout movements! Incredulous but true.

We must see with a boy's eyes religiously. His world is not the theological realm of the denominationalist. The essentials will appeal to him, God, the Father, Christ, the hero, fair-play, generosity and chivalry. He will swear allegiance to Jesus Christ when properly taught and when he admires the man or woman who talks to him about this all-important decision. More-over boys and girls do not need a special sermon; they need the church service with all its stateliness, its great hymns, its communion service, its high decisions, all its symbols and all its power and movement. If I had to take my choice between my boys going to Sunday-school and then going home or missing Sunday-school altogether and attending the church service I would take the latter. This may seem revolutionary but it deserves thought. The great preacher is simple, he is a boy grown older, every sermon has its stories; he sees the children in the pews and his heart goes out to them. Something in the sermon is for them; he sees with their eyes, he helps them grasp God, eternal life and heaven. He puts their trusting hands into the hand of the Man of Galilee. He lives for his children.

Religious Liberals Hold Meeting in the West

The National Federation of Religious Liberals held its annual meeting in the west this year, going to Sioux City, Ia. The sessions were held in First Unitarian church. The personnel included men from five denominations, Universalist, Unitarian, Jewish, Congregational and Friends. Though this was the first meeting in a western city, the meetings were largely attended. Plans were considered for holding regional meetings in various parts of the country during the year. Both churches and ministers are admitted to membership in the organization. Rev. Charles Wendte, D.D., was chosen honorary president, and Dr. Jesse H. Holmes of Swarthmore, Pa., president. The secretary is Frank H. Burt of Boston, Mass. Among the letters read was one from Chief Justice Taft expressing the desire to enroll as a member of the organization. Among the interesting addresses was one on "The Place of the Holy Spirit in the Religion of Liberals" by Dr. Ambrose W. Vernon of Carleton college.

Church at National Capital Makes Progress

Vermont Avenue Disciples church in Washington, D. C., the church where President Garfield worshipped, is to have a new building through the cooperation of the denomination all over the nation. A change of location is being considered and several choice pieces of property are now under review, but no actual purchase has yet been made. Last year this church received 184 new members. The money raised for all purposes was $31,753.30, about one-third of which went to missions, benevolence and education. Rev. Earle Wilfley is the pastor of the church, and his audiences have been well maintained in face of a constantly decreasing force of government clerks in Washington.

McCall Mission in France Is Now Fifty Years Old

The McCall Mission in France is now fifty years old, and in celebrating the anniversary a thoroughly worthy record of achievement has been published. The mission is called "le mission populaire evangelique" in France. It was founded by the late Dr. and Mrs. Robert Whitaker McCall on January 17, 1872, in a rented store in the riot-swept home of the commune. Many cities in France invited him to visit them after the report of his work in Paris spread. At the time of his death there were McCall halls from the channel to the Mediterranean. In these halls, in addition to the preaching services, there are daily exercises and classes for the boys and girls, young people's clubs, boy scout organizations, temperance work, mothers' meetings and many other of the characteristic settlement activities. The work in France has a committee of direction composed of French Lutherans, Baptists, Reformed church people, Episcopalians and Presbyterians. In America the movement is supported by the American McCall Association. There are fifty-three senior and twelve junior auxiliaries in various parts of the country. The American organization is headed by Mrs. F. B. Kelley.

Wittenberg College Will Campaign for Theological Students

Although the Lutheran denomination is by no means as desperate for ministerial reinforcements as is many another denomination, nevertheless it does face the fact that there are 351 vacant parishes which include 542 congregations. Wittenberg college has become the voice of a new movement to recruit the ministry up to full strength. During the next two or three months banquets will be held in local churches all through the territory served by this college. These banquets will be addressed by prominent speakers who will present the urgent needs for more men for the ministry, and will make the appeal direct to the young men and boys of the congregation to consider the ministry. It is estimated from reports made to the college office that between 350 and 400 banquets will be held this year, and it will require at least eighty speakers to go out and make the addresses before these gatherings. In a good many of the churches movie films will be shown showing college life at Wittenberg. Rev. H. C. Roehner, pastor of First Lutheran church of Mansfield, Ohio, in discussing this movement recently said: "The need of the Christian religion is being felt more strongly today than perhaps it ever has in all spheres of human activity. And just at this important time when the need is being felt so keenly, and there is a looking to Christianity for help, we are brought face to face with the alarming and lamentable shortage in the number of pastors, men on whom the carrying forward of the church depends most."

Washington Has a Conference on Evangelism

Washington has a strong Federation of Churches, one of the largest in the country. One hundred local churches are affiliated with this organization. Recently the federation stood sponsor for a conference on evangelism. Dr. Charles L. Goodell of the Federal Council was the master of ceremonies. Denominational specialists and leaders connected with national organizations who participated in the conference were Dr. Charles F. Aked, Rev. J. M. Bader, Dr. R. C. Helfenstein, Dr. Walter B. Greenway, Rev. H. F. Stillwell and Rev. George B. Dean.

Disciples Congregationalism Falls Down In Missouri

THE commonwealth of Champ Clark and his "houn' dawg" has long been the section where Disciples churches have led all other religious denominations in point of numbers. State Secretary Caspar C. Garrigues has recently given to the public some carefully drawn-up statistics in which the result of the extreme congregationalism of the Disciples is seen as producing results little short of suicidal. Mr. Garrigues says: "Out of 1,025 churches or groups of Disciples in Missouri, only 162 have full-time preaching, 22 three-fourths time, 136 half-time, 417 quarter-time, 288 no preaching, and at least 705 church groups over which there is practically no shepherding care on the part of any preacher. Of these 1,025 churches and groups in Missouri, 380 made some offering last year to Missouri missions. Thirty-six of these 380 contributing churches gave more than half of all that was given to Missouri missions during the year. These thirty-six churches, representing a membership of 24,000, gave an average of 35 cents per member for state missions for 1920-21.

In analyzing the situation, Mr. Garrigues rightly comes to the conclusion that the Disciples have in recent years given so much attention to national and international enterprises in religion that they have neglected the home base. The Missouri state organization has divided its territory into seven districts, and in each district there are county organizations. Each district now has a superintendent. The mass evangelism idea still possesses the denomination to such an extent that the activities of these superintendents is largely in the field of revivalism instead of church methodology. In some counties the churches are strong enough to provide a county superintendent who mothers the weak churches. This is particularly so in the sixth district, where twelve such men are now at work. The problem of ministerial education is also an urgent one. While many of the Missouri preachers are of the very best training, many more have but little more than high school education. It is either organization or disintegration with the Disciples, and Missouri, having the most serious problems arising from individualism on the part of the churches, is making some of the most courageous efforts to meet these problems.

in the carrying on of religious work. No denominational issue will be considered, as the chaplain is directed in his work. The present organization of religious work in the army is far and away the most effective that has ever developed. Under the new ruling each chaplain must produce a distinctly religious result.

The three churches uniting were the Congregational, Baptist and Disciples. Not all churches are yet aware of the fact that there is such a great cooperative movement as the Federal

Council of Churches. We are planning to have Dr. Willett come to Butte again and give a series of addresses under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. The people are hungry for the kind of gospel he preaches. One attorney came from a neighboring town to hear him, saying, 'I am hungry. My spiritual diet at home is premillennialism.' His daughter is a student in one of our state institutions. She came home on her recent holiday visit. He asked her if she attended church while at college. Her answer was, 'Dad, people who think don't attend church any more.' It would be a great service if men of the type of Dr. Willett could give more time to visiting the churches and colleges of the country."

Dr. Clifford Has Operation for Cataract

Dr. Clifford, veteran Baptist minister of England, is a kind of living miracle of vitality and efficiency at the age of eighty-six. He was run down by an automobile on his latest birthday and recovered nicely from his injuries. His sight has been impaired by cataracts, and when the second eye recently became seriously involved, Dr. Clifford submitted to an operation. It is stated that he is now able to see better than for many years. While he was having his operation, he was summoned to court as a passive resister against the school tax. The ground of Dr. Clifford's resistance is that the control of the education in England has been put into ecclesiastical hands, a method obnoxious to a Baptist as indeed to all freechurchmen of England.

Has a Revolving Cross on the church

Illuminated crosses on churches are to be found in several large cities, but in St. Louis is one that is different. Union Avenue Christian church has erected a revolving cross on the tower of its great building. Beginning with the first night of the new year, this cross is lighted every night from twilight until midnight. As the church is located on an elevation the revolving cross can be seen for great distances around. This is the church attended by many of the secretaries of the United Christian Missionary Society since St. Louis became the headquarters city of the Disciples organized work. Dr. George A. Campbell is pastor.

English Now Have an Ordained Woman Minister

While women have for many years been ordained in certain American denominations, the idea of an ordained woman minister is still new to the English mind. Recently Rev. Claud M. Coltman and Rev. Constance Mary Coltman were installed as joint ministers at Maida Vale Congregational church, West London. They were ordained at King's Weigh House by Dr. Orchard after they had pursued studies together at Mansfield college, Oxford. Mrs. Coltman says with regard to the ministry: "It is the crown of feminism, the culmination of the whole movement of the age. You cannot have social and political equality without spiritual equality." In the pulpit, Mrs. Coltman wears a purple cassock with a university college gown and cap, though not out of deference to St. Paul, she says.

Rallies of American Indians Will Be Held

Large aggregations of Indians will be brought together at an early date, not to dance the war dance, but to take interest in the extension of the gospel among their comrades. This program is one of the results of the recent annual meeting of the Home Missions Council in New York. The movement will be started in two or three cities of Oklahoma. Other meetings will be held at Albuquerque, Riverdale, Sacramento, Seattle, Laramie and Sioux Falls. A recent survey shows that there are 336,000 Indians, two out of three of whom are now citizens of the United States. While a few Indians have been made rich by oil, the vast majority are abjectly poor. The new Indian commissioner, a South Dakota Episcopalian appointed by President Harding, finds one of his chief functions in preventing the Indians from being cheated by white men of low character.

Lord's Day Being Attacked in New England

It may be something of a shock to people in other sections of the country to learn that some of the most serious attacks against the Christian day of worship are being made in New England. The character of many communities has utterly changed. During the war the Massachusetts legislature passed a bill legalizing Sunday work on the farms in order to produce food to win the war. The act by its own terms was automatically abrogated at the end of the war. There is now a new bill in the legislature extending these privileges indefinitely, and adding the privilege that the farmer may sell his products on Sunday, including apple juice. The latter provision is regarded by keen observers as a "joker" which would bring back into the state something not unlike a Sunday saloon, for it is well known that hard cider is a beverage which produces positive results. The Lord's Day League of New England recently held its annual meeting and reports the most successful year of its history. The organization fights such proposed legislation as that in Massachusetts, and is trying to put an end to Sunday agricultural fairs throughout New England at which an admission fee is charged.

Heresy Trial in Church of England Is Interesting

The church of England usually prefers not to push heresy trials against its ministers, depending upon the recital of the creeds and the litany to keep the people orthodox. One of the results of the Modern Churchmen's conference held at Cambridge University last summer is a heresy trial which is following the course of medieval ecclesiastical procedure. Rev. H. A. D. Major, head of Ripon college, Oxford, is charged with denying the resurrection of Christ, and of importing into the Christian religion the teachings of Buddha. This charge is brought by Rev. C. E. Douglas, who controls the Faith Press. The charge against Mr. Major has damaged him in his work. While he is for the most part refraining from public discussion while the case is pending, it is interesting to note the Hibbert Journal for January has an article from his pen in which he distinguishes between the position of modern churchmen and that of the Unitarians. American Unitarians have of late been trying to claim some of the English Episcopalians as brethren.

The Life of Christ

By REGINALD J. CAMPBELL, D. D.

*Vicar of Christ Church, Westminster, and
formerly Minister of City Temple, London*

A record of all that modern scholarship can tell of the life of Jesus, written by a world-famous preacher, who has brought to his task years of study, a striking felicity of style, and a deep understanding of the expression of a great religious philosophy in an actual life.

“THEOLOGIES may come and go, but the Jesus of Christian faith and worship possesses an immediacy independent of all theorizing about its nature, an intimacy indissolubly one with the life of the church he indwells.” Such is the viewpoint of Dr. Campbell in this new work. He continues: “Every reader knows the impossibility of conveying a complete pen picture of any personality whatsoever. You may describe minutely the appearance, manners, voice, and other peculiarities of a new acquaintance, but you do not succeed in giving to any one at a distance your own impression of the man himself, his spiritual idiom, so to speak; the thing which constituted that man’s special individuality and differentiates him from all the rest of the world is the indescribable. No matter how much you may have heard beforehand about a person or read of him and his doings, it is only when you come into actual contact with him that you receive a true idea of what he is. It is the present writer’s conviction that this has been largely overlooked in recent years in the criticism of New Testament literature. The only right method of approach to the Jesus of the New Testament is through the living witness, the witness of his continued presence with his church. No other method can yield any but misleading results.”

“We cannot regard what Jesus was,” the author concludes, “as an open question; we must assume that to be settled by nineteen centuries of Christian witness. Hence when critics of the gospel records of his ministry diverge from the accepted view of the church on this point we can only reply that they are not in a position to determine it; we know Jesus, not from criticism of literary sources, but from the unimpeachable fact that there is a continuity of Christian life which claims to derive historically from him and to be immediately dependent upon fellowship with him in the ordinances of the church and the ministry of the word.”

When Dr. Campbell went from the City Temple to the vicarage of Christ Church, Westminster, he told of his changed point of view in “A Spiritual Pilgrimage.” He really continues his story in this latest work. This is not simply another Life of Christ, but a different Life of Christ.

Prof. HARRY F. WARD asks:

What is to be the Christian teaching concerning war? Is it going to declare judgment on the basis of the principles set forth in the gospels or will it be only the expedient servant of nationalism and continue to exhort its followers to internecine slaughter?

Is the American pulpit going to continue denouncing war in general and supporting wars in particular?

Kirby Page, in his new book,

THE SWORD OR THE CROSS

endeavors to meet these questions frankly and fairly. From his extended experience as an associate of Mr. Sherwood Eddy in his religious campaigns in Europe and around the world, Mr. Page is led to believe that the present attitude of so-called religious nations is driving the world on to certain war. But he still has hope that the church will awake in time to save the world from a repetition of the great debacle of 1914.

OPINIONS OF THE BOOK:

Harry Emerson Fosdick, Union Theological Seminary:

Let me congratulate you upon a very sincere and impressive piece of work. As you know, I do not completely agree with all your conclusions but your presentation of your point of view seems to me the best statement which I have yet read of it. Even though my method of attack on war may not be identical with yours, I am so sure that the presence of war is the greatest standing challenge to Christianity, that I sincerely trust that your book may have a wide circulation and an earnest reading.

The Presbyterian Advance, Nashville:

In six clear, strong, concise chapters the author presents a terrible condemnation of war and a strong argument for its complete abandonment by those who would act fully in accordance with the mind and spirit of Jesus. In fact, we are dared to act upon the very obvious teachings of the Master and to risk all in the determination to be true idealists, as he was. With the war spirit still upon us and our familiarity with the excuses which are given for war, the author will be deemed a most pronounced pacifist, and so he is, because he understands that nothing less is demanded of the follower of Christ. Even many who are fully satisfied that war is sometimes justifiable would do well to read this straightforward little book and get the other point of view, for it reveals a kind of heroism in the pacifist which is sometimes mistaken for cowardice.

The Big Novel of 1921-22

If Winter Comes

By A. S. M. HUTCHINSON

More than 225,000 copies of this book have already been sold, and it was issued only last Autumn. Note what Dr. Frank Crane says of the book:

"I have no doubt that the year 1921 will be known to the next generation as the year when Mark Sabre was born. Mark Sabre is going to be as real to me as long as I live as any man I have known in the flesh. For there are two sorts of inhabitants in this world: (1) Book People; (2) Flesh People. The second kind is a more or less developed animal; the first is a pure spiritual creation.

"For instance, these people just as really inhabit the earth as President Harding or Jack Dempsey; these people—Pantagruel, Don Quixote, Wilhelm Meister, Jean Valjean, Micawber, Little Lord Fauntleroy, Becky Sharp, and Uriah Heep. These are the true immortals that walk among us. And I have a strong suspicion that Mark Sabre belongs to the company."

The Fruits of Victory

By NORMAN ANGELL

Author of "The Great Illusion."

NO ONE is really prepared to face the questions which the discussion of disarmament is bringing to the fore unless he is informed of the economic facts underlying such discussion. Norman Angell has furnished just this information in his new volume, "The Fruits of Victory." The argument of the book is that from an economic viewpoint war is utterly futile. Every minister who plans to take his part in the coming campaign for disarmament should have this volume and master its contents.

Dr. Lyman Abbott of The Outlook
says of Lloyd C. Douglas'

Wanted—A Congregation

"Mr. Douglas's volume is not a story with a moral, but a moral in a story. A minister who is preaching to a small and eminently respectable congregation in a large church is invited to a birthday dinner with a college classmate; meets there three successful men—a manufacturer, a doctor, and an editor; is inspired with a new spirit of energy, enterprise and initiative, and goes home to put into his business the spirit which they put into theirs and to employ much the same sort of methods. It is a good book for ministers to read, because a spirit of energy, enterprise, and initiative is a good spirit for ministers to acquire. But to imitate the Rev. Dr. Preston Blue's methods and expect from the methods the Rev. Preston Blue's success would be a great mistake. Mere imitation rarely achieves a great success, and never in any form of industry which requires spiritual power. And methods which are employed by one minister in one community with good results may, when employed by a minister of a different temperament and in a different community, be fatal to results. I commend the book for inspiration but not for imitation."

A New Prime Minister: Mr. Lloyd George

MORE than once we have spoken rather sharply of the British prime minister; but it was understood, of course, that we spoke of him only as a political leader. For Mr. Lloyd George personally we have the greatest admiration, alike for his genius and his character—as any one must have who knows his career from the time when he was “a little brother of the poor” in Wales, all through his heroic fight for the disinherited in England. Indeed, it was just for that reason, because his attitude during the national election of 1918 and at the peace conference—as well as his horrible black and tan policy in Ireland later—seemed so out of character, that we were filled with sorrow and dismay. Yet it has been an ineradicable conviction with The Christian Century that Mr. Lloyd George’s extreme and almost irresponsible opportunism was only temporary, an adjustment to the post-war mood. Our expectation has never relaxed that when public opinion returned to some sort of sanity he would again appear in the role of a true statesman. Recently he has seemed to return to his true character, and with the inconsistency of an opportunist we have seen him negotiating with the leaders of Ireland whom he had denounced as ruffians and red-handed murderers. Whether his change of spirit and tactics be due to a return of the better angels of his nature, or to the threat of chaos, it is matter for rejoicing; the more because he has been able to do what Cromwell and Pitt failed to do. Let us hope that he will once more take up and carry through the reforms laid aside at the outbreak of the war, especially the emancipation of the land, without which it seems impossible for Britain to find her way out of the difficulties in which she is involved. Anyway, as matters now stand, no living man has it in his power to do more good for humanity than Mr. Lloyd George; and all right-thinking men will pray that he may see his opportunity, seize it, and use it to the full, and so win that permanent fame which, as Gladstone said, is akin to ideal excellence.

The Opportunity of the Roman Church

THE choice of a new pope brings to the Catholic church a new opportunity. The affairs of this ancient church have been in a bad way for a long time. In South America the corruption and ignorance of the clergy have alienated most of the men from the church. In France no return of an ambassador to the vatican can veil the fact that millions live in spiritual darkness after a revolt from superstitions still nourished by the church, though not an essential part of the system. The further cleavage of Rome by Protestantism is one of the striking phenomena of the times, hundreds of thousands of Bohemians having left the church within a year. It is time for the cardinals to face reality. Over against the record of failure in many parts of the world are some signal successes in America. In this land preeminently the Catholic church has spoken the word of social idealism. No church in the land has made more liberal pronouncements than have the Catholic bishops. Less of the old European superstitions are found here. The worship of bits of the true cross, of bones of the saints and other practices of like quality are relatively infrequent. It is in America that the church has developed the preaching ability of its priesthood, and its order of Paulist fathers has put on the platform men who are often the equal of the best Protestant preachers. Should the old tradition of an Italian pope be broken and an American cardinal, for example, be elected to the place of supreme power, new blood would be brought into the policies of the vatican. It is curious to note that it is not social reform, nor the theological reconstruction, nor Christian union, nor even missionary expansion which is regarded as the supreme question in the selection of a pope. The question is the old row between the vatican and the quirinal. The Catholic church under modern leadership might go far to regain her ancient prestige. But the fact that she is the Roman Catholic church, and must be ruled from an Italian city, seems to preclude all thought of large-minded leadership for the millions who still claim her as their spiritual mother.

"Who on Earth is Jane Addams?"

WHEN Mrs. Margot Asquith, wife of the former British prime minister, landed to begin her lecture tour, a reporter asked her if she intended to confer with prominent American women, naming among them Miss Jane Addams. "Who on earth is Jane Addams?" was the reply. No doubt she would be equally ignorant of Miss Maude Royden. Shades of the Man With the Duster! No wonder he described the Smart Set of England as the Silly Set, denouncing them in general, and Mrs. Asquith in particular, for their snobbish indifference and cynical irresponsibility regarding all forward-looking enterprises in behalf of good morals and good manners. Not in many a day has Miss Addams received a higher compliment than to be unknown to Mrs. Asquith, grandmother of the flapper, whom the London Morning Post described as "Alice in Blunderland." If any one would know how little Mrs. Asquith and her set signify for the moral welfare of England, let him read "The Glass of Fashion," in which the author holds the mirror up to their follies. Meanwhile, one thing we have desired to know, and that is what the London papers would have said if the "Autobiography of Margot Asquith" had been written by an American woman!

The Pulpit and Oligarchies

IT is still the complaint of the men of the pulpit that their liberties are threatened by oligarchies. In a recent issue of the Outlook an Episcopal minister who prefers to write anonymously told the story of a battle with a financial oligarchy. The little group representing the wealth of the church fought him on account of advanced social ideas. In certain quarters sociology is a heresy more damnable than higher criticism or evolution. The minister went over the heads of the oligarchy to the people, and he won. In some churches instead of being an oligarchy of money, there exists an oligarchy of the aged. The old-timers keep the church from progressing. The old-fashioned ways are good enough. The young minister who comes into such a church either frets his heart out, or breaks with his oligarchy and has a fight for his life on his hands. The weapons of the oligarchy are much the same everywhere. It threatens to withdraw its financial support. It whispers damaging rumors often made out of whole cloth. A colossal egotism affects its mind, for it seems to feel that unless it steadies the ark of the Lord the ark will fall. The world has turned against the autocrat. It has gone democratic to such an extent that every hinderer of the popular will must at last yield his authority. Every minister must in the end be tested by results. If he does not bring forth a spiritual harvest, he must go, be he liberal or conservative. But his profession as a minister, a teacher of truth, invests him with a right to his chance to try out his convictions. Either his employing organization must assume all the responsibility and furnish all the ideas or else entrust to the minister much of this function. The times call for a higher order of ministry. The church can recruit men to its leadership only as it trusts them and gives them liberty to find new paths for progress and service beyond those in which the fathers walked.

The Religion of New York City

AT a recent meeting of religious workers held in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church, New York, Dr. John H. Finley delivered a striking address descriptive of the religious situation in that metropolis. The tide of materialism and paganism seems about to overwhelm the first city of the republic. Even the Roman church, as the most recent figures reveal, has lost nearly two hundred thousand adherents in the last ten years. It does not mean that they are becoming Protestants; it means that they are becoming pagans. There are more than two million Jews in Greater New York, and yet all the synagogues put together have a seating capacity, when filled, of hardly more than two hundred thousand. Thus the leaders of the Jewish church reach only a fraction of their own people. The Protestant membership of all New York churches is about ten per cent of the population, with about a million people of Protestant antecedents unattached and apparently unreachable. Yet nowhere is the need of spiritual fellowship more appalling than in the crowded loneliness of the great city. Nowhere are bodies more jostled, nowhere are human souls so much alone. In the face of such facts, in the presence of such need, a divided, ineffective Christian church is nothing short of a tragedy, and a petty sectarianism stands rebuked by the awful realities of modern life. No wonder Jesus wept over a city, knowing its cruelty, its black wickedness, its nameless possibilities, and its aching pathos!

"A Rediscovered Christianity"

MR. GLENN FRANK, editor of the Century Magazine, speaking at the national conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in Detroit a few weeks ago referred to the common fear that modern Christian scholarship in "digging around the roots of primitive Christianity" would give us a "reduced Christianity." "It has now dawned upon us," he said, "that the scholars and social pioneers who have been digging around the roots of primitive Christianity the past twenty-five years have given us not a reduced Christianity but a rediscovered Christianity, not the Christianity that has to do solely with the cultivation of private virtues in the individual but the Christianity that has to do with the establishment of a moral order in politics as well; a rediscovered Christianity that demands a clean soul and a clean society; a rediscovered Christianity that allows no conflict of interest between the evangelist of private interest and the missionary of social interest; a rediscovered Christianity that looks on moral order not as a postscript added because of exigencies of the industrial age but as an integral part of primitive Christianity which is related to society as well as to the individual. If we are to achieve a new order, instead of slumping into a new disorder, it is imperative that in the future the average citizen maintain a tolerant attitude toward opinion, a democratic attitude toward wealth and an aristocratic attitude toward work."

Sacramentarianism and Spiritual Bankruptcy

THE Lutheran church of Germany separated from state patronage and support has suffered many things. Even before the war the church had lost large numbers of people formerly Lutheran. One of the interesting reactions to this situation is the growth of a high church party in the Lutheran communion. The movement was inaugurated by Pastor M. H. Hansen who published ninety-five very ambitious theses in imitation of those long ago issued by Martin Luther. In these modern theses he proposes to abolish much that Luther accomplished by bringing back confession, vestments, processions, daily eucharist with elaborate ritual, and the creation of an order of bishops. The apostolic succession is to be gotten from Sweden which has recently tried to improve the standing of its bishops by securing some of the pure tradition from the English church. It is supposed by this high church party that what the common people want is a return to monarchical conceptions in religion and the obscuration of modern religious problems by the establishment of a ritual clearly borrowed from the Roman Catholic church. What this Lutheran pastor does not see is that if the people wanted this kind of thing, they would go where they can find the most refined ritualism, and the most monarchical of ecclesiastical assumption, namely, to the Roman Catholic church. The real chance of the Protestant church in Germany, now that it is freed from state control, is to align itself with the good cause of Christian democracy. The road back to a living faith in God is not through the backward look and a program of formalism, but forward in the way in which Jesus taught his disciples to tread.

College Life and Education

PRESIDENT LOWELL has rather curtly denied the petition of certain Harvard clubs that the football team be permitted to visit the middle west and play some leading team each alternate year. The ground of his opposition is the time consumed by such trips and the rather old-fashioned conviction that colleges have chiefly to do with education. Dr. Albert Parker Fitch, speaking at Yale University recently used some very plain words. In the language of golf he took the student body out for a "cleaning" for their devotion to cheap moving pictures, dancing and card playing, to the neglect of the cranium of a university man. And Dr. Butler, of Columbia, paused in his presidential report the other day to remind his students that a university is not a country club. In a college of the middle west is a young man who is given two thousand dollars a year as his allowance with a quiet admonition from his fond papa that he is not to show a balance at the end of the year. He is amply able to meet the demands of his indulgent and silly parent. He sets the style in smart motors and the latest clothes. As for his studies, his father is less concerned about grades than about making a gentleman of his son. Yet this father was himself a working man once. He succeeded in business, and is determined that he will make his son measure up to the standards reported to be those of blue blooded gentlemen. Meanwhile in the colleges there are still to be found the old-time hard-working students who think that college life has to do with education. These toil late over higher mathematics, and aspire to discover a new compound in the chemical laboratory. Yet it is a commonplace around colleges that men such as these are not likely to get the college honors. However, life has a way of evening things up. Ten years out in the world and the relative worth of men appears. The men whose chief accomplishment in college was toddling, find their accomplishment not very remunerative outside the college walls. The evils of college life arise from too liberal allowances to students, the lack of idealism in the home from which the students come and the poorly organized condition of religious institutions in the community where the college is located.

Our Young Intellectuals: An Appendix

SOME weeks ago we spoke rather pointedly of our Young Intellectuals, and the strange antics they exhibit in the sight of the sun. Our reference was to a symposium on "Civilization in the United States" in which religion was overlooked. The editor of the volume, Mr. Harold Stearns, tells us that this omission was not due to an oversight, but to two valid reasons. First, there is no religion in America worth writing about. Second, he was unable to induce anyone to write about it. He adds, most graciously, that those who are interested in the subject, if such there be, may find it dealt with in the chapter on "Nerves"—though why that chapter should be plural is hard to know. What he himself thinks about the matter is told us in a new volume entitled "America and the Young Intellectual," in which we learn that America is so stupid, so crass, so provincial—"so crude, don't you know"—as to be well nigh uninhabitable by a Young Intellectual. Many things try his patience, such as "prohibition, an exaggerated reverence for women, home and foreign missions, Protestant clericalism"—why "Protestant"; do our Roman brethren belong to the Mutual Admiration Society of Young Intellectuals?—all of which are "the fine flower of timidity, fear and ignorance." He is half minded to shake the dust of America off his feet and get out, disgusted alike by its "belligerent individualism" and its hopeless hypocrisy. Meanwhile, Prof. Stuart Sherman quietly remarks that the trouble with our Young Intellectuals is that they do not use their brains!

Sad beyond words is the lament of our men of letters over a land so dry, denying the fact in one stanza and bemoaning it in the next. Slowly it swells to the proportions of a dirge, in which our Young Intellectuals answer one another antiphonally, in a chorus of anger and despair. The tragedy of it all moves them to write poems, plays, essays, novels, casting bread upon the waters of this dry land, in the hope that the scriptural assurance may some day, somehow, be justified, if not here then in some fair Utopia where there will be rivers of beer.

The latest lament is "Dry America," by Michael Monahan, written in a style of such distinguished grace and ease that the theme loses its dryness, and becomes intoxicating. His scholarship is delightful, his satire delicious. It is impossible, he says, for a free man any longer to read Horace "in the dry light which prohibitionists have made to shine in our midst." Indeed, most of the classics, including the Bible, cannot be read these days without expurgations so mutilating as to be tragic. Shakespeare and Dickens must be re-edited for the scholastic "dry youth" of this land of the brave. Which is more depressing, the chapter on "These Benighted States," or the final terrifying glimpse entitled "Looking Forward," is a matter for critics to decide. Either is enough to turn an impenitent optimist into a blue-black pessimist, thinking of our present plight and the dismal fate of "the coming race of slaves and ninnies."

For, as the distilled essence of a research magnificent, we are shown the bitter fact that only liberal consumers of wine, beer and ale have ever loved liberty, or helped the race forward by so much as an inch. So saith history, pointing with a finger of pride to "the ale-fed British yeomanry who won the Magna Charta," alongside "the beer-drinking Teutons," who, whatever else they may have been, showed in our recent experience that they are not physically decadent, when they met "the gallant warriors of France, their veins filled with the blood of the vine." Nor must we forget—never while grass grows and water runs—"the wine-inspired battalions whose splendid courage and patriotism raised a united Italy on the shield of nations." Against this splendid array of valor and patriotism, he concludes, of all that glorifies history and exalts humanity, the fanatical wine hater can only adduce the example of "the unspeakable Turk"—and now, alas, an unspeakable America!

It is all very sad. Everybody says so, except Mr. Mencken, who raids the trenches of the bourgeoisie exploding grenades and stink bombs, to an accompaniment of uproarious laughter, just as if this were not a dry land at all. Next day he repeats the performance in Baltimore, hilarious and unshamed. A cross between Brann, Nietzsche and Cotton Mather, he will not take it lying down, but wields a club, denouncing the whole dry abomination, as well as all the world and the rest of mankind. Americans, he tells us, are a "race of goose-steppers" led by "jitney messiahs," and are now bogged in "absurdities so immense that only the democratic anæsthesia to absurdity" can save us—because, forsooth, we made way with the saloon as a political nuisance and a moral pest-house! After this manner our artists and young intellectual leaders help us in the eternal battle for decency!

Howbeit, as to one thing both Mencken and Monahan agree, and it explains one thing which has puzzled us much. Prohibition, they say, kills the imagination. Hence the death of romance and the advent of the new realism. Whatever the cause, we read the poems, plays and novels written by our Young Intellectuals with the feeling that they seek ugliness as the older artists sought loveliness. If it is a choice between a rose and a toad, they choose the toad. Our "advanced" novelists of this school are strangely fascinated by the garbage cans and back alleys of modern life. What we regret is not their realism, nor yet their radicalism, but their unspeakable vulgarity. If this is due to prohibition, it is a heavy indictment; but it looks to us like the result of home-brew or wood alcohol!

The Gospel According to the Board of Managers

TAKING advantage of the financial depression which has created an acute situation in the missionary and philanthropic work of all denominations, certain elements in the Disciples communion represented by the Christian Standard of Cincinnati have been renewing with unwonted vigor a twenty year war upon the denomination's home and foreign missionary organization. A congress was held at Louisville in early December under the indirect auspices of the newspaper organ, to protest against the centralization of power in the hands of the United Christian Missionary Society, the single comprehensive agency in which some two years ago all missionary and philanthropic organizations were merged; and against the practice of Christian unity in local churches, particularly upon the foreign mission field. The discussion was very bitter. Personalities were, as usual in such Disciples discussions, the chief subject-matter of the speech making. The platform was closed to all save those in sympathy with the purposes of the gathering, although Dr. F. W. Burnham, president of the United Society, and Rev. Frank Garrett, missionary to China, were allowed to speak and subjected to long and searching questionings.

The officials of the United Society became greatly disturbed by the attack, in view of a budget based upon an expected income of over $3,000,000 a year from the churches. The timing of the attack so as to make it synchronize with the falling receipts resulting from general financial conditions, was a shrewd strategem. Fear and anxiety seized the minds of the officials. A special meeting of the board of managers was called and, as reported elsewhere in this issue, officially adopted for the first time in Disciples history a private, creedal interpretation of scripture, and announced that all its work would be carried on in accord with this creed. All officers of the society are said to subscribe to it; all missionaries are said to be in accord with it, and if any are not the board declares that such will be summarily recalled.

It seems incredible that in this year of our Lord, 1922, only four years after the great war, with a broken world in need of reconstruction, a large and intelligent Christian communion could be wrenched and torn over a question as thin and remote as this: whether Christian persons who have been baptized by some other mode than immersion in water should be received into membership in churches on the mission field. Yet that is the question whose discussion eventuated in the adoption of a creed by the officials of a Christian communion whose historic contention has been that creeds are schismatic in character and effect, and an impertinent invasion of the sphere where the word of God should be allowed to speak in its own terms.

The creed adopted is water tight. It leaves no room for any missionary to hold a contrary private opinion and yet go on practically with his work in the spirit of accommodation to the views of others which he does not share but for which he need not be held responsible. The creedal resolution is introduced by these most interesting words: "In harmony with the teaching of the New Testament as understood by this board of managers, the United Society is conducting its work everywhere on the principle of receiving into the membership of the churches at home or abroad only those who are immersed, penitent believers in Christ." It continues: "Furthermore it is believed by this board that all the ministers and missionaries appointed and supported by this board are in sincere accord with this policy, and certainly it will not appoint and indeed it will not continue in its service any one known by it to be not in such accord."

This is something new in modern ecclesiastical history, of which the Disciples neighbors will be interested to take account. Those "creed-bound denominations" like the Presbyterians and Methodists will be asking: What has become of that plea, "No creed but Christ," upon which Disciple preachers have harped for a hundred years? That plea has proved its inadequacy, it would seem, in holding even a small group of a million or more Christians together: how shall we expect it to be an adequate creed for all Christendom? Probably this will be the uppermost thought in the minds of the neighbors. Some there will be who will say: Well, if we must have a creed it is better to have one made deliberately, representatively, and adopted by the churches decently and in order, than to have "the teaching of the New Testament as understood by this board of managers" formulated in a few hours of heated and hurried discussion and imposed upon the churches and the missionaries without their consent.

Still other neighbors will ask: Where does the New Testament teach that only immersed Christians should be received into the churches? please give chapter and verse. And if the answer be made that in the New Testament all church members were immersed, and if this answer be allowed for argument's sake to pass, some of the simpler minded of the neighbors will surely observe that, of course, only immersed people came to the apostolic communion table also. Does it not therefore follow, they will ask, that you Disciples ought to practice close communion as well as close membership. If you must be sectarian in one case, why must you not be sectarian in the other? And if you may be catholic and fraternal and Christian in one case, why not also in the other? The Lord's supper is more intimate and, one would think, might logically be regarded as more "exclusive" than the church roll. The communion table stands inside the church door, not outside. The supposition is that one must, or, at least, ought to pass through the door before he is admitted to the Table!

Others will have still other thoughts. The old charge, so bitterly resented by the Disciples of earlier generations, that the Disciples really believe in water regeneration is bound to be revived, and it will not be so easy after this action to smother it. Indeed, as Dr. I. J. Spencer, a distinguished and cautious Disciple pastor, pointed out in writing of the Louisville congress, the position taken there by many speakers and not only not challenged but ardently applauded, was equivalent to the doctrine of water regeneration. The water regenerationists have won an amazing victory. They have written a creed which every man, woman and child of the Disciples fellowship must acknowledge in the degree in which each one participates in the missionary and philanthropic work of the denomination. The acknowledgment is most explicit and intimate in the case of the officials of the missionary society. It is hardly less explicit in the case of the missionaries and ministers in the employ of the society. But no church or church member can give money to the support of the society's work without by implication sharing in the newly adopted creed.

These are some of the thoughts which the neighbors will no doubt have. But one cannot help wondering what thoughts the missionaries themselves will have. Missionaries as a class are a pretty fraternal-minded folk. No matter how dogmatically sectarian a missionary may be when he is first appointed, he comes home with a richness and breadth of mind which makes the controversies between the sects seem petty and mischievous. Disciples missionaries, not in China alone but on all mission fields, are men and women of Christian breadth and catholicity. They know the harshness of a policy that projects our western sectarianism into the young church in pagan lands. They have in many cases been practicing Christianity unity—"open membership" it has been called, in proper analogy to "open communion." This procedure has been carried on in China through the most elemental Christian necessities of missionary cooperation and reciprocity. It is hard to see how without overtly sinning against Christ these missionaries could have done otherwise. And it is doubly hard, in the presence of the movement toward unity everywhere on the mission field, and confronting the universal demand for an autonomous indigenous church, to see how they can go back to the schismatic procedure of shutting the door upon a Christian man or woman who happens to have been baptized by some other mode than immersion.

What will these missionaries do? The convictions of the personnel of the China mission are well known. They made overtures some two years ago to their home base asking sanction for a more formal step in the practice of Christian brotherhood than they had yet taken. That they can hardly subscribe to the "teaching of the New Testament as understood by the board of managers"—shades of Westminster!—making it incumbent upon them to practice the narrowest kind of sectarianism in the name of Christian unity, is clear to those who know them personally or have followed the development of their work or have kept informed of their overtures for further liberty in the practice of Christian fellowship.

The truth is the board of managers has put its missionaries in a harsh predicament. If the peculiar type of conscience that is begotten in missionary society officials by the exigencies of administering missionary organizations, is able to negotiate a creedal bunker like this without moral strain, it does not follow that the conscience of the missionaries is so easily adjustable. The creedal resolution declares that the board of managers will not continue in its employ any missionary known not to be "in sincere accord" with its sectarian procedure. It will be pretty hard for the China missionaries to declare their sincere accord. If only "the teaching of the New Testament as understood by the board of managers" did not have to be "sincerely" accepted! If only the missionaries had been left with a little margin in which to stretch their conscience when they declared their "accord." They could have said in their sleeve: Yes, we are in accord with the policy based upon "the teaching of the New Testament as understood by the board of managers," in the sense that we are the servants of the board and must follow their instructions in our work. But they must be in "sincere" accord. The realm of private judgment is deeply invaded by the creed-making board of managers, and no missionary who does not sincerely believe that the board of managers' understanding of the New Testament teaching is sound and true and authoritative can comfortably draw his meager stipend from the treasury which that board administers.

The simple fact is that the board of managers of the United Society at its last meeting sold out the most precious possession of the Disciples of Christ—the Christian liberty of ministers, missionaries and humblest members. The board of managers surrendered to the most intolerant and reactionary newspaper organ in the American church. The water regenerationists now hold the citadel of that historic enterprise for Christian unity—save the mark!—which was launched under the inspiring purpose of Thomas and Alexander Campbell to "build a church whose doors should be as wide and high as the gates of heaven."

This would be the conclusion of the whole matter if the success were not so complete. For our part, we think the thing has been so well done that it cannot possibly stay done. The board of managers cannot deliver the conscience of the whole body of Disciples of Christ to the Christian Standard. The transaction was too smooth to be real. There is juggling somewhere. Somebody like Dr. Chilton, who resigned from the board when it wrote its "understanding" of the New Testament into a creed to be bound upon consecrated missionaries whose shoe latches but few of them are worthy to unloose, or Dr. Peter Ainslie who spoke like an Old Testament prophet—or was it more like the apostle Paul?—at Kansas City recently, or Rev. John R. Ewers, whose East End church in Pittsburgh, almost simultaneously with the formulating of the creed according to the board of managers, voted with only three opposing voices to practice Christian unity in their congregation—some tall soul with the blood of the fathers in his veins will emerge carrying a banner in his hand and win back again the liberty which the board of managers of the United Christian Missionary Society has cravenly surrendered.

The Newspaper Lad

A Parable of Safed the Sage

BUT one thing doth separate me and Keturah at the Breakfast Table, and that is the Morning Paper. For I take the Politics Part and she doth take the Gossip Part, and we read, both of us a part of the time. And part of the time we talk. And our Paper cometh unto us every morning except the Sabbath; for on that day I will not enslave myself with it. For it is not unto me a question of the sin of it, but of the freedom of the spirit upon one day from the concerns of the secular.

And the Paper is brought by a Lad who waddeth it up skillfully and throweth it so that it falleth upon the Porch hard by the Front Door. But when it Raineth, or Bloweth, or Snoweth, then doth he hurl it from a Greater Distance. And if he hath good luck, it landeth on the Front Porch out in the Rain. And if his luck is not so good, it goeth into the Shrubbery, or into Any Old Place that doth hap.

And I answered and spake unto the Lad, saying, I once was a Lad, and I did jobs like unto this, and I am strong for the Boys. And it is no joy to me on a Cold or Wet Morning that thou crawlest out of the Hay before Star Light and bravest the Weather to get me my Paper: and if I were the only one to be considered, I could dry the old thing out on the Radiator and make the best of it. But there is another that I must consider, and that is thyself. For if thou goest through life Cutting Corners, and delivering the goods Any Old Way, how shall it be with thy Future as a Man?

And I said unto him, So far as I am concerned, I will not revile thee. But when thou playest Ball, it is not a question whether it is convenient for thee to make the throw, but whether thou canst get the Ball to First Base ahead of the Batter, and not only get it there on time, but get it where the baseman can possess it.

And I said, Thou art going out into a Rather Exacting World, which judgeth men not by their Motive but by their Success. Even if it keep thee a little longer in the Rain or Cold, I advise thee to deliver the Morning Paper on the Front Porch, hard by the Door. And it shall be for thy praise now, and for thy Welfare in the years to come.

And if he shall do this, it will help him to make a man. But Boys are not the only kind of folk who need this Lesson.

Verses by Thomas Curtis Clark

"Here is one more honored than any other man while living, more revered when dying, and destined to be loved to the last syllable of recorded time."—John Philip Newman.

The Miracle

THE wild Kentucky hills were touched of God,
And lo! a child was born; his sires, unknown.
Dreamed not that God would for their tears atone
By raising from their midst a king. The sod
On which they walked was cursed to them,
Begrudging them their bread, for all their toil;
But it was holy ground; for from that soil
Should come a chosen one; the diadem
Upon his brow should be no piece of gold,
But, like his lowly Lord's, a thorny crown.
Upon his cross he died; they took him down,
And lo! they found, before the day was old,
That they had crucified their one true friend:
Despite their hate, he loved them to the end.

At Gentryville

FROM these dark streets flamed forth a brilliant light,
This miry clay produced a mighty tree,
From this rude town emerged the bravest knight
That ever fought for human liberty.
Can it have been he found his splendid dream
Amid these shacks, where giant rats run wild?
Perhaps from heaven a high, prophetic gleam
Ensnared his heart, the while he thought and smiled.
This very spot was where he laughed and talked;
They say he whittled, whiling hours away.
His naked feet these slimy alleys walked,
And in this hut, perhaps, he learned to pray.
This is the tale of tales since time began—
How squalor travailed and brought forth a man!

The Dreamer

HE knew the curse of poverty,
But, lighted by his dream,
He heeded not the clouds of night
That covered him. The gleam
Of high ambition led him on Through cruel years of fate
Until he entered, heaven-led,
The pathway of the great.

He found, amid the sloughs of youth,
A path of blessedness,
And, as he walked the stony road
Of eminent success,
He kept his lofty dream of truth,
Nor left her righteous way
Until the crown of martyrdom
Brought sunset to his day.

O tender ruler of our hearts,
Bequeath to us the grace
That shone from heaven's inmost shrine
Upon thy saintly face.
On selfishness and greed and pride
We rear our mighty State:
Inspire in us again the Dream
That made thy leading great.

The Christian

HIS foes declared him blasphemous, perverse, Ignoring God and heedless of His Word.
They said he lacked in fineness, who preferred
To market jokes, rude stories to rehearse.
He was no white-robed saint: a strong man he
Who loved to wrestle with the devil's brood
That lurked behind the fashions of the good.
He scorned all shams, and for hypocrisy
He held a hatred such as Christ alone,
The scourge of haughty Pharisees, could know.
Those painted masks of Christians felt his blow,
And at his blameless name each cast a stone.
Not by their words, but by their fruits, said He,
Who also knew the sting of calumny.

The Master

WE need him now—his rugged faith that held Fast to the rock of Truth through all the days
Of moil and strife, the sleepless nights; upheld
By very God was he—that God who stays
All hero-souls who will but trust in Him,
And trusting, labor as if God were not.
His eyes beheld the stars, clouds could not dim
Their glory; but his task was not forgot:
To keep his people one; to hold them true
To that fair dream their fathers willed to them—
Freedom for all; to spur them; to renew
Their hopes in bitter days; strife to condemn.
Such was his task, and well his work was done—
Who willed us greater tasks, when set his sun.

The Glory of Lincoln

WHO builds of stone a shrine to bear his name
Shall be forgot when months and years have flown;
Who writes his name upon the scroll of fame,
The centuries shall find to men unknown;
But who for fellow men endured the shame
Shall have eternal glory for his own.

Preaching in the New Age

By Samuel McComb

LET us begin by asking: Wherein lies the power of the pulpit? It can not be in critical or literary information about the Bible, for this can be obtained much more accurately and fully from the writings of scholars; nor can it be in fine thoughts finely expressed, for these we can enjoy in the magazine article and the book of essays; nor yet again in the splendors of oratory because there are many more great speakers outside the pulpit than in it. Where then does it lie? I answer: in the possession of a valid, permanent and indispensable message to the soul of man and in such a presentation of it as will win a vital response and make it the creator of a new character, a new life. The preacher and his message stand related in an unique and signal fashion. In the pulpit the speaker has no meaning apart from his gospel; his significance lies wholly in the extent to which he has been first of all fashioned by his message. As Joubert finely says: "You may do what you like, mankind will believe no one but God; and he only can persuade mankind who believes that God has spoken to him. No one can give faith unless he has faith; the persuaded persuade as the indulgent disarm." Here is the great Either-Or; either we have a message or we have it not. One of the prevailing weaknesses of the pulpit is the uncertainty on the part of the preacher as to whether he has any definite and living word which he can afford to utter with absolute confidence, as to whether there is any solid ground on which he can take his stand and thence defy the onset of doubt or the paralyzing power of a universe that seems all too mechanical. One thing is clear. Never have men longed for faith as they long today. They may call themselves agnostics, sceptics, non-religious, but at heart they yearn for a vision of a spiritual order, for a revelation of truth and goodness, and the men to whom this revealing vision has come will find an audience even in the wilderness.

MODERN SPIRITUAL HUNGER

It is true that the old type of sermon hardly appeals to men today, except to those who need no conversion. It took too much for granted and it had for its background doctrines and principles now called in question. But it is also true that never were thoughtful men more open to a rational presentation of the Christian gospel. They turn away from arid debates about the Person of Christ, but they feel instinctively that he has the secret of a new and joyous life for the individual and for society, but they cannot explicate it in rational terms, they cannot give it commanding power over the intellect and will. How can the modern preacher face the spiritual situation thus created, if he has not grasped the primary and fundamental truths of the Christian religion?

I.

The preaching for the new age must be dominated by great constructive ideas. One of the lost ideals of preaching in sore need of recovery is that which found in the gospel a revelation of truth, of ultimate reality. Today men feel that religion is either everything or nothing. They will sift it to the bottom. No longer can it be based on traditional dogmas armed with ecclesiastical authority but on absolute truthfulness and personal conviction. Interest in minute refinements or nice doctrinal distinctions is dead, and in its place has come a yearning for a grasp of truths that grip life at its roots and go down to the source of things. The gospel is not a philosophy, nevertheless it has a philosophical background and while it is friendly to any idealistic conception of the mind, there are current world-views that are fatal to its existence. The preacher must know what these are and he must be able, on fit occasion, to vindicate his faith as an act in harmony with the highest reason. Further, he must be inspired with a sense of the ethical and intellectual grandeur of Christianity, with its boundless wealth of truth which, touching man at every point, lifts him out of time into eternity, and satisfies the craving of the intellect for unity, largeness and power.

WHAT MAKES GREAT PREACHERS

Read any of the great preachers who have made their mark on their own and succeeding generations—a Baxter, an Edwards, a Channing, a Beecher, a Phillips Brooks, to name but a few—and you will find that beneath their flowers of eloquence, their poetry and mysticism, their glowing fervor of appeal, there is a solid sub-structure of ideas, an order of majestic truths, which gives solidity and massive splendor to the discourse. We are suffering from a reaction against the dogmatism of the past. Unable to proclaim the doctrines in which our fathers rejoiced, we are tempted to abandon the effort to understand our religion, and to take refuge in pious sentimentalities or in practical, external activities which dispense with the necessity of rational reflection. Now this procedure spells a sterile church and a decadent religion. Great practical results can be the fruit only of a principle grasped by the intelligence. Consistent and effective action is born of deep convictions. Unhappily, most of our religious thought has been hardened into dogmas and therefore the mass of men can find in it no motive to action. The preacher must recast a dogmatic formula in terms of contemporary life and make it available for use. But if the dogma is shown to be false by the Christian consciousness of our time, it must be reported and replaced by expressions more acceptable and rational. For the day of trial is here; the searching fires of a world-calamity are burning up the hay, wood and stubble, and men's hearts are failing them for fear of what may befall the temple of faith itself.

The cry of the hour is for men who will re-study and re-vitalize the ruling ideas of the gospel of Christ, who will steep them in the living realities of experience and make them once more the possession of heart and conscience. The age for mere impressionism is past. The average layman will tell you quite frankly that he does not understand the Bible and we all know that within as well as without the church there is an appalling ignorance of the fundamental ideas of Christianity—with the result that ancient heresies re-clothed in modern dress or neglected aspects of Christian truth now emphasized and set forth in terms that seem to make them a fresh revelation, allure and captivate minds that have never been subjected to the discipline of vigorous and solid pulpit teaching. We need, in order that the pulpit may experience a rebirth of its ancient power, a race of preachers who shall be, first and foremost, thinkers. "Beware," says Emerson, "when the great God lets loose a thinker in this planet. Then all things are at risk. It is as when a conflagration has broken out in a great city and no man knows what is safe or where it will end." Now the great ideas that lie at the heart of the Christian religion, have a "feeling-tone," are on the way to action. God, what he really is and the sources of our knowledge of him; human freedom and responsibility in a universe governed by iron and inviolable laws; sin, its relation to God, to self and to the world; redemption from evil and the method by which it is achieved; Christ, who he was, and what he did, and the nature of his message to man's soul; the new life in God, how it originates and how it is sustained; death and its meaning; the world to come, its reality, nature and significance for the life that now is—such are some of the great truths which the modern man longs to hear about, not indeed as dogmas imposed on the mind of the preacher from without and mechanically transferred to the mind of the hearer, but as ever-fresh discoveries of the preacher himself, all aglow with the fires of a noble emotion, instinct with the magic of life, strong to transform character, and to irradiate with solemn light the mysteries of existence.

II.

The preaching for the new age must be rich in suggestion. One of the most frequent charges leveled at the pulpit is its lack of practical effectiveness in bringing religious ideas to bear upon life. Of exhortation we have enough and more than enough, but we are very scant of practical suggestions for the achievement of the goodness we are exhorted to practice. It is being more and more recognized that law obtains in the spiritual no less than in the material realm. Hence the modern man is anxious to know what these spiritual laws are and how they may be utilized for the enrichment and expansion of life. As the hearer feels thrilled by a noble presentation of some aspect of the Christian character, his unspoken wish is—"If only I knew how to put on this virtue, if only it did not seem like a picture painted in the clouds!" Or he catches a vision of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, not in vague outlines but in hard, definite, particular detail, and as he contemplates its hideous character and the dread penalties that await it, his conscience awakens, and he resolves to be a better man, and then he yearns for some word to make plain how he can be set free from the hidden shame that is ruining his happiness and penalizing his higher powers. And if no word be spoken, he is thrown back in his old abortive efforts, the victim of ancient inhibitions, and he settles down into the despairful conviction that, as poor Robert Burns said, the gospel is news too good to be true.

THE NEEDS OF MEN

Many persons haunt our churches not to seek intellectual illumination, nor yet to have their doubts dissipated but for practical help in the management of their own characters. They hear the preacher discourse on the wonders of prayer, its blessedness, its power to raise the soul to the heights of the religious life, and all the time the heart is crying silently—Would to God that my faith were in proportion to my belief, that I knew how to lay hold of the divine energy, and lose my poor, perplexed, harassed self

"in that mystery,

Where God-in-man is one with man-in-God."

Or the need may be of a different kind. The man of business will freely admit the nobility of a life of practical enterprise based on the Christian ideal but what he wants to know is how amid the concrete difficulties of buying and selling, the harsh realities of a system based on ruthless competition, the Christian principle may be applied and shown to be not only ideal but solidly real. Something of this may be learned from books, but not much. It is through self-knowledge, through fellowship with men, through plunging into the stream of life's experiences that we may win the spiritual tact, the moral insight that is the key to the solution of the problems and perplexities of religion when applied to the realities of existence. The pulpit that is to win influence and serve the world's necessities today, must be rich in suggestiveness, in scientific aim, in hints that make for spiritual attainment.

III.

The preaching for the new age must recover the note of triumphant gladness. The reader of the New Testament and of early Christian literature knows that the ground-tone of the new life which Christ created was joy. Jesus went about, as we know, turning sadness and sorrow into peace and joy unspeakable and full of glory. With profound insight the unknown mystic who composed the fourth gospel puts at the forefront of his writing the symbolic story of the wedding feast at Cana, where, transmuting the common things of sense, the Master showed forth his glory as the bringer of joy to the world. And another mystic could write from his Roman prison—"Rejoice in the Lord evermore." This gift of joy, the legacy of Christ to his followers, suffuses with its radiance the Christian life of the primitive church, as von Dobschutz has abundantly shown. The "children of joy," as the primitive believers were called, had such spiritual certainty and confidence, that they created a new world in the midst of an old and dying world, inhabited by a new and "third race" of men who had the promise of all the future. In that strange and to us fantastic production of the second century, "The Shepherd of Hermas," the author who was by temperament what we should now call a melancholy neurasthenic, received a revelation in the strength of which his moroseness and depression were conquered by a spirit of abounding faith and gladness. The Angel of Repentance appears to Hermas and says to him: "Put away sorrow from thyself for she is the sister of double-mindedness and of angry temper." "How sir," says I, "is she the sister of these? For angry temper seems to me to be one thing, double-mindedness another, sorrow another." "Thou art a foolish fellow," saith he, "and perceiveth not that sorrow is more evil than all the spirits, and is most fatal to the servants of God and beyond all the spirits destroys a man and crushes out the Holy Spirit. * * * Therefore clothe thyself in cheerfulness, which hath favor with God always, and is acceptable to him and rejoice in it." Here we discern the deepest note of the Christian religion, which has sounded again and again through the centuries, especially in the great mystics, despite the melancholy and austere voices of a Latinized theology with its emphasis on pain and penalty as the sovereign medicines of the soul. Incalculable mischief has been done to religion by Carlyle's notion which has infected the thoughts of so many preachers that the glory of Christianity is its "worship of sorrow." Much nearer the truth is the remark of Matthew Arnold that "it is the gladness of Christianity which has made its fortune and not its sorrow."

ROME'S IDEAL OF SAINT

The wise old Roman church has laid it down that only a life penetrated by spontaneity and joy can be recognized as of supreme religious perfection. She refuses to canonize any saint in whose life and influence there has not been the note of expansive joy, even though faith had been present strong enough to work miracles. We greatly need the preaching that will present religion as a generous and satisfying life, the one adequate outlet for the energies that in most of us are only half-used, the preaching that will thrill us into forgetfulness of evil, into the consciousness of that peaceful joy, of enthusiastic gladness under the influence of which we shall achieve undreamed of victories. And this will be our experience when we return to those sources of inspiration from which the early disciples and those of a like spirit in later times drew their strength and peace. Their master-conviction was the reality and nearness of the spiritual world. To them the every-day, commonplace realm of birth and death, eating and drinking, health and sickness, work and rest, were surrounded by the spiritual world as by an atmosphere. Nay, rather, the real world was the invisible in which they truly lived, whereas the present material order is but a phantasmagoria which passes like the shadow of a dream. When the church renounces her materialism, when she boldly puts first the spiritual world and relegates (to the second place) money and machinery, in brief, when she returns to the mystical convictions of her founder and Lord, we may expect such an enhancement of vitality, such an influx of power and peace that she shall transcend all the barriers of stale custom and convention, and re-assume the spiritual leadership of humanity.

IV.

The preaching for the new age must be democratic in its sympathies and outlook. For good or ill democracy is here and its universal triumph is only a matter of a little time. People wonder at the enthusiasm, the exalted mood which democracy or the ideal of popular government creates. But they would cease to wonder if they reflected that we are here dealing not merely with a political stratagem but with a deep and vital passion for equality of opportunity, for freedom to develop one's spiritual gifts, released from the tyrannies of caste and privilege. The higher democracy believes in a new type of aristocracy, a nobler guild of merit, character and worth. As James Russell Lowell puts it—"Democracy must show capacity for producing not a higher type of average man but the highest possible types of manhood under every variety of condition, or it is a failure." How stands the Christian gospel related to the democratic ideal? The relation is one of direct spiritual kindship. To the eye of Christ the humblest creature that wears a human face is the potential child of Deity and heir of immortal life. He is inspired by the breath of the Infinite and his fate stirs the interest of the moral universe. Is it seemly that such a being should breathe the corrupted air of the tenement slums, and suffer exploitation at the hands of the cunning and the strong from the cradle to the grave?

THE SOCIAL CHALLENGE

The Christian ideal and the social order are in frightful antagonism to each other. Young and enthusiastic minds are awakening to this alarming fact, and they "are moving about in worlds not realized." Can the pulpit be silent or take refuge in fussy ecclesiastical questions which no longer interest any living mind? The Christian gospel does not regard human beings as though they were disembodied spirits. It has no sympathy with the cant of some Christians who pretend to believe that "material things do not matter." We know that they do matter. We know that there are types of poverty which cut at the roots of all spirituality and make a worthy or religious life well-nigh impossible. That was why the poor made such an appeal to the heart of Christ. His supreme credential which he offered the doubting Baptist was not his miracles but this—"the poor have the gospel preached to them." And we must embody in our message the truth that the physical basis of the spiritual life is sacred, that all men are entitled to the opportunity to earn their bread, that the end and aim of religion is nothing less than a redeemed soul in a redeemed body and dwelling in a redeemed environment.

The moral solution of the social problem challenges the preacher of today who too often blinks the fact that if he evades the issue the Christian religion is likely to become a thing of personal and private pieties, without influence, without power to lift the collective life to higher levels of spiritual vitality. Yet the church must not attempt to give answers to economic questions which it is incompetent to give. It must not rashly propound economic suggestions which it is not qualified to offer. The church speaks to rich and poor, socialists and individualists alike and she cannot commit herself to any specific doctrine which claims to be the final solution of the sociological problem. But she is committed to the position that the social order must rest on justice or it is doomed. She is committed to those permanently valid principles which her Lord has laid down and which, freed from their temporal and evanescent forms, must constitute the foundations on which is to be built the new and lovelier world for which we yearn. The church must tell the wage-earner that without the passion of a religious faith constraining him to the highest loyalty and service, all material advancement is as dust and ashes. She must tell the rich man that for his soul's sake his millions may have been won at too high a price. There was a time when we had to preach that the soul of the poor man was as precious in the sight of God as the soul of the rich; it looks as if we must now insist that the soul of the rich is as dear to God, the common Father, as that of the poor. It requires courage to preach this latter truth. For it means that we must warn the rich man of the evils that beset him, the danger of the service of mammon which uses up all his energies so that he has no time, and eventually no desire to think about his real self, the danger that in some hour of crisis when the sacrifice of all his wealth is demanded from him, he cannot make the venture of faith; his slavery has killed his soul.

ACCOUNTABILITY FOR WEALTH

And on the positive side, we must proclaim with a new accent of conviction, the doctrine of Christ that wealth is a sacred stewardship for which the steward must give account to his conscience and to God. Christ's message transcends the limitations we would impose upon it. He sees life steadily and as a whole, and though his method may be slow it is drastic and radical; for it involves an inner renewal and liberalism of the human spirit. And perhaps the best contribution the preacher could make to an age governed more and more by democratic ideas would be to lay aside all scholastic and ecclesiastical infallibility and make room every Sunday for a meeting with his hearers in order to discuss with them openly and frankly the ideas which from the pulpit he has been commending to their acceptance. Henceforth preaching by itself will not suffice. It must be supplemented by free discussion.

V.

The preaching of the new age must recover the lost ideal of artistic perfection in matter and form. I hold that preaching is a fine art analogous to sculpture, to poetry, to music, and that it is the most exacting of them is abundantly proved by the singular scarceness of those who excel in it. One of the reasons for this paucity of adepts may well be the widespread opinion among preachers that the sermon is a purely utilitarian product with which beauty has nothing whatever to do. And this notion in turn springs, it would seem, from a confusion of thought. It is true that pure art serves no end beyond that of æsthetic satisfaction in the contemplation of beauty, and in this sense art is foreign to the work of constructing sermons. But it is also true that a work serving first and foremost a practical end may yet be so constructed, so æsthetically satisfying that it is at once a useful object and a thing of beauty, a joy forever. The primary purpose of a church is to be a meeting-place for an assembly of worshippers. Shall we forbid the artist to carve his loveliest designs upon the walls or to depict the face of saint and seer upon the windows? But there is a deeper reason why, if the pulpit is to regain its waning power, it must aim to greater beauty of form.

Preaching, to be sure, is much more than an art. It does not exist for its own sake alone but for the sake of persuading the mind, touching the emotions with the ultimate end of affecting the will. Still the instrument by which these things are done is language, and language has a vital relation to thought, and thought that is beautiful has a tendency to clothe itself in beautiful words. Well has it been said that he whom men called the Word of God came among us full not only of the truth that illumines but of the grace that charms. Hence I agree with the remark of Mahaffy that if by the subtlest logic, by the most deliberate emotion a man can force his own deepest convictions upon his hearers, then such artistic rhetoric is not only defensible but strongly to be encouraged. In a letter from a private correspondent, a thoughtful layman, a significant criticism touches this point. "The preacher," he writes, "should confine himself closely to his subject. Let him prepare his sermon as a lawyer writes his brief, everything he sets down tending to throw light on the matter in hand. He should avoid being wordy, discursive, and uselessly repetitious. In a game of chess every move should count. If a player moves simply for the sake of making a move, he is apt to be in a bad way and the game is about up with him. So a preacher should not say anything simply for the sake of saying something." My correspondent, all unwittingly, was laying down an important canon of sound oratory. To avoid mannerisms, tediousness, slipshod and negligent speech, sounding but empty phrases, lame and impotent conclusions, is a work to be achieved only by a devoted and painstaking artist. Other things being equal, that sermon will best achieve its purpose and evoke a deep response from him who hears it, which is organic, proportioned in structure, impressive by its form and diction, noble and dignified in its ornate harmony.

Testing American Sincerity

By Lucia Ames Mead

AFTER the close of the Washington Conference, the real test of the American people as to their faith in substituting law for war will come in the appropriations for army and navy. The militarists are aroused and are determined paradoxically, after we have scrapped battleships and decreased our army, to increase our officers for both.

Senator Weeks is considering the doubling of the capacity of West Point and states that "the present commissioned strength will be insufficient to fulfill the functions required by our national defense policy when that policy attains its realization through the acceptance of military training by the American people." Last year $900,000 was appropriated for the summer civilian camps. This year $2,700,000 is asked for. The navy men maintain that a smaller navy will require a much more efficient one and this requires a larger number of officers. We have at present no naval reserves, but a new bill for their reorganization is being drawn up and appropriations for their maintenance will be urged.

Among the plans proposed to increase the spirit of militarism are "fuller provision of prizes for military and athletic excellence, more military ceremonies, parades, reviews and escorts to the colors," and "detail of experienced newspaper men at each camp." The Army and Navy Journal says that "in view of the pacifist and anti-military forces that are at work in the United States, it is of the greatest importance that the people should be made to realize the absolute importance of an adequate army."

WHY MORE OFFICERS?

What is the situation? It is that if we add the 1500 more officers to the army that are proposed, it will be their special task "to exert their trained efforts to the utmost extent in arousing the interest of the local communities in the national defense problem." The surplus of officers will be sent out to work with the national guard, the reserve officers training corps, and in colleges and schools. Our army has been reduced to 150,000 and this number will not be increased, but, if now, in this time of economic retrenchment while there is a lull in militarism, the corps of officers can be largely increased, the militarists hope that in a year or so we can begin to talk again about compulsory military training and create a great reserve.

How far have the American people been converted to the principle laid down in the famous Hensley resolution of 1916 in which congress declared it to be "the policy of the United States to adjust and settle its international disputes through mediation or arbitration?"

How far do they believe the resolutions adopted by the general court of Massachusetts in February, 1915?—

"The United States of America affirms the political unity of all mankind.

"It affirms the supremacy of world sovereignty over national sovereignty.

"It promises loyal obedience to that sovereignty.

"It believes that the time has come for the organization of the world government, with legislative, judicial and executive departments.

"It invites all nations to join with it in the establishment of that government."

How much have we advanced in theory since those resolutions and the Hensley resolution were written? We are told by Senator Borah that when we have scrapped the prescribed ships we shall be only where we were in 1914. After the "war to end war," we went on spending over four times as much in war preparations as we did ten years before. After the world war, the nations from whom the great menace of Germany had been removed went on spending $16,500,000,000 yearly. With the scrapping of the battleships in the Hughes program they will save only $1,500,000,000. Land armaments have not been touched. Our government clung so affectionately to the submarine as a method of defense that Great Britain's noble proposal to abolish it was lost; though France would still have refused, Japan would have yielded and the con-terence might then have shown the world that our skirts, at least, were clean and that we had done our utmost to suppress the assassin of the sea. France could not long have held out alone after the same proposal had been sent to the League of Nations by its commission on the reduction of armaments.

In 1914, we were content to let Great Britain have the largest navy in the world. Today, we insist that ours must equal hers, and only last November we had a program which would have given us double her tonnage by 1924. We now think we must have at least equal tonnage although, unlike Great Britain, we are self-sufficing and not dependent on foreign food; although our coast line is only one-quarter of that of the British empire, and although we are protected by two great oceans, and have to the north the safest borderline in the world because it is unfortified; and although we have not an enemy on this continent who could or would attack us.

Today, an international court of justice has been set up by the fifty-one nations in the League of Nations. Fifty-one nations have taken solemn pledges to wait nine months for investigation or arbitration of their disputes with their fellow members. We, not being in the league have, in cumbersome, roundabout fashion, recognized the necessity of having some cooperation and have thus secured a naval holiday and a four-power pact which would not have been thought of had we been in the league.

The world is watching to see how much this is going to mean and what is our next step. What is done will depend largely on whether the thirteen million letter writers who sent their requests to Washington are going to keep "on the job." Eleven millions asked for reduction of armaments; over 395,000 wanted complete abolition of the submarine and only about 10,000 wanted anything short of abolition.

PERSISTENT EFFORT WILL WIN

These people have certain strong forces in congress who intend to fight the quiet, persistent effort to keep up unnecessary armaments and superfluous officers. Senator King has introduced a resolution (H. J. 152) which calls for the reduction of the army to 75,000. This would save about $200,000 which could be spent in fighting the terrible and certain enemies of ignorance, disease, and crime. This bill also calls for a reduction of the navy from 100,000 to 50,000. Senator Borah will support it. Senator Lodge and Senator Wadsworth and others mentioned in the Army and Navy Journal will not support it. Capt. Dudley W. Knox, U. S. N., urges in this same journal that the navy increase its 100,000 by 38,000 and that there be 2,400 line officers.

After the conference, the temptation will be to feel that a victory has been won and that we may turn to other things. But the victory carries us only a little way. Apathy, and lapse of interest, will be fatal: It is only the faithful ones who "carry on" who can wipe out that awful blot on civilization—the expenditure still of fifteen thousand million dollars annually to keep the peace in a world which is nearly bankrupt and in which millions are dying for lack of bread.

An Amateur Church

By John R. Scotford

WHO shall run the Christian church? Rome places authority in the hands of the clergy; Protestantism puts the ultimate responsibility upon the laity. From this difference spring many consequences.

No one can question the administrative efficiency of the Roman church. Her clergy are trained in churchmanship, and their powers are given full scope. Denied the satisfactions of family life, they have but one aim in life, the prosperity of the church which they serve. In consequence the Roman church sees clearly what it wants—and commonly gets it. Church management with her comes close to being a science.

No one can question the administrative inefficiency of the Protestant churches. The reason is not far to seek. The Protestant churches are run by amateurs. The ultimate responsibility rests back upon laymen. Running a church is not their chief business in life. It is a side issue. There are laymen who truly shoulder the burdens of the church and give to them the same interest and zeal that they give to their own affairs. All honor should be given to such men, although even they lack that careful training in churchmanship which the priest of Rome receives. But the average layman gives to the church only the leavings of his interest and thought. He exercises a careless and superficial judgment on church affairs which would bring certain failure upon his business enterprises.

But what of the Protestant pastor? Is he not the administrative head of the church? Sometimes he is. Certain highly organized denominations tend to develop large administrative talent in their clergy. But the average Protestant pastor has neither the training nor the authority to be an effective church administrator. It is only recently that our seminaries have paid any attention to this phase of ministerial duty. A man progresses in the ministry more by his preaching ability and his personal popularity than he does by his administrative gifts. But whatever his talents in this line, he is likely to be hampered in their exercise by his official board. Too often the Protestant pastor is the servant rather than the leader of his church officials. Let us look at some of the consequences of amateur activity in our church life.

INSTRUCTION BY AMATEURS

The training of the young is our most important task. Until recently this was wholly an amateur activity. Not only were the teachers selected on the basis of willingness rather than ability, but our entire Sunday school structure clear through to the top was without training for the task in hand. Good nature was the first requisite for a Sunday school superintendent. If he were a successful business man, the school felt honored in securing his services. A grateful proof of his fitness was his ability to lead in public prayer! The state Sunday school secretaries were selected for their "pep" and ability to raise money. Most of them were actually afraid to put on their convention programs any one who had had special training for the work of religious education. And at the top, Sunday school affairs were dominated by a group of wealthy and benevolent business men, who would have made an excellent directorate for a bank, but for whom Sunday school work was nothing more than an absorbing hobby.

This situation is happily in process of change. Our pastors are coming into a real relationship to their church schools, but the way is not always easy. Many times does the personality of the superintendent stand in the way of the pastor when the latter seeks to introduce real educational methods. Not a few pastors have cut the gordian knot by assuming the office of superintendent themselves. Our seminaries have been turning out men and women trained to serve as directors of religious education, but our churches have not been ready to receive them. The mortality has been fearful. After a tussle or two with amateur obstinacy in the church board, most of the men in this vocation have found "a larger field of service" in some secretaryship or a college chair. The women, having more meekness, have fared a little better, but their path has not been smooth. The cause of religious education waits to be delivered from the amateur.

Consider finance. Church finances have been supposed to be the layman's specialty. But who can say that this department is being well administered? And who can say that what signs of present improvement there undoubtedly are, are due to lay leadership rather than to denominational agitation inspired by the ministry itself? Who ever heard of a board of trustees spontaneously putting on an every member canvass? But many a board of trustees has put a mortgage on the church property to pay current bills rather than dig into their own and other folks' pockets for money to meet the deficiency. And they have actually called such a procedure good business! After considering the ways of his trustees, many a pastor has wondered in his heart how much business ability the average business man possesses anyway. But lay management of churches grows comical when some man who has made money in tin cans or real estate joins the church and proceeds to tell the pastor and trustees how to run the church! It has never dawned on the minds of some people that though they have managed to run a business it does not follow that they were cut out to run the church! The chances are that the average pastor would make less of a mess running a business than would the ordinary business man trying to run the church. Church finance is quite a study in itself. Some laymen understand it. The time is coming when our churches will employ men for this specific work. In the meantime the average pastor probably brings a better judgment to such problems than does the average board of trustees.

BETWEEN PASTORATES

The time when amateur management of our churches runs amuck is between pastorates. Rare is the church which knows what it wants in the way of a pastor, and rarer is the church which knows how to get it. Whim, caprice, and snap judgment hold high carnival while the process of selection is going on. Realizing the dangers at such a time, our congregational denominations have tried to create certain devices to assist the churches—but a great many churches are not willing to avail themselves of such help. The result of the amateur method of selecting pastors is the foisting upon the churches of many men who are really amateurs in the ministry. They have had no real training for the work to which they are called. Superficial grounds of selection put a premium upon superficial men. And sometimes one wonders if perhaps the amateur spirit in the pews does not feel a little more comfortable with an amateur pastor in the pulpit!

An amateur church leads naturally to an amateur theology. A church accustomed to using snap judgment on all its temporal affairs is not going to put a deal of deep thought on its belief regarding eternal matters. The church which rejects enlightened leadership in educational matters will not listen to sound scholarship in theology and exegesis. The amateur spirit of our churches finds its logical expression in the millennialist movement. Of the two popular prophets of theological reaction in the land today, one studied theology on the baseball diamond, and the other generated it as a by-product of his life-time vocation of political candidate. The movement has practically no scholars. Its antipathy to our institutions of higher learning is perfectly natural. The short course training school is the only way such a movement can produce propagandists. If they studied longer they would learn too much! The emphasis in the fundamentalist movement is upon the amateur. The layman is given a bunch of proof texts and thereby enabled to sit in judgment upon those who have given a life-time of study to the things of God.

How can our Protestant churches be saved from the amateur? How can our churches be led to exercise a sober judgment which will save them from continually muddling through?

LEADERS AND FOLLOWERS

We need to take ourselves seriously. That is where Rome scores on us. She means business. She has a goal, and works toward it. Too often the Protestant churches seem to be off on a lark. We have a pleasant pastor with pleasing sermons, sweet music, comfortable pews, congenial folk, but we get nowhere. Not until the church really means business will the savor of the amateur disappear from her councils and her thought.

We need to get rid of the amateur minister. The reason why the voice of the pastor is not more heeded is that there are so many pastors whose voice is not worth heeding. The ministry is no place for fools or lightweights. The churches should insist on having men with real training for the tasks to which they are called. Once having chosen a leader, a church should let him lead. That does not mean that he should exercise authority after the manner of Rome. But it does mean that he should have a fair chance to put his policies to the test. His voice should have weight. It should be assumed that he knows his business. He should have the same liberty of initiative which a business executive enjoys. Ultimately our city churches must come to a staff ministry. No man can discharge all the duties of a city pastor equally well. But the pastor is likely to be less of an amateur in religious education, church finance, and especially theology, than is the average layman. Upon him the responsibility for these things should rest.

But will the passing of the amateur spirit lessen the interest of the layman in the church? Will he depart from the sanctuary because he is denied the privilege of using his snap judgment on everything from picking a pastor to the mysteries of Revelation? Not at all. The professionally trained minister gets a much finer cooperation from his church than does the amateur pastor who caters to the amateur tendencies of the congregation. A higher standard of church work always discovers higher abilities in the pews. Today, many are outside the church because of this very dilettante spirit which possesses it. A church with a trained leadership held in respect by its constituency, will attract and command the respect and support of many whose talents are now hid in a napkin.

Cleaning Up Mexico

By Scott Nearing

DURING my recent trip into Mexico, I had the opportunity to see both the plateau life and the coast life, which are entirely different. For 800 miles after leaving El Paso, one sees little but sagebrush and mesquite bushes and the journey is made through an area surprisingly desolate.

This part of the country is primarily a grazing area for cattle and horses. There is little industry other than mining. The villages consist of huts built by the natives of adobe bricks. They go into a district where the soil is the right consistency, dig a hole, put in some water, make bricks, and lay them in the sun to dry. The roof of the hut is square, flat, and plastered with mud. Other huts are made of railroad ties. All have apertures, but few windows, and the doors are very crude.

Along the gulf coast, the method of constructing houses is entirely different. The people here build their houses, for the most part, of cornstalks, set upright and laced together with grass on a bamboo frame, with a hole for smoke and a hole for the door. The roof is thatched. These people are not subject to the cold of the plateau and can live in these cornstalk huts, with mud floors and little furniture. So far as the Indians are concerned (and they constitute the bulk of the population), their living conditions are extremely primitive.

POPULAR DRESS

The people wear cotton clothes almost exclusively—wool is too expensive. Only well-to-do people wear coats. The women wear a long calico gown, of a rough, coarse texture, with a shawl thrown over their heads; the men wear cotton shirts and pants, or blankets thrown over their shoulders in a peculiar fashion, which is very effective. All of the men wear sombreros; they are the distinguishing characteristic of the men's clothes. The expensive sombreros cost up to $100, and are made of the finest materials, decorated with leather. The sombreros of the workingmen cost about five or ten Mexican dollars. The men wear sandals, which cost about two and one-half Mexican dollars a pair, but the women and children wear no shoes. In Mexico City there are numbers of women on the streets barefooted. As far as housing and clothing are concerned, the needs of the Mexican people are comparatively few.

There are many wanderers—people who find shelter where they can. The climate makes it easy for them to sleep as they can. For example, there was at one station a group of station venders who assailed the train with things to sell. All Mexicans have something to sell. These venders have everything, primarily food. One woman was baking cakes "while you wait," with the aid of a gasoline can, cut in two and perforated, in which she had her charcoal fire. Men, women and children were there, selling prepared food of many varieties.

At this station, the train broke down and stopped for an hour and a half. When the venders had finished selling the train, they gathered together—41 people and four dogs—and organized a camp. There was one woman with three children. At 11:30 at night these children were wrapped in blankets and were sleeping on the ground. A half-hour later a train from the south pulled in. The woman left the children, took about 50 cents worth of cakes, and went to this train to sell.

FOOD FROM GARBAGE

The stewards of the Pullman and buffet cars never dump their garbage until they reach a town. On one occasion I saw them dump a bucket. One vender found a strip of ham; twelve children rushed up and fought over tin cans, boxes and other things. Last came the dogs, and all began to eat what the humans had left. One man brought his own dog to the feast and drove away the others, staying on guard until it had finished, and thereby increasing the surplus resources of the family by that much. Such facts will serve to indicate the narrow economic margin upon which these people live. A well-to-do Indian family can put its household goods on three or four burros. Their total amount of worldly wealth is small.

I have been told that the Mexicans are extremely lazy. I had no chance to observe whether or not this is true when they are working for others, but the following things I did observe. In Mexico City there is a device much like our four-poster bed—a heavy frame on which they carry their household furniture et cetera. One man goes in front and one behind and they carry this frame at a trot, with from 250 to 400 pounds of weight on it. In Mexico City there is a large white granite building. The whole of the operation of making this building—the carrying of granite blocks, stone, mortar, etc., was done by these men on their heads or in their hands. They carry piles of alfalfa, lumber, two crates of tomatoes—all on their backs or heads. That is the way the Mexican works. He thinks nothing of carrying extremely heavy bundles, weighing 100 to 250 pounds. He who thinks the Mexican is lazy is laboring under a delusion. I never saw people work so hard in all my life. No American would dream of doing it. Imagine a self-respecting American bricklayer carrying all of his materials on his head. And yet Mexican labor is done that way. I saw an Indian woman carrying two bags of charcoal strapped to her back. She had walked barefoot for more than two hours, carrying this bundle into town to sell.

Water is scarce in the plateau, and when the women wash they take a flat corrugated board, go to the stream, kneel down, and rub the clothes on this board. One Saturday I was going past one of the irrigation canals; it was lined with women washing their clothes in this cold water—bending over the boards which were laid on a 30-degree bank—the hardest kind of hard, physical labor.

POVERTY AND HARD LABOR

The people are poor and they work hard. What is the reason? In the first place it is because they use no machinery—no reaping and binding machines—no horse rakes. I saw oxen in the field hitched to a wooden tongue which was nailed on to a stick that served for a plow. This plow digs down about three inches beneath the surface of the earth. In this district the Mexican peasant is told that a steel plow will chill the soil. They have no modern agricultural implements.

But that is not the worst. The stuff they raise is very poor. I saw potatoes marketed less than an inch in diameter; tomatoes, one and one-quarter inches; squash, two inches—miserable little vegetables. The kernels on some of the ears of corn reach over about sixty per cent of the ear. No attention is paid to seed cultivation. The bananas are usually third and fourth grade.

The Mexican is a clever worker; his carving, pottery, basketwork and needlework are superior, but he never learned how to raise crops. He lacks machinery and his standard of product is poor, but there is something worse. Every Mexican has something to sell, and he raises, transports and sells it himself. He raises tomatoes, puts them in a box and walks to market, where he sells them. Every stage of production is carried on in a primitive fashion and by the same person. As you travel along, you meet hundreds of men and women with loads on their backs.

If the vender is well-to-do, he has a stall or cart, but the poor man comes in and spreads a paper down and squats there until someone comes to buy. In the street-market there are thousands and thousands of individual venders. Each has a small stock of goods—often produced or raised by the vender himself. Thus you can see that along with the lack of machinery and the low standard of product there also exists this condition—no division of labor, with the produce raised, transported and sold by one person.

A COLORFUL WORLD

I would like to set up, by way of contrast, another side of Mexican life. From what I have said, thus far, you would naturally think: "I should hate to live down there," but I would misinterpret the situation if I left out this other phase. The life in Mexico is intensely colorful. The country is full of flowers. Working girls on the streets wear flowers. They are everywhere in profusion, variety, and richness of color. On the hills they are yellow; in the valleys they are red, glistening blue, like crystal, or like sunlight on rippling water. Along the coast, mile after mile, are millions of little flowers, whose vines cover everything. The Mexican reflects this colorfulness in his life.

Even the poorest Mexican has a gorgeously colored blanket. The things they use are extremely colorful; their dishes are hand-made and hand-painted. They cook in red or dark brown pots. The Mexican leads a life quite out of keeping with his drab, economic surroundings.

We Americans talk about cleaning up Mexico. The place where we have been most active is Tampico, and in Tampico two things strike you. One is the superb machinery for producing oil, the other is the wretched way the people live. The city is built in the water, the streets are built up, and from the street to each house is a runway. The refuse that they do not dump into the roads they dump into the water; there are thousands of houses on piles over the water. At night the mosquitoes are thick. Here are the people who are producing the prosperity that we and France and England are enjoying. In Tampico I had a picture there of what America is doing for Mexico.

What can we do? First, we may as well pass up the idea of doing anything for them in a charitable sense. People have to do things for themselves. We can help them, not by sending capital, nor exploitation, nor the army and navy, nor the Standard Oil, but by sending experts to teach them. We can show them how to raise good crops, and give them expert advice on fertilization. We can help them with education. I talked with many children on the street who had never been in school. We can teach them how to read and write. They need help in sanitation. We can send them expert help in these three things—agriculture, education and health, and we can show them how things are done by example. They want to know but they want to do it themselves. The Mexicans are sociable, but they are very set in their ways. They are failing not because they are lazy, not because they are not trained, but because they do not have technical knowledge.

Our surplus is enormous. If we cared to, we could send economic, educational and health missionaries and revolutionize the method by which they live. Bankers cannot do it; only workers can do it. That is our one chance to clean up Mexico.

A Working Federation in Ohio

OHIO has a state federation of churches that works. There was recently held at Columbus a convention of some 500 pastors in which not a single denominational note was sounded. A bishop said fervently, "I am a Christian first and a Methodist next." In saying it he said more than the word would mean under ordinary circumstances. He said, in effect, that our common bonds are more vital than those of our denomination. They are not yet as strong, but then they are not as well knit by organization, and they lack the quality which only tradition imparts. It will take time to win working loyalties from old and tried and going institutions to new and experimental groupings. Somehow the new bonds should be woven by gathering up the threads of the old relationships and weaving them into larger and stronger patterns rather than by weakening the old and thus losing what they hold of good. It can be done through practical interdenominational co-operation, providing we want larger brotherhoods and are willing to see our old alignments diminish that the greater new ones may be made. Certainly we have reached the place where sectarianism must decrease that Christianity may increase.

The Ohio federation is the largest, most active and most promising of all state federations. Its success is due to the fact that ten years ago a state-wide survey was made of the rural church situation. Nothing is so convincing to the open minded nor so confusing to those of closed mind as facts. The facts gathered told of over-churching in some communities and an absence of churches in others hard by; they told of places where churches were most plentiful and morals lowest—of communities where revivals were perennial and vote selling universal. They raised the question as to how the old sectarian church divisiveness was working in rural communities and found it wanting, and they spurred good men to do something about it.

What the Federation Is Doing

The state federation of churches is the answer of consecrated common-sense to the situation. Fifteen communions are co-operating in its work. They represent the great majority of the evangelical Christians of the state with President W. O. Thompson of the State University as their President, and Rev. B. F. Lamb as their Secretary. Mr. Lamb was State Supervisor of the Interchurch rural survey and is carrying it through to completion. He now has the field work finished on eighty-eight counties, the tabulations done on seventy, together with maps, etc., and will not only be able shortly to present the greatest single up-to-date rural survey made but to make comparisons with Charles O. Gill's survey of a decade ago and thus to indicate the trend of things in regard to the rural church situation.

The results for fifty-three counties have been published and follow-up conferences have been held in each county. These follow-up conferences are the most significant effort yet made to do something practical about the rural church problem. Forty of the fifty-three counties voted to organize county church federations and six of them have been consummated. The county federation will necessarily work slowly, for it tackles the most difficult of co-operative problems—that which deals with the modification of the local church program. It is not difficult to pass resolutions and make recommendations nor to agree, at the top, in principle, but the real nut has to be cracked when application to the local organization is attempted. Some of these county federations will fail, some will succeed so well that the overhead organizations of various denominations will combat them, and some will succeed well enough, no doubt, to serve as models for all others. If a few successful experiments can be wrought out of even so considerable a number of attempts they may hold the future solution of the whole problem in their keeping.

The federation has also held a summer school at the state university for rural pastors, has the hearty co-operation of nine city federations in the state, has given effective help to moral legislation and busily promotes the comity idea in all sorts of ways.

* * *

The Principles of Comity Adopted

The principles of comity adopted take into account both the local situation and the limitations placed upon cooperation by the vested interests of the overhead organizations. They are therefore not radical but they are progressive; they do not propose organic union for local churches but they do propose a cooperation that will unite local congregations where there is over-churching and provide for unchurched communities. That is as far as any type of denominational cooperation can go until denominations are frankly willing to sacrifice prestige, following and material forces for the sake of Christian union; so far there is not a single one of them willing to do that.

To say that in every community of 1,000 or less not more than one church should exist is to say a thing that disintegrates the fundamental tenet of sectarianism; the disintegration will work upward when this principle is made effective in local communities and the resultant community churches will follow upward with a new bond of fellowship. The practical problem is met by asking that denominational offices be offered to exchange advantages where there are two or more local churches in such communities—each taking a community as the others withdraw—and by mutual agreement not to enter such communities in competition where new churches are being started. Thus denominational advantage is not sacrificed but the local community gets the advantage of a single church broad enough to command the support of those of all the creeds entering into the exchange. If Methodist and Presbyterian churches exchange communities obviously the one remaining in each community must be undenominational enough to beget the support of those who have given up their denominational connections for the sake of the exchange. Where there are two or more churches in a community without a resident pastor for any one of them the denominational leaders are asked to mediate to secure one in some way. Where possible the local members are to effect all arrangements, the overhead leaders acting only in an advisory capacity, all such factors as community traditions, ecclesiastical strength, family heritages, working efficiency, local leadership and social sentiment are to be taken into account in making the exchange. The federated church is advocated only as a last resort, when resorted to it should not break the denominational connections of the various groups and each group should keep its identity, use its own type of ordinance and the government should represent all groups concerned. Preference is given the denominational type by advocating that the federated church should align itself with some one denomination when possible.

The local church should become an effective community church in that its first service is that to its community. A full-time, resident pastor with a parsonage and not less than $1,600 salary is advocated, and an automobile should be added. The building should provide for both Sunday school and social activities as well as worship. Wholesome community recreation should be provided, moral life cultivated and all living buttressed under by a virile spiritual message. Boys and girls should have organizations that utilize their best interests, stereopticon and motion pictures should be used for educational as well as recreational purposes and a house to house survey kept fresh and up to date to make it possible to regularly and systematically care with intelligence for the needs of every person in the community.

The Need of Cooperation

Such cooperative types of church activity as the Ohio Federation are begotten only of a knowledge of the facts. We still occasionally hear bishops and secretaries declare that over-churching is a sensational sort of bugaboo that radical unionists resort to as an argument. They ought to know better but no doubt most of them do not simply because they know some situations but do not know the situation as a whole. The most practical first step toward a larger measure of cooperation is a wide survey. The greatest loss that came of the failure of the Interchurch World Movement was that of the survey; had it been put over the results would have awakened all the churches to the necessity of men and means to meet the needs.

Here are some of the striking needs revealed by the Ohio survey. Only one-fourth of the population are members of local churches and only about three-fourths of these are in any sense active. The difference between these figures and those of the U. S. Census doubtless lies in mere nominal membership. This means that less than one-half the population over twelve years of age are actual church members. The average net gain last year runs at about 4.4 per cent. We may well ask if the churches are holding their own in the rural districts; it would take twenty-three years to recreate a church generation at this rate and it is doubtful if the average church membership runs that long. There are 400 communities without pastors while in communities near to most of them there are from three to seven preachers. Thus there is created what Mr. Lamb calls "a religious no-man's land." The federation pleads that ecclesiastical initiative and energy be used on caring for these communities rather than in developing enterprises for denominational advantage where there are too many churches. A start in the allocation of these communities has been made. Many other interesting facts could be narrated but a single article is too short. A volume giving them will be issued when the survey is completed.

British Table Talk

London, January 16, 1922.

WHETHER the Rev. D. A. Major, principal of Ripon Hall, Oxford, is a heretic or not, others more versed in such matters must decide. But one of his brethren in the church of England has made a charge of false teaching against him. It appears that the editor of "The Modern Churchmen," for it is in this office that Mr. Major is best known, does not believe in the resurrection of flesh. For this cause he has been indicted, but the Bishop of Oxford very wisely has decided to proceed no further with the charge. It would have been a disastrous step to define this doctrine in the way which the champions of orthodoxy demand. How many churchmen would be able to accept the traditional belief? Meanwhile both Canon Barnes and Mr. Major have been saying grave things concerning the lack of appeal made by the modern church to its educated laity. But such laymen are not blameless; they are strangely apathetic. Mr. Major however, is clearly not the man to retreat before an attack. In his assize sermon preached at Oxford on January 15 he spoke strong words in defense of those who in an hour when not the earth only but the heavens are shaken, are seeking to detect the signs of the coming of the Son of Man. This they do with boldness, remembering that he himself bade them "not to be terrified or unintelligent in the face of such a crisis, but to lift up their heads in the hope and expectation of coming triumph." One thing the champions of tradition always accomplish: they provide an excellent platform for the men whom they denounce.

"Slowing Down for the Junction"

Some years ago on meeting Dr. John Brown, whose death is reported today, I inquired how he was. With a happy smile he answered, "Slowing down for the junction." He has passed the junction now. It was one of those homely parables which would have delighted the soul of John Bunyan. For Dr. Brown, no other honor would have seemed more desirable than that his name should be remembered with that of Bunyan. His life of Bunyan is a classic which is never likely to be superseded. To it the minister of "Bunyan Meeting," Bedford, gave his learning, patient research and grave dignified style; and it is safe to say that there was no writer who did so much to make Bunyan a living figure for all time. But Dr. Brown himself had a rich and fruitful ministry of his own in Manchester and chiefly in Bedford. Latterly he lived in retirement in Hamstead and we had the joy of hearing some of his memories out of the past. He was born in 1830 in Lancashire, and was old enough to remember the opening of the railway between Manchester and Liverpool near to which he lived. One of the men to whom he owed grateful memories was Sir John Bowring, who wrote "In the Cross of Christ I Glory." In that England, shortly after the reform bill, when the repeal of the corn laws was advocated by Bright and Cobden, his youth was spent; and all through his ministerial life he remained a strong political force, as became a Lancashire man who remembered those great days. For us who knew him in the evening of his life he was the kindly and gracious old pastor who seemed to link together the former days with the present, and if ever we were tempted to think unfairly of our fathers in God there was always near to us this man with his rich faith, his broad humanity, his unfailing humor, his scholarship and delight in all the noblest literature. "Brown of Bedford" will not be forgotten.

It should be noted that the author of "The Economic Consequences of the Peace," Mr. Keynes, is Dr. Brown's grandson. And a word may be added upon the visit of Bunyan's biographer to America. He delighted to tell how at one place by some enthusiast it was announced that the "author of the Pilgrim's Progress" would preach; and he used to add "there was quite a good congregation."

In General

Influenza is with us, but so far it has not been so severe an epidemic as usual and nothing like the visitation of 1918, the only occasion in my memory when the medical profession as one of them put it "got the wind up." It is, however, bad enough to dislocate business in some towns and in many offices. . . . There has been a valuable conference of representatives from all the missionary societies to see how far they can cooperate in their home propaganda. Much of the ground was surveyed and, to use the favorite language of our leading statesman, "avenues were explored" and plans for "bridging gaps" were considered. It is only just to say that the British societies have learned much from the inter-church movement; its methods have been carefully noted, and in some ways its very bold experiments have left not only inspiration but warning. It is the task of pioneers to say sometimes after much toil, "There is no road that way." . . . Preparations are well forward for the annual meetings in March of the Free Church Council. Its main theme, we are told, will be "Revival," and this will be surveyed from many standpoints. Not the least important of these will be the standpoint of personal evangelism. To this Dr. R. C. Gillie, the president, has been giving much of his thought and energy. . . . The missionary societies are all of them feeling the effects of last year's depression; but they are agreed that money is the easiest thing to get—many will give money who will not give interest and passion and prayers. Yet it would be ungrateful to forget the immense advances made in the last decade. A glance over old reports is a rare tonic.

Von Hugel

Much of our time has been given in the last week to Baron von Hugel's "Essays and Addresses on the Philosophy of Religion." This writer is at once the most rich and stimulating writer of the present age upon the deep things of religion, and alas! one of the most difficult to read. Yet if any reader wants to understand beneath all the whirl and confusion of the moment what are the abiding questions, he must read Baron von Hugel; there is no one like him. He is a layman within the Roman church, to which he is devoted as Lord Acton was devoted; but it is doubtful whether, if either of these great men had been in orders, they would have felt so free to write as they have done. But it is not by his scholarship though it is wonderful in its range, nor by his criticism that a reader is impressed; it is by his masterly narrating of the experiences of the soul with God. Read him upon the "given-ness" of these experiences; upon their reality; upon their abiding power; upon the relation of spirit to sense—of the supernatural and the natural. Indeed read him from beginning to end and then read him again. And sometimes as the reader is making his difficult way through the writer's strange phraseology, he will meet with some beautiful and tender story out of his life. The index is unusual: here is one extract:

"Irish, the:

Barmaid 223, 224:

Washerwoman, 289, 290:"

And if the second reference is turned up, this will be found: "There is an Irish Roman Catholic washerwoman with whom I had the honor of worshipping some thirty years ago in our English midlands." Then follows the story of her great and triumphant faith, and how "God and the utter trust in him and in the wisdom, the love of his will swallowed up all the pain, physical and mental, and all possible conflicts and perplexities.

Dr. Horton on

"Auto-Suggestion"

Impress on your own mind, by frequent meditation and repetition, especially in the moments of sleeping or waking, those truths of Christ, which your faith accepts. For example: "Jesus Christ came to save sinners, of whom I am chief." "He breaks the power of cancelled sin, and sets the prisoner free." "Sin shall not have dominion over you." "Reckon yourself to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God." Or, more specifically: "It cannot be his intention that I should be mastered by this bad habit; therefore it is not too strong for me. I can overcome. It is powerless in presence of his redeeming love." These and similar suggestions you can make to yourself; and the ideas, sinking into your mind below the level of consciousness, will do the work. The psychologist is content to call this strange unknown power that is ever working in us to maintain life, to heal disease, to direct the mind, to control action, the unconscious. It is, no doubt, unconscious to us. But action so intelligent, so marvellous (even miraculous) must be conscious to Some one. And indeed, in following out the results of such suggestions and auto-suggestions in the salvation of the soul and the formation of character, we cannot hesitate to identify the so-called Unconscious with the spirit of God, and to recognize that to this Christ referred when he spoke of abiding in us, and so bringing forth fruit.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Two Campbells

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I am at a loss to understand some statements Mr. R. J. Campbell makes in his book, "The Life of Christ," when compared with his views in regard to the same questions published in his New Theology.

In the latter, reprinted in 1912, he states in reference to the virgin birth of Christ: "The virgin birth of Jesus was apparently unknown to the primitive church, for the earliest New Testament writings make no mention of it. Paul's letters do not allude to it, neither does the gospel of St. Mark. 'In the fulness of time,' says the great apostle, 'God sent forth His son born of woman.'"

"He was of the seed of David according to the flesh," but nowhere does Paul give us so much as a hint of anything supernatural attending the mode of his entry into the world."

"The supposed Old Testament prophecies of the event have nothing whatever to do with it."

"It seems strange that belief in the virgin birth of Jesus should ever have been held to be a cardinal article of the Christian faith, but it is so even today. There is not much need to combat it, for most reputable theologians have now given it up, but it is still a stumblingblock to many minds."

"The nativity stories belong to the poetry of religion, not to history. To regard them as narrations of actual fact is to misunderstand them."

"It can hardly be maintained that Christian preachers who know the truth about these matters and refrain from stating it plainly are doing their duty to their congregations."

Now, in his new book, "The Life of Christ," 1921, Mr. Campbell says:

"The whole life of Jesus is one long miracle. He himself, as we have seen, is the supreme miracle; why hastily conclude that in the manner of his birth there could be nothing supernormal, nothing differentiating Him from mankind at large?"

"The appearance of a celestial messenger represents not more but less than the truth of what happened."

"It could not have taken place without supernatural accompaniments, for little though earth know about it heaven knew all. So far from the supernatural being a difficulty here its absence from the narrative would create a greater difficulty. There is no difficulty save in the mental attitude of our age."

I hardly thought belief in demon-possession would be credited in these days of scientific knowledge.

Giving the Devil His Due

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have been interested in the correspondence in connection with the cathedral at Rheims and in Alva W. Taylor's article. I was in Rheims this summer and I was very much impressed that the statements in relation to the destruction of the cathedral had been exaggerated. I was told there that the cathedral could be almost entirely restored. Many of its most precious art objects were removed to places of safety. With the destruction of the city all around it, I was amazed that so large a portion of the cathedral is still standing. With the terrific bombardment, the Germans must have exercised some care in sparing the cathedral.

I was in Amiens in the latter days of the war after the Germans had gone from in front of that city and there I was impressed in the same way, with the remarkable preservation of the second finest cathedral in France. Buildings in every direction were completely destroyed but the cathedral, which stood out above everything else in the city was practically untouched. I was told by one of the inhabitants there that only one glancing shot had struck the rear of the cathedral, which damage could be replaced with a few thousand dollars.

We shall have to cast aside many of the stories we heard during the war as to German barbarism, because visitors to the devastated areas are bringing back different stories. I went through Belgium last summer and talked with many people there. I could not find on the ground evidence of any of the things I heard at the time of the war. Sir Phillip Gibbs, in his recent book, "More That Must Be Told," has the same experience to report.

I had an interesting experience at San Mihiel last summer. While visiting in this city, which was held by the Germans throughout almost the entire period of the war, I met a French resident of the city who had been taken prisoner by the Germans in September, 1914, and had not heard from his wife nor family in the city during all the balance of the war inasmuch as he was taken behind the German lines. I expected to hear a story of the cruelty of the Germans while in possession of that city (which figures so largely in the annals of our own brave American troops who secured it toward the end of the war). On the contrary, he told me he was personally treated most considerately by the Germans while a prisoner and, although separated from his family and expecting himself to hear they had been treated brutally in his absence, he found on his return that his family and neighbors in San Mihiel expressed deep appreciation of the way the city had been governed and the inhabitants treated under the German war rule. He said the Germans paid for the goods they took from the stores and that the women and children suffered no inhuman treatment.

I mention this not because I am fully acquainted with all the things which happened, but simply because to my personal knowledge, both in relation to the two great cathedrals and the experience related, I found there had been many exaggerations. Until we Americans realize, as President Harding recently said, that newspapers were used for purposes of arousing hatreds during the war, we will have no due appreciation of the tasks which lie before us. It is such men as Dr. Taylor who are bringing about a better understanding and are helping us to see facts as they are.

"The Balance of Power in Religion"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: It may be assumed that a paper like THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY means to engage wholly in constructive criticism. A recent editorial, in subjecting "reciprocal exchanges" to scrutiny, seems to fail of a fair recognition of all that is involved. So far as known the plan of "reciprocal exchanges" was formulated in 1905 by a member of the Interdenominational Commission of Maine. For four years it lay simply as a paper proposition. Then it was applied in Maine, and has since been repeated in many states of the Union, across the entire country.

There is no need of pausing to say that your editorial uses the dangerous instrument of sarcasm when it speaks of "the bumpkin" and "statesmen," using the word in quotations, and then adapts a vein of derision toward all denominations. It is enough to set forth the real objects and gains, sought and found, in this plan of reciprocal exchanges.

In the first place it may be stated that the plan never proposed to preserve the balance of power in religion or between denominations. It set out distinctly to accomplish the following:

1. To substitute for the old competitive method of "the claw and tooth" between denominations, the judicial process of conference in the search of equities, and of fairness and honor in adjusting interests. This it has done.

2. Everyone who knows the history of the pioneer movements of different denominations knows, as your editorial indicates, that there has been a scramble for the pre-emption of places which promised to be desirable from a denominational point of view. The plan of reciprocal exchanges has been brought to bear upon just such places as these, at the time when it has been discovered that the towns, instead of growing, became decadent; and the plan contemplates ascertaining which church, since but one should occupy the place, should retire in favor of the other. This is a Christian attempt to undo the mistakes of the past. Nothing is finer. This has been gained.

3. A Christian psychology has been begotten. Denominational administrators, whose reputation and promotion oftentimes depend upon statistical returns, which they make to their superior bodies, have discovered that the just operation of this plan, while eliminating some weak churches, takes away no members, no property, and no opportunities, for the exchange brings, in another field, a substitute for all that may be lost. Still further, the members of a church, who, under these agreements are asked to forego the church of their own preference, find a satisfying conviction in the thought that their church elsewhere gains what it may lose through them.

All of these concrete advantages have actually been gained. But there are larger implications which run more into the field of Christian philosophy. Some of these may be set down here:

1. The hope of Christian unity lies in the fact that Christians everywhere are beginning to reduce in number the convictions of their faith which they classify as essential; and are recognizing that hitherto they have regarded many tenets as essentials which now they look upon more as matters of personal preference, personal taste, or due to temperament; and in this discovery of a decreasing number of essentials, they have come to a realization that the great evangelical denominations have practically in common these essentials.

2. This increasing recognition of a fundamental unity in faith makes it possible for members of a church of one denomination to find ample opportunity for the expression of the essentials of their faith in a church of another denomination, when local conditions render it absolutely impossible to maintain more than one church.

3. The Protestant doctrine of "the right of private judgment" exalts individualism and justifies within a single church a great variety of doctrinal views and dogmatic convictions. No church, whatever its creed, wherever it exists, has all of its members believing just the same things.

4. The common functions of all churches lie in these social fields:

(a) The local church is a social center for acquaintance and friendship, where the human touch prevails.

(b) The local church, however small, is nevertheless a great educational institution, in which the proclamation of truth, the explanation of the principles of life, and the inculcation of personal duties are constant themes.

(c) The local church, however meagerly equipped it may be, is yet a place of worship, where the deepest and most profound emotions are stirred, in the sense of awe, and in expressions of adoration and praise.

(d) The local church is a means of ministry and service unto the community—the combination of Christians in united good will and good deeds.

5. There is "a variegated gospel," as Paul calls it, which requires us all for the perfect blend. No one denomination has it all. It is not, therefore, so important as to the point of a circle from which one starts, provided the center is all important, and all are moving toward the center. With such thoughts in mind, there is no cheap juggling of churches or advantages, when the mind thinks of the whole. At the two extremes of denominational organizations these facts are becoming more clearly recognized. One extreme is the community itself. Christians within a community are seeing that their differences need not divide them. The other extreme is at the very top of the denominational organization. The leaders, so called, recognize that there is an essential unity and that there must be cooperation. Between these two extremes are intermediate organizations whose administrators find the greatest difficulty in cooperation and unity. To these men reciprocal exchanges come in a language which they can understand.

6. We must all recognize that changes in any human institution come about slowly. The time element is often overlooked, but must not be neglected. Even if reciprocal exchanges are a temporary expedient, they are nevertheless justifiable, in order to permit time to have its perfect work.

A few statements respecting the Community Church should be made.

1. There is no interdenominational organization with which the Community Church, in justice to all its component parts, can become affiliated.

2. Historically the denominations have developed efficient and extensive organizations for furnishing a ministry, educational institutions, literature, missionary fields and outlets, both home and foreign, and all the other agencies and activities which are non-local in character, and reach, as did the mind of Christ, to the world.

3. If a Community Church is to be saved from thinking only of its community, and in that sense being a selfish and self-centered organization, it must have these overhead and outside contacts with a denomination, for the sake of the larger ministry and devotion to which it is called.

It is because of these considerations, and others which are not here named, and not for any small aspects of reciprocity for the sake of preserving the balance of power, that denominational leaders have approved the plan of reciprocal exchanges. And doubtless the plan will continue to be used so long as it seems to have virtue in it.

[The communication by Dr. Anthony is only one of a large number of communications we have received, discussing, many of them in like vein, the editorial on "The Balance of Power in Religion." Dr. Anthony's statement is so comprehensive and authoritative that it seems superfluous to publish any others. It is our conviction that a re-reading of the editorial itself (see issue of December 29, 1921) in the light of Dr. Anthony's criticism will both reveal the irrelevance of much of the criticism and prove the best kind of a rejoinder to those points which are relevant.—THE EDITOR.]

Church and Lodge

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: It seems to me that the trenchancy of Lloyd Douglas' argument in his searching article, "The Church's Self Respect," is dulled a bit when you analyze the basis of his comparison. Just a little thinking will persuade anyone who knows both the lodge and the church that there is a plain difference between them. This difference makes impossible comparisons between the methods employed by the one or the other in recruiting or gaining members.

A lodge is by its inherent nature an exclusive organization. If I mistake not the spirit of its Founder, the church is inherently an inclusive institution. When the church has traversed the paths of exclusiveness, from whatever standpoint, it has lost its message and its power. On the other hand, a lodge is built upon a certain standard of exclusiveness. There are mysteries and secrets which are legitimate and appropriate to a lodge. But mysteries and esoteric whisperings, grips and words, in a church are monstrous. In a lodge, the members must vote upon each candidate; but the power of "black-balling" an aspirant for church membership has never been granted the members of a church without a result in grief and petty wrong. A lodge requires of its candidates the knowledge of certain matters to which Dr. Douglas adverts. But the main matter with the church has been its habit of catechising people and making them submit to doctrinal tests before allowing them full rights as members. A lodge is static in its ritual. A static church is the last thing that Lloyd Douglas would enjoy, I am sure. Without continuing farther in characterizing the differences between a lodge and a church, it seems clear that there is a fallacy involved in trying to compare methods by which one or the other adds to its roll of members.

Why not apply a simple standard of common sense? We want the church to grow, and honesty demands that we admit we want it to grow in influence and power in the community. We don't need to try to bluff people into thinking that they are not necessary to the church's vitality. There are scores of ways in which we may get the church started in a larger growth. Very well, apply the method best adapted to the situation. If the more subtle forms of invitation will prevail, that is fine. But if a good, straight sales-talk is necessary, don't stand back and worship the other method so piously that you refuse to put your proposition up strong to your friend of the Chamber of Commerce. Use ordinary horse-sense. Isn't it Kipling who makes one of his characters say,

"There are nine and sixty ways,
Of singing tribal lays,
And every single one of them is right."

The church's self respect does not rest upon method. Some of the most self respecting churches I know anything about have a constant campaign of recruiting—button-holing men, sending out sales literature, having straight forthright talks with men—remembering that it is not the way you get it done that counts, but what the way leads to. Cheap stuff is never in order. Nor is sob stuff! The whimpering approach never sold any line of goods. And, by the way, what is wrong with the analogy of the salesman? Personally, it appeals to me. To my notion the church's self respect rests upon intellectual integrity, moral greatness and emotional fervor. With these three qualities, any church with any reasonably decent method cannot only keep its self respect but turn in a good record of statistics for the Year Book.

John's Gospel and Messianism

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Thomas Dyke in your issue of January 19th cites the authority of Goodspeed as showing that to the author of the fourth gospel the return of Jesus had already taken place in the coming of the Spirit into the hearts of believers. It is a strange note that the fourth gospel abandons messianism, whatever that word is intended to convey. But that the last chapter of the fourth gospel was a later writing than the twenty preceding chapters is almost a certainty, and it has a strong suggestion that it was written after the Revelation.

The situation called for a new ground of hope in that coming of the Lord which the believers were expecting would transpire in Paul's time. This accounts for the explanation that the saying of Christ concerning John spoken to Peter, "What is it to thee if he (John) tarry till I come" was rumored and spread abroad among the brethren. It was a comforting message to discouraged hearts that from Christ himself came an implied promise that John should tarry till Christ should come. It seems very strange that anyone could suppose that a spiritual coming into the hearts of believers who were living in the Spirit should be taken as fulfilling that great coming of which Paul spoke. It is equally strange that any should still be looking for Christ to come in the clouds of heaven since he did in fact so come to give to John the book whose seals he had broken and did fulfil the implied prediction that John should tarry till he came.

The coming of Christ which is yet to be is the unveiling of that Revelation which I think not one reader of your able paper will claim to understand or can explain as he does the other New Testament books. Though it appraises itself above all the others it is least regarded and of least authority. Professor Goodspeed has shown a more sympathetic appreciation of the Revelation than most scholars, but even he does not yet seem to see that John's gospel and Revelation are connected as closely as Luke's gospel and Acts of Apostles. The full apprehension of this truth explains the addition of chapter 21 in John's gospel and transfers us from the high plane of Luke's two great books to the still higher plane of John's two greater books whose ending is the prophecy that their testimony would lie dead in sackcloth but would rise again and be the law of God.

Enduring Investments

Raising the large sums required to finance non-money making organizations like the churches and colleges, which do so much for human welfare, has always been their most difficult task. Perhaps this is because the soliciting has been done by those who were (literally) good at spending other people's money, who had never even tried to make any money themselves. Mr. Babson has been consulted on the making of money by the wealthiest interests of America. When he writes a book to prove that it is the best business wisdom to go into these more enduring investments that never pay back even the principal, and do so on a larger scale than the world has ever seen—well, business men will all want to look at the proof.

"Enduring Investments" is the semi-miracle working opener of blind financial eyes that over-burdened ministers, trustees and administrative Boards have been hoping would come to their rescue. ($1.50).

Making Good in Business

The famous Business Expert here applies a fundamental knowledge of business principles to daily business life. The latest work by the author of "Fundamentals of Prosperity" is crammed with the most valuable sort of hints and suggestions for the attainment of a well-balanced, normal, successful, business career. ($1.25).

The Future of the Churches

Mr. Babson shows in a constructive way how the future prosperity and achievement of the church are dependent on its ability to enter fully into the manifold life of the people, and stand as firmly for social and civic righteousness as for the meeting and supplying distinctly spiritual needs. Lawsuit Over the Bible in California

The secularists of California are now busily engaged in trying to banish the Bible from the public schools. At Fresno the school board ordered the Bible in the school library. They were attacked in the courts for this action, and the court ruled that the Bible was one of the world's masterpieces, and belonged in the library. It was further ruled that to read the Bible without comment was legal. The secularists have taken an appeal from this decision, and the case will probably be appealed to the supreme court of the state. It is about time that the supreme court of the United States faced one of these cases. The position that the Bible is a sectarian book and dangerous in the schools, while Greek mythology is wholesome and uplifting is one rather hard for the average man to understand.

Lectures Thirty-five Times in His Own Church

Dr. Russell H. Conwell recently delivered his lecture, "Acres of Diamonds," for the six thousandth time. It was also the thirty-fifth time that it was given in his church. The church was packed and the Ladies' Aid Society, which had the lecture in charge, asked Dr. Conwell to repeat his lecture in the near future. He is unique as a minister and platform man in that the receipts from a most popular platform career have been devoted to religious work in Philadelphia.

Baptist World Statistics Very Encouraging

The Baptist Handbook is a volume in which facts and statistics of the Baptist denomination are given for the whole world. While the English Baptists continue to decline in numbers, the statistics for the world over shows a very marked increase for the year 1921. The churches have increased by 4,368, the membership by 307,209 and the Sunday school pupils by 301,241. The figures for many European countries are still incomplete owing to the conditions following the war. It is thought that when these figures come in they will be very encouraging. The total number of Baptists in the world is given as 8,671,613.

Community Church the Only Hope of This Town

Oh. It is now eighteen years since the Valley Chapel Methodist church of Stockton, Ohio, closed its doors. For a long time the community was entirely without a religious shepherd. In 1918 some local laymen conceived the idea of creating a religious organization broad enough that it might command the support of all the religious people in the community. The organization has been a decided success, and now includes in its membership Methodists, Friends, Presbyterians, Lutherans, Disciples and others. The basis of the organization is the acceptance of the Bible as the discipline book and Christ as Saviour. The little church has 105 members and the Sunday school is of equal size.

Cooperate Where They Could Not Federate

At Assonet, a suburb of Falls River, Mass., the Congregational and Disciples groups recently attempted to get together in a church federation. The effort was not successful, for they could not agree on the terms of organization, but they have made a unique decision in their determination to secure a pastor who would preach in each church. He will preach alternate Sundays in the two different buildings. It is thought by some that this partial cooperation will lead to something more intimate provided a minister is secured who works in the right spirit.

Methodists Issue New Statistical Report

The statistical year of the Methodist Episcopal church ends with December 1 and recently the annual reports of that denomination were given out to the press. The net increase the past year was very encouraging, a net gain of 90,404 being recorded. There are now 3,938,655 members in this communion in this country, and the foreign membership is 542,087. The income of the various benevolent boards for the year reached the impressive total of $19,472,423. There are 40,198 churches and 34,500 ministers and local preachers. The average salary of a Methodist preacher in this country is $1,576. The church has property and endowments valued at $450,000,000.

Many New Federated Churches Come Into Being

A denominational journal reports the formation of ten new federated churches in Connecticut, in which the local Congregational church is involved. On account of the form of organization of a Congregational church, it has fewer handicaps than some in entering a community church. The following are the names of the towns with the new organization of religion: Ashford, Barkamstead, Eastford, Easton, Nepaug, New Fairfield, Roverton, Staffordville, Thompson and West Woodstock. A federation of a Congregational church with a Universalist church at Pigeon Cove, Mass., was recently accomplished. The Methodist and the Congregational churches of Custer, S. D., have recently formed a community Sunday school. The two cooperating churches are now seeking a man who will be pastor of the religious groups.

How Home Mission Money Is Wasted in Montana

Rev. T. F. Tucker, a Methodist minister of Malta, Mont., now serving a community church in that town, tells an astonishing story in the current number of the Community Churchman. When he was stationed in Malta by his conference three years ago, he found six little struggling churches. The Congregationalists were willing to merge into a community church, and many of the Episcopalians joined as well. With practically the whole community a unit in their thought about the local organization of religion, one would have thought that the denominational higher-ups would have cooperated with the community plan, but this was not the case. The Methodist church and the United Brethren church each have sent a preacher to the field to minister to a handful of people, costing a total of $2,500 out of the home mission funds of the two denominations. Ten members have remained in the Methodist church. The United Brethren minister has a Sunday evening audience of five on frequent occasions. This indicates the extent to which some ecclesiastical leaders are willing to go in the crushing of the new community church movement. But the community church is not much hindered.

Circulate Good Books Among the Methodists

Way out on the Pacific coast Methodist ministers are so hungry for the good new books that they have arranged a method of co-operation in securing them. The Social Service Commission of the conference has established a circulating library. Each minister who uses the library must contribute one book to the library each year. This makes him a member of the co-operation. The conference committee passes upon all books offered, and they are accepted only as they measure up to the standards set. Each man pays postage on his book on the next user which gives the minister a book for each postage bill. The books not only cover the field of economics and sociology, but religion, philosophy and politics as well.

Chicago "Y" Has a Rousing Annual Meeting

Mr. L. Wilbur Messer recently presented the thirty-fourth annual report to his board of managers. With film and stereopticon slide he brought quickly to his board members some impression of the large work the Association is doing in Chicago. Thirteen buildings are in constant use, and in these buildings an average of 3,746 men are housed every night. A paid membership of 38,325 men is scattered over the city. In addition to the members, thousands of other men are benefitted every year. It was reported that 146,000 different men were lodged at the "Y" hotel during the year and 192,000 attended the Americanization lectures in public parks and playgrounds. The educational work is summarized by the fact that 4,291 men and boys were students in the regular day and evening schools. In the gymnasiums 1,934 men and boys are in daily attendance. A part of the genius of Mr. Messer has been his ability to gather around him a group of strong and resourceful business men who provide the finances for his large enterprises. He now has 2,215 men in Chicago who constitute this financial body-guard. These men are giving regularly $200,000 to the maintenance of the work, and in addition have helped in the acquisition of seven and a half million dollars worth of property. Mr. Messer holds with the more conservative section of "Y" secretaries, and places strong emphasis upon the religious work program of the Association, though the social service activities bulk large.

Methodists Enter the Logging Camps of the Northwest

The logging country of the great northwest is a field quite difficult to cover, and the Presbyterian workers, four in number, have been reinforced by four workers of the Methodist church. Two of these men are at work in Gray's Harbor country, one in the Willapa Harbor district and one covers the whole lumber area of western Washington. Twelve pastors who have charges occasionally perform religious services for the loggers in addition to the regular work enumerated above. In the Gray's Harbor area, Rev. George Magwood is meeting with great success in organizing the "Loggers' Christian Brotherhood." Rev. J. Herbert Geoghagan is very skeptical with regard to current reports of a $53,000 fund being expended by the I. W. W. in the logging country on propaganda. He says: "The size of the I. W. W. organization and its strength and enthusiasm has been very foolishly overstated. To make statements of this kind in the eastern churches relative to the 'Red' menace in the western logging camps may be good tactics as far as the securing of financial support is concerned, but I am inclined to question the ethics of it all."

Methodists Are Generous to Old Ministers

The Methodist church is the place for a minister to grow old, for it is the most generous organization in the treatment of the veterans of spiritual wars. Dr. Joseph B. Hingeley of Chicago is corresponding secretary of the Board of Conference Claimants. Dr. Hingeley reported that the amount of pensions in 1908 was $600,000 and that the amount now needed to satisfy fully all the claims of the pensioners is $3,000,000 a year. A decade ago not one Methodist pensioner received more than $600 annually, while now 500 get that and larger sums. In 1921 there were 3,000 pensioners who received less than $200 a year, 25 who received less than $100 a year, and 1,000 pensioners were given less than $50 a year. "Ten years ago," said Dr. Hingeley, "there were four claimants in the entire church who received more than $500 a year. In 1920 there were 1,839 who received that amount or more and in 1921 a much larger number. In 1910 no claimant received as much as $600 but in 1920 there were 455 who received $600 or more and in 1921 about 500 claimants who received that amount. In 1910 four-fifths of the total number of claimants received less than $200. In 1921 over three-fifths of the claimants received more than that amount. The pensioners include 3,295 ministers, 3,787 widows, and 764 children."

Presbyterian Church Strong in Mission Work

The Presbyterian church is strong in its foreign work. This task was taken up in 1837, and in the period intervening seventy million dollars has been expended on the redemption of the world. The income for foreign work the past year reached the impressive total of $4,633,000. Seventeen thousand converts were received into the Presbyterian church on foreign fields last year through profession of faith. The largest Presbyterian church in the world is located at Elat, West Africa, with 8,000 members. This denomination numbers within its secretarial force some of the great missionary statesmen of the task of world evangelization.

Central Church of Indianapolis Dedicates

Central Christian church of Indianapolis recently dedicated a modern educational plant. The dedicatory services were held on the afternoon of January 29, and ministers of many churches in the city were present to felicitate the church upon its achievement. A portrait of Mr. George P. Harvey, one of the loyal benefactors of the church, was unveiled in connection with the dedicatory services. The pastor of the church is Rev. Allan B. Philpott, one of the veteran ministers of the city, and the dean of the Disciples group.

Publishes a Declaration of Good-will

First Unitarian church of Louisville, Ky., at the New Year published in the local press a declaration of good-will toward the other churches and religious organizations of the city. Such a declaration is an unusual thing in these days when sectarian competition is still a fact. The New Year declaration takes on additional meaning from the fact that the past year the Unitarian ministers of the city were debarred from fellowship in the local ministerial association, owing to a recrudescence of theological prejudice.

Religious People Do the Giving

The Boston Transcript, which has a very complete review of religious facts and movements every week, recently made a survey of the philanthropy in the eastern and northern sections of the United States. It was found that in a single year a billion dollars was given to various enterprises. The people who gave the money were also investigated as to their religious convictions. It was found that 78 out of every hundred names were those of communicant members of the churches, Jewish, Catholic or Protestant. The membership of the various churches enumerated above is only 41 per cent of the population. The Transcript makes the deduction that 78 per cent of the givers come from far less than one-half of the population. It is well-known that Jewish philanthropy is mostly for Jewish objects and that the great humanitarian appeals get a response chiefly in protestant circles. Thus one-fourth of the people of the country bear in large measure the burden of the humanitarian movements.

Unitarians Would Like to be Like Methodists

The Membership Campaign Committee is trying to thaw out the ice of Unitarian dignity. All over the nation efforts are being made to recruit Unitarian churches. It is a bit unusual to say the least to find the National Membership Campaign Committee using such a statement as the following: "I wish some one would tell me," says Ernest G. Adams, "why we haven't shown the same disposition to go out and save that our Methodist brethren have. To my mind, the Unitarian faith is the most virile faith that is possible to conceive, and I, for one, simply cannot help constantly jumping up and crying out the good news! Why other people can't see it I don't know, but I feel that this campaign we are on today is the test of our manhood; it is the test of our womanhood; it is the test of whether religion is something to save with or something to take to ourselves and to care for our own precious skins."

At 85 Thomas Kane Goes On

Few Protestant laymen in America have affected ecclesiastical practice more than has Thomas Kane of Chicago. A Presbyterian and for a long time a commissioner to the General Assembly, he has devoted his life to the preaching of the tithing principle. At first the preachers had no tolerance for his idea, but this year nearly every one of the evangelical communions of the country is carrying on a "stewardship" campaign, and using the literature of the layman who for so long anonymously advocated a return to old-time biblical methods of giving. That this old man of 85 has abated none of his vigor may be seen by the fact that in sixty days recently 300,000 pamphlets went out of his office for distribution in the various denominations. In his early days he produced the silent slate which reduced the noise of the school-room for those who are now of the older generation. The remarkable fact about the life of this man is that he has built up a great publishing business in which there is no suspicion of hoarding up for himself any large wealth.

Editor Tells Churches to Get Together

On a recent Sunday morning the Presbyterian church of Sterling, Ill., burned to the ground. At almost the same hour, the Methodist church edifice of the Twin city, Rock Falls, also burned. Commenting on the community situation created by these two regrettable occurrences, the editor of the Sterling Gazette urges the members of the churches that have lost their buildings to join other churches and thus decrease by two the number of congregations in the twin cities. The editor calls attention to the great evils to be fought in the world and the greater efficiency the churches would have if they were organized in stronger groups. The organization of a new United Brethren church a few years ago was strongly opposed by this editor.

Disease Follows in the Wake of Famine

The American Relief Administration in Russia has recently cabled the Federal Council of Churches that disease is now following in the wake of the famine. The official dispatch puts the matter tersely: "Contagious diseases raging; spreading rapidly. Typhus approaching worst stages. Cholera widespread. Appalling lack of medicines, medical equipment, clothing. These statements made after thorough investigation. Charitable organizations should concentrate efforts for the collecting of funds for medicine and clothing." Mr. Herbert Hoover declares that several millions of dollars are needed for medical supplies alone. The funds voted by governments will keep alive three million people until the next harvest. Twelve million people are in danger of death by starvation. Private benefaction must bridge the gap.

Will Stress the Devotional Life in Lent

The protestant churches are every year making increased use of the spiritual opportunities of the lenten season, without taking on any of the dread formalities of older observances. This year the Federal Council of Churches has issued a booklet for the guidance of the churches, providing daily readings for each day in the lenten period. As the studies are based upon the gospel of Luke, specially bound copies of this gospel will also be furnished. The Reformed and Congregational denominations have underwritten the financial cost of the booklet. The committee which produced it was composed of Rev. F. L. Fagley, Rev. Oscar M. Voorhees and Mr. William A. Harbison.

Pastors' Convention of Ohio a Success

Four hundred ministers of Ohio attended the state convention held by the church federation at Columbus, January 22. The sessions extended through four days and were of instruction and inspiration. This is the third annual meeting of its kind and it is declared by its promoters to have been the most successful of the series. A tentative program for the federation for the next eighteen months was approved by the convention. Some of the most eminent church leaders in America participated in the discussions.

Where the Big Disciples' Churches Are

The work of the Disciples of Christ is largely localized in the north central Mississippi though their churches are to be found in every state in the Union save one. The recently published year-book of the Disciples gives the leading churches, both from the stand-point of membership and of achievement, so far as achievement can be reduced to statistics. The five largest churches in members are as follows: Canton, O., with 4,000 members; University Place of Des Moines, with 3,076; Pittsburgh, Kas., with 3,000; Linwood Boulevard of Kansas City, with 2,413, and First Church of Akron, O., with 2,239. The Sunday school list is not the same as the church list. The five largest Sunday schools are at Canton, O.; Long Beach, Calif.; Third of Indianapolis and Tabor, Ind., and Ft. Worth, Tex. The churches that lead in missionary giving are Akron, O.; Euclid Avenue of Cleveland, Union Avenue of St. Louis, Dallas, Tex., and Linwood Boulevard of Kansas City.

Disciples' Churches Have No Ministers

The ministers of the Disciples churches have been driven from the manse in recent years in droves by hard economic necessity. The latest published statistics indicate that of the 8,956 churches only 3,339 now have full-time preaching. The churches with part-time preaching total 2,226 while there are 2,291 churches that have no ministry at all. Some of these churches without a ministry are small, but many of them have a real field. While the colleges recruit the ministry, the leakage from economic causes continues, and no account is taken by the national and state leaders of this fact. The death roll among the ministers last year was 56. Most of the loss is to be accounted for in other ways.

Baptists Will Go to Sweden in 1923

The city of Stockholm will be the rendezvous of Baptists who seek the world wide fellowship in 1923. The Baptist World Alliance has accepted an invitation to meet there in July. Although the first Baptist church was organized in Sweden in 1848, the movement has grown so rapidly that there are 60,000 Baptists in Sweden at the present time. Early in the movement in Sweden a theological seminary was established, and very quickly the churches were able to secure a native ministry. Many denominations now have a world organization, including Methodists, Presbyterians and Congregationalists. Baptists are really the most cosmopolitan of the various protestant denominations, but their international organization did not come into being until a few years ago.

Tennessee College Suffers Loss by Fire

Denominational colleges have a hard time to get along under the best conditions, and it is but little short of tragedy when one of them suffers heavy loss by fire. On January 10, Morrison Normal and Industrial college, an institution of the Methodist church in Tennessee, lost its dormitory by fire. It is estimated that the loss exceeds $60,000. The people of the town were very generous to the colored students who had been made homeless by the fire, and took them right in. The building was in part insured but the insurance is not at all adequate to provide for a new structure, particularly in view of the present prices of building.

Methodist Minister Becomes Prison Chaplain

Rev. Frank C. Bruner, a Methodist minister of Rock River Conference, has been appointed chaplain of the state penitentiary at Joliet, Ill. For twenty-three years he served as pastor in Chicago. He has an interesting military record, having been chaplain of the Third Illinois Infantry during the Spanish-American war. He has been much in demand on the lecture platform, particularly in Chautauqua work.

Syracuse University Finds a President

Syracuse University, a Methodist institution, has selected a new president, Charles Wesley Flint, D.D. He succeeds Chancellor James R. Day. The new executive is only 43 years of age, but has already won his laurels in the academic world. As president of Cornell college in Iowa he has been a pronounced success. A Canadian by birth, he took the regular theological course at Drew Seminary. He has had a number of successful pastorates, succeeding Dr. Francis J. McConnell at New York Avenue church in Brooklyn. The institution to which he goes has 6,000 students, and in this responsibility he will have ample use for his educational leadership.

Episcopalians Establish a Speakers' Bureau

In these days up-to-date churches often feel the need of an outside voice in connection with the various societies of the church. In case the church has a forum, this need is particularly important. In western New York, the bishop of the Episcopal church, Bishop Brent, has established such a bureau and through the agency of the bureau speakers are being placed every day. Every speaker who goes out is known by the bishop to be a proper person to assist in church work. Through this means the parish program of Episcopal churches in western New York has been made very attractive.

Moving Picture Theater Dedicated by Rector

That the churches and the movie promoters can cooperate has been shown by a recent happening in Asheville, N. C. Rev. Willis G. Clark, rector of the Episcopal church, was recently asked to speak at the formal opening of the local movie house. The minister spoke of the moving picture theater as a real contribution to the city life when properly conducted. He said: "The moving picture is the most popular form of entertainment that we now have. This fact puts upon those who have the character of its influence under their control a responsibility that requires both courage and consecration to meet aright. I have no apologies at all for accepting the invitation to speak tonight, but I have much appreciation for the motives and plans of those who have invited me here. They are the men who are behind this business and who have built this theater. They are men of character whom we can trust."

Foreign Missions Conference Meets in New York

Several hundred representatives of the various foreign mission organizations of North America are accustomed to meet every year just following the holidays in the vicinity of New York to consider the common task. This year the sessions were held at Atlantic City, January 11-13. Dr. Ezra K. Bell presided over the sessions. Probably the theme of greatest significance was that of "The National Consciousness of Peoples in Mission Lands and Its Effects on the Development of the Church Today." All foreign mission boards are feeling an unrest in the mission field on the part of the native Christians, and it is inevitable that certain changes come in order to meet the new demand. Several phases of this theme were presented by D. Willard Lyon of China; W. Douglas McKenzie of Hartford, Conn.; D. J. Fleming of New York; James Endicott of Toronto and James H. Franklin. One of the interesting reports of this meeting was presented by Rev. S. G. Inman, secretary of the Commission on Latin America. The leadership of Mr. Inman in securing interdenominational comity in the Latin American field has been invaluable. Naturally the economic conditions of recent years have made things difficult for the missionary, and the representatives of the various boards considered their common duties and responsibilities in making the missionaries comfortable in their work. Not all the fields of the heathen world are yet occupied. Mr. and Mrs. William R. Stewart of China made a very telling report on a neglected province of China and the missions boards are preparing to enter this new field at once. Dr. John R. Mott is usually to be found at a foreign missions conference and at this session he spoke on "Cultivation of the Home Field." The meetings were held away from the distractions of the metropolitan area this year and much greater concentration was achieved by this strategic move. The officers for the coming year are chairman, James Endicott, secretary for Foreign Missions, Methodist Church of Canada; first vice-chairman, Mrs. W. F. McDowell, Washington, D. C.; second vice-chairman, C. T. Hall, Indianapolis; secretary, Fennell P. Turner, New York; treasurer, A. E. Marling, New York; honorary secretary, W. H. Grant, New York.

Is the World Growing Worse or Better?

A writer in Unity who so often finds the world going to the bad has recently discovered some crumbs of comfort to match over against the almost irresistible tide of evil. He says: "When time is free, and you have a moment to ponder things pertaining to the welfare of America and the destiny of men, suppose you give a thought to such facts as these: Harold Bell Wright is the most popular novelist in the country; Nicholas Murray

Butler has for twenty years been president of our largest university; the Hearst newspapers surpass all others in general circulation; Warren Gamaliel Harding attained the presidency of the nation by a majority of over 7,000,000 votes; 'Getting Gertie's Garter' ran for

CHINA: AN INTERPRETATION

By BISHOP JAMES W. BASHFORD

"These masterly pages are comprehensive and concise, suggestive, practical and important. The author's outlook and sympathies are as wide as humanity, hence his treatment of the yellow problem. Japanese aggression and international politics displays the balance and sanity of the Christian philosopher and the 'large conclusions' of the true historian."—Rev. C. weeks to packed houses at first class prices at a first class New York theater; the Ku Klux Klan has a membership of over 500,000; 'Gene Debs was in prison three years after the Armistice with general popular approval, and other political offenders are still there; the 'Star Spangled Banner' is accepted as a worthy national anthem; 'Babe' Ruth (or is it Douglas Fairbanks?) is the outstanding public figure in the country. Such facts are depressing. But that Unity may not be charged with tempting its readers to suicide, we hasten to ask consideration of the following: 'If Winter Comes' has sold over 250,000 copies, and is still going strong; Senator Borah is the idol of the people of his state; out-door symphony concerts in New York City during the summer, at which only classical music was played, attracted audiences of thousands every night, and winter concerts are played regularly to packed houses; the Atlantic Monthly has a circulation of over 135,000 copies; at least six plays of distinguished merit are now successes on Broadway; disarmament is the most popular issue in American politics today; the community church is revitalizing organized religion in all parts of the country. If there are some signs that are bad, there are some also that are good!"

Salvation Army Continues Its Helpful Ministry

Had the Salvation Army as efficient a press agent as many Christian organizations, its stories of Christian helpfulness would be on every one's tongue. The organization has 11,173 corps operating in 70 countries and employing 42 languages. Col. W. A. McIntyre is responsible for the statement that the number of converts is increasing at the rate of 60,000 a year in the United States, and 250,000 throughout the world. Colonel McIntyre is commander of the New England district. When he was first assigned to this task fifteen months ago, he took an automobile and visited the entire 81 corps of his district in a single month. He has dedicated a new building somewhere in his district every month of his service.

Fighting for Control of Denominational Machinery

The Baptists face this year the most determined fight on the part of the Fundamentalists for the control of the machinery of the denomination. Rev. J. C. Massee, chairman of the Committee on Conferences on Baptist Fundamentals, recently sent out a letter in which he said: "This year more than ever we must keep the fight going all along the line in order that we may come to the next convention sufficiently well organized and in forces strong enough to be recognized in the election of convention officers, the appointment of convention committees and the determination of convention policies. We can never consent to stop short of seeing the denominational machinery in control of the great conservative constituency which makes up at least three-fourths of the denomination. We must therefore eliminate from our boards and offices of responsibility all those men who have put in jeopardy the spiritual life and purpose of the denomination and who wink at the subversion of our schools to the propagation of a modernistic program."

Baptist Laymen Out for Millions

Baptist laymen from twenty-five states met in Chicago on January 20 and planned for the raising of fifteen million dollars during the coming spring. Heading the movement is that militant Baptist layman of Denver, Judge F. W. Freeman. The committee will stress some of the spiritual enterprises of the church as well as Evangelism. Stewardship and enlistment will be some of the big words of the campaign. Baptist organizations have been greatly crippled by the slowness of collection of the funds pledged in the big financial campaign of last year. It is hoped that the financial crisis of the denomination may be met by the vigorous campaign of the laymen.

Camouflaged Christian Science Appears on Book Stands

Religious people are not always sensitive to the ethics of their proselyting methods. This finds illustration in the appearance on the book stands recently of a booklet called "The Runner's Bible." When one opens the volume one finds the usual mixture of Eddyism and Holy Scripture, though with no warning labels. The title is drawn from the familiar passage in Habbakuk, "He that runneth may read."

Sunday School Executive Committee Will Meet

A very important meeting of the executive committee meeting of the International Sunday School Association will be held in Chicago February 16 and 17. Among the agenda is the question of the selection of a general secretary. A year ago Mr. Marion Lawrance was in very bad health and at that time he was made consulting general secretary for life. Meanwhile the organization has been seeking for an acting secretary. It is thought that a nomination will be made at the Chicago meeting. The consummation of the proposed merger of the Sunday School Council and the International Association will be under discussion at Chicago. Mr. Marion Lawrance is in charge of the arrangements for the coming convention at Kansas City, and it is hoped that it may be the largest convention yet held.

New Congregational Leader Faces Real Problems

The Chicago Congregational City Missionary Society in calling Rev. John R. Nichols to the secretaryship has given him a man's job. Congregationalism in Chicago is sharply divided into two camps by the theological issue. Outstanding liberals and fundamentalists are trying to work side by side, and this is difficult for both kinds of ministers. Recently the employing society has made a declaration of policy through the policy committee which reads thus: "We favor the largest possible support of those fields which give promise of developing into strong, self-supporting churches. We believe in working out as large a plan for distinctive missionary work in needy communities as we can possibly support, consistent with making self-supporting churches on one hand and taking into account the work of other denominations. We believe in the union of our churches with those of other denominations wherever this means increased efficiency for the kingdom of God, and we believe in a living wage for the ministers of all our churches. Many factors enter into each case, so that each must be settled on its own merits."

Conference Called in Rome to Fix Easter Date

This may be the last year that Easter is a movable date. A conference has been called in Rome for April next at which Cardinal Mercier is to preside, which will consider the question of a fixed date. It is said that the English church will follow the decisions of this conference. It is hardly likely that the free churches of the world would undertake to observe a different date, as the advantages of uniformity of observance are too obvious.

Bishop McDowell Has a New Plan

While the negotiations for the union of northern and southern Methodism go on haltingly, Bishop McDowell of Washington offers an interesting suggestion. He proposes that the spring conference of bishops of each communion be held in the same city at the same time and that time be given for frank and brotherly consideration of the common problems. He also proposes that many of the church boards take similar action. This plan is not offered as a substitute for the work of the Unification Committee, but as a plan by which mutual acquaintance would help in the breaking down of barriers.

Ministers of Chicago Not Sure the Mayor Means It

Recently fifty leading members of Protestant, Jewish and Catholic religious organizations called upon the mayor of Chicago at his invitation. He made a promise that the laws would be vigorously enforced henceforth, and this fifty men pledged their support to the mayor in law enforcement. Later when the endorsement of the Chicago Church Federation was sought, this endorsement was withheld on a divided vote on the ground that election time was too near for the church to endorse candidates for office. Some ministers openly expressed their opinion that the recent pronouncement of the mayor was made for political reasons.

Banner Year for Church Mergers

In spite of the opposition of secretaries, superintendents and others, 1921 was banner year for church mergers. The largest number of these local reorganizations of religious institutions has come about. This is due to a decline of denominational loyalty in many quarters, to an increased economic pressure and to a new conscience on the subject of division among Christ's followers:

What is The New Republic?

A weekly journal of critical comment on politics, the arts and the business of everyday living. "Incomparably the finest thinking journal in America," says Commerce and Finance.

What kind of Magazine is it?

It's a fictionless, fashionless, pictureless magazine, printed in large, clear type and filled with cold fact and warm discussion—the leader and prototype of the "journal of opinion," whose policy is, not to cater, but to speak the truth.

Who writes it?

There are five editors: Herbert Croly, Philip Littell, Francis Hackett, Alvin Johnson, Robert Morss Lovett and Robert Littell. There are hundreds of contributors; among them, John Dewey, H. G. Wells, Norman Angell, Morris R. Cohen, Harold Laski, Felix Frankfurter, Bruce Bliven, William Hard, Edward G. Lowry, Bernard Shaw, Thomas Hardy, H. N. Brailsford, etc.

Isn't it devoted exclusively to politics?

On the contrary. Each issue begins with a brief survey of the events of the week, a blend of news and sharp comment. Then there are frequent articles on literature, art and music, sketches of important or amusing aspects of American life, several pages of letters from correspondents, and of book reviews and occasionally a review of a particularly bad or good play. Now and then there is a page of "Books and Things," which revives the almost lost art of literary conversation. Also, "The New Republic is the one weekly which consistently publishes good poetry."—N. Y. Times.

What is the purpose of The New Republic?

By providing a critical survey of the most significant influences shaping our lives, The New Republic aims to stimulate its readers, to help them think for themselves. It has no cause to serve save truth, no panacea to defend save open discussion.

Isn't a critic a sort of pestiferous faultfinder?

He may be—he often is. But the critic, as we see him, is rather the pathfinder—one who seeks to discover the reason for things. His function is to help men to see farther, to feel more deeply, to appraise more accurately—to live more widely.

Well, what will The New Republic do for me?

Sir, or Madam, just that. It won't make you unduly cultured or sapient all in a minute—it won't provide you with a brand new gospel, economic or religious. But, by its own vivid interest, it will make life and the world we live in richer and more interesting. It will help dispel the most deadly of modern afflictions—the curse of boredom. And, by spurring you to discussion, to finding out what you actually do think, it will make your opinions more real, more imaginative—and more fun.

Can I try it first?

You can. A dollar bill pinned to the coupon below brings you a 13 Weeks' Acquaintance Subscription, and a FREE copy of Herbert Croly's editorial, "War and Christian Ethics"; also New Republic Pamphlet No. 2, "Roads to Peace," which the Philadelphia Friends' Peace Committee calls "the most valuable, definite and constructive statement which has yet appeared along the lines to a genuine Christian peace."

The Infinite Artist

By Frederick F. Shannon

Minister Central Church, Chicago

CENTRAL CHURCH is a Chicago institution. It has been more fortunate than most other similarly distinguished pulpits in great cities in securing, when a change has been required, a man who could succeed under the peculiar conditions of an independent church worshipping in a rented down-town auditorium. This volume takes title from the opening sermon. "An Abounding Personality" is Dr. Shannon's tribute to his predecessor, Frank W. Gunsaulus. Other sermons included are: The Infinite Artist; the Larger Freedom; Christ's Judgment of the Universe; The Iron Gate; The Supreme Originality; To Athens—and Beyond; Housekeeping and Soulkeeping; New and Old; The Dreamer.

Social Rebuilders

By Charles R. Brown

THIS book by the dean of the Divinity School of Yale University contains the lectures delivered by him at DePauw University in 1921 upon the Mendenhall Foundation, and constitutes the seventh in that series of lectures. The five lectures are a study in reconstruction with certain ancient leaders of biblical history as the outstanding figures, and the present situation of the world, as an aftermath of the war, as the chief point of application. The book is distinctly a message for the day.

"The chief distinction of this little book is that it is a voice crying in the present wilderness of confusion and disorder showing the way out."—President Grose, DePauw University.

PRINCES —OF THE— CHURCH

By W. ROBERTSON NICOLL
Editor of The British Weekly

IN THIS new volume Dr. Nicoll pays tribute to thirty-three of the pulpit notables of England, who made the English pulpit glorious from the late eighties to the present date. All of these preachers the author knew personally, and most of them were intimate friends. The following are some of the men discussed:

Dr. Horatius Bonar, Dr. R. W. Dale
Bishop Lightfoot, W. Robertson Smith
John Henry Newman, Bishop Westcott
Canon Liddon, Henry Drummond
James Martineau, Principal Hutton
Silvester Horne, Dr. Barnado
George Matheson, Frederick Robertson
Ian Maclaren, Principal Rainy
Marcus Dods, Hugh Price Hughes
Alexander Maclaren, Dean Church
C. H. Spurgeon, Joseph Parker.

"A panorama of genius" indeed! For these names are among the very greatest of the modern church. Catholicity of spirit and true insight characterize this latest volume of the great British editor, who alone could produce such a work as this is.

What and Where Is God?

By RICHARD LARUE SWAIN, Ph.D.

By far the most popular book ever sold by The Christian Century Press. More than two thousand copies have already been disposed of, and it is today one of our best sellers.

Of the book Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of The Christian Century, says:

"I could wish that every uncertain and troubled mind might know that there is such a book as this. It makes God intelligible to men of modern world view. It shows how science prepares the way for a far better, more vital, more spiritual, more personal God than was possible under the older forms of thinking. The author is one of those psychologists—and alas! all too few is their number—who have gone into the technique of psychology and thought their way through it into real life again. He speaks with authority. His book will have the approval of technical scholarship, but it is intended for the lay mind. I know that if any person reads the book on my recommendation he will divide with me a small portion of the enthusiastic gratitude which he will surely feel toward the author. In my judgment it is far and away the most important book on religion that has appeared during the past year.

And Dr. Douglas C. McIntosh, professor of theology in Yale, says:

"What and Where is God? draws a clearly defined picture of God, man, and the universe to take the place of the fading picture that is becoming such a menace to religious faith. Dr. Swain has produced what will undoubtedly prove to be one of the most notable religious books of recent publication.. It contains descriptions of religious experiences which rival in interest anything to be found in William James' 'Varieties of Religious Experience' or Harold Begbie's 'Twice-born Men.' But its most valuable feature is its simple, vivid, original, and attractive presentation of the most important elements of modern constructive thought. A better book to put into the hands of the religiously perplexed and doubting has not been written for many a day. It is a book that will live."

Wider Cooperation for Common Ends

WORKING at cross purposes, religious men often defeat each other's efforts. The Catholic finds himself thwarted by the Protestant statesman in securing better divorce laws. The Catholic has joined with the Jew to defeat the Protestant in the latter's attempt to bring into the public schools uninterpreted sections of the holy scriptures. Such jealousies and bigotry make it possible for a small group of secularists to have their own way largely in the law-making bodies of certain states. It is gratifying, therefore, to note that there is some indication of cooperation among these religious groups where previously there has been isolation and discord. It was to be expected that this cooperation would come first on the social side. Catholics, Protestants and Jews agree in large measure upon the standards that should prevail in industry. They have been willing to sit together, and plan for the bringing in of a new order which shall spell justice and brotherhood. There is room for very much more cooperation than exists. The Catholics have taken advanced ground in the matter of giving the moving picture industry a moral control. There is among this group of people today a higher conception of ethical policy with regard to movies than has been worked out among Protestant churches. Why should Protestants withhold from Catholics whatever aid they can give in realizing their aims with regard to the movie business? While Catholics have in noteworthy instances helped in the temperance reform, yet the main burden on the religious side has been carried by the Protestant groups. Why should not Catholics help win a fight which they are beginning to see means as much for their churches as it means for Protestant churches? It will be a longtime before these three religious groups will be amalgamated. But is there any reason why they should not do what sensible people do in every other walk of life, cooperate to realize common ends?

Prohibition Steadily Becoming International Issue

THE threatened economic retaliation of Spain against Iceland on account of prohibition in Iceland is simply one of the many indications that the day is not far distant when the question of alcoholism will be an international question. It is not fifteen years since many of the most important leaders of public opinion in the United States were insisting that the temperance question was one for townships and villages, but not a matter for state or federal action. As the impossibility of having one section dry and another wet while social intercourse continued between the two sections, the United States came at last to the conviction that national prohibition was the only remedy. Now that relatively strong nations threaten economic action against weak nations which adopt prohibition measures, it is evident that at last the question becomes one of world significance. France is now threatening to reinforce the wine-making interests with some sort of action like that taken in Spain. To meet these hazards Senator Jones has introduced into the United States senate a resolution which puts the United States on record as opposed to this economic discrimination on the part of liquor-producing countries. Once it was thought legitimate for Great Britain to force opium on China. Now that is seen to be one of the worst blots on the record of a great Christian government. It will not be long until it will be seen that government action which tends to keep the world drunk instead of making it sober is selfish paganism rather than enlightened statesmanship. The world ought to be eating the fruit from the vineyards of France and Spain before it has rotted into debauching liquor. Intelligent leaders in these Latin countries must be led to see that aggressive action against prohibition countries will be resented by the most powerful nation in the world, and that is not good policy.

Can Lynching Be Abolished?

LYNCHING will no longer be the favorite pastime in America if the senate of the United States concurs in the anti-lynching bill that is now before it. This bill provides for protection to those who fail to get protection in state courts on account of race, nationality or religion. Lynching is defined as murder, and heavy penalties are provided for the counties in which lynchings occur. The debate in the house of representatives became a sectional debate. Although the statistics proved that lynching was not peculiar to the south, and that in the past thirty years only thirty per cent of the lynchings were for alleged rape, nevertheless the southern congressmen continued to argue the matter from the standpoint of state rights, and from the standpoint of their attitude toward the Negro. The bill will be attacked in the judiciary committee of the senate by the same influences that fought it in the house and with much better chances of success. It will require the united voice of liberal citizenship in various parts of the United States to bring about the passage of the bill. Fortunately there is crystalizing in the new south a new sentiment with regard to the Negro question. There are those who are convinced that lynching is not only barbaric but that it is no protection to womanhood. If such minded people will add their efforts to the enlightened group of the north, the government can be led to take advanced ground on the Negro question. Meanwhile our country is disgraced in the eyes of the world by those narrow politicians who are able without shame to stand in a deliberative body and argue in defense of mob violence.

Rural Trouble the Church's Opportunity

DEFLATION came to the farmer before it came to anyone else. Thewar-time speculation loaded young men up with farms at top-notch prices. Some are being forced to bankruptcy. Others are struggling along with almost intolerable burdens. It is the long experience of religious organizations that it is in time of trouble that men and women turn their faces once more to the church. The modern rural church program was made for such a time as this. The way out for the men with the heavy burdens is better farming. The increase of the productivity of the land, greater diversity in crops and more scientific study of the food demands of the world are the factors involved. The young minister who has had some training in an agricultural school can bring helpful knowledge to his people. His is also the function in these times of doing some human engineering as well. The courage and hopefulness of any man facing a hard task is vitally important. The man who quits is defeated without a battle. The American farmer faces several years of hard labor, but if it must be, he is entitled to win. It is important that the farm home shall be harmonious in a time when there are few luxuries. The team work of the rural family makes the difference between victory and defeat sometimes. Keeping the young folks satisfied on the farm means reinforcement in the most efficient of all industrial groups where people cooperate unselfishly, the family. There has been much in rural life in recent years that has not been well. The automobile has been abused in the country just as much as in the city. The speed maniac has substituted long Sunday journeys for the quiet communion of the sanctuary. In these days tens of thousands of machines are stored away in sheds, for there is no money to buy gas and tires. The church has a right to press the claims of a decent life program which will involve righteousness, neighborliness, education and worship.

The Church and Human Nature

THE most frequent charge brought against the church, especially by the young, is that it is dull. Other places are more interesting, and consequently at a certain stage in their development young people tend to drop out of church. Probably one of the great factors in the growth of Methodism has been the ability of its ministers to make themselves interesting. Some other denominations have turned out better educated ministers, but if education stiffens the minister and detaches him from real life it is a decided disadvantage in Christian leadership. The church might well take lessons from some of the great students of human nature. Such a newspaper man as Lord Northcliffe, who owns more than a hundred journals and is perhaps the leading newspaper proprietor of the world, has achieved his success by studying human nature in order to determine what people are interested in. The Chautauqua bureau picks out its speakers not only from the standpoint of their knowledge, but also for their ability to "go over big." The man who speaks in a sweltering tent on a hot summer afternoon must know how to make things interesting to an audience made up of tired housewives and farmers heavy with the burden of toil. Too often preaching is only a poor grade of class-room lecture, such as might pass in a second rate college, but never with a promiscuous audience of various grades of culture. It is a mistake also to attempt to mould the program of the parish by college standards and traditions rather than by a study of the recreational habits of the community, its natural likes and dislikes. Preachers simply must make themselves and their programs interesting enough to compete with theaters and commercialized recreation. There are great churches in the midst of a thousand distractions of city life, and yet their work goes on to ever larger success in spite of such competition. Church leaders must know more about human nature if religion is to get a grip upon the restless young life of the twentieth century.

Divorce Gets Some Hard Blows

WHILE movie films continue to represent divorce as an ordinary and amiable method of solving domestic problems—that is the way they are solved in the movie colony at Los Angeles—there are other voices to be heard these days. In legitimate drama another voice is heard in "Lightnin'," presented first in New York and running now in Chicago. The audiences that fill the theater for this play spend two hours laughing at the absurdities of the American divorce practice. The Calivada hotel is located on the line between California and Nevada and all those in one wing of the hotel are looking for a divorce. When Mrs. Jones, through the machinations of sharpers, tries to divorce her rather worthless old soldier husband, "Lightnin'" Bill Jones, the plot moves forward to a near-tragedy, which is only averted by Mrs. Jones changing her mind. Dorothy Canfield, in "The Brimming Cup," has discussed the love triangle and the Freudian problem, but reached a conclusion not all pleasing to those literary gentlemen who consider it their main task in life to deliver the world from the illiberalism of monogamy. Instead of hunting fresh tragedies in a second match, the heroine of the story undertakes the more sensible task of trying to understand her husband. The ministers, also, are taking higher stand. A divorcee went the rounds of the various manses of a large city the other day trying to find a minister to marry him and finally gave up the quest. If once in awhile some minister makes the front page of the daily with a sermon in favor of divorce, this exception only helps to establish the rule that the church has a growing conscience on the subject of defending the monogamous home. Eight thousand divorces in Chicago sounds big, and it is big. But there were more than a half million couples who chose the road of fidelity. They want to give their children and grandchildren the joy of a home to come back to, while they themselves find in the sober joys of advanced years an attachment that rests no longer on passion but on loyalty and understanding.

Pitfalls for High School Youths

BEGINNING in Springfield, Ill., an earnest and intelligent agitation concerning the moral conditions obtaining among young people of high school age has extended to Chicago and to hundreds of communities in the middle west. Superintendent Mortensen of Chicago's schools, has called public attention to certain social customs of boys and girls, some of which are plainly evil in themselves, and others as plainly on the road to evil. Sororities and fraternities, the dance, youthful liberties with the automobile, and certain types of games and entertainments—while the conditions complained of under these headings are pale as compared to the revelations of Hollywood, they ought to be shocking enough to the respectable fathers and mothers of immature youth. To subject adolescent character to the moral overstrain of such unhedged and unchaperoned customs is community purblindness. Whether the parenthood of Chicago really awakes to the gravity of the situation as a result of Superintendent Mortensen's warning statements remains to be seen. The chances, we take it, are that little or nothing will be done. There is no shrewdness in the superintendent's method. He merely talks, and talk on this theme has proved too many times to be incapable of quickening the public will. In Springfield, on the other hand, substantial progress is being made. There a small committee of women backed the superintendent's disclosures by working up mass meetings of parents, circulating petitions among prominent citizens and getting the endorsement of practically every commercial, social and literary club, the churches, and other groups representing centers of public opinion, until the school authorities now have all the confidence they need to deal with the sororities and fraternities. Appropriate hours for children's parties and adequate chaperonage, together with a revised standard of decency in dancing indicate that the public mind is aroused. But best of all, parents are taking new heart to come again into the control of their children's out of school hours, and to exercise a moral leadership whose abandonment has become one of the most serious weaknesses of our social order.

Community Opinion and Adolescent Morality

S PORADIC but futile efforts to raise this question of youthful morality to a level of frank and fair discussion in the public mind have been many times made, but the peculiarly delicate considerations which inhere in it have operated to hush all alarmist voices. False civic pride in the public school system always rises up blindly and indignantly to deny assertions that the habits of local school children need specially to be looked into. It is very difficult to gain the support of the local press for a campaign which, if the suspicions of agitators were justified by discovered facts, would besmirch the community in the eyes of its neighbors. An even deeper instinct of inertia has been the attitude of parents whose faith in their own children's innocence and purity is excelled only by their desire to protect them from public scandal in case they should actually be involved in any "revelations." There is probably no more delicate and precarious "reform" in the catalogue than that which presupposes public interference with the moral deportment of youth. The assumption that the home alone has jurisdiction in this field has developed a laissez faire policy on the part of the community which is thoroughly vicious in view of the fact that so wide a zone of youthful activity centers in a social situation into which the home does not reach. The high school youth is betwixt and between. Neither child nor adult, he is in danger of being invested with a degree of moral liberty and responsibility which he is not able to bear. Unless the restraint of community opinion and discipline reaches into the social life of the public school, the moral effects of our system of coeducation are bound to be serious.

Does the Church Need a Library

IT is commonly assumed that the church does not need a library. Has not the public library come to fill the need in every community? Are not the public schools distributing books far better for the children than the old-time pious books that were distributed by the Sunday-school libraries? But there are some needs which are not met by the public library nor by the public school. The church is today ignorant of her own beliefs, because the significant religious books go into the libraries of ministers only. It is hardly fair to expect the public library to keep up fully with the books that are of greatest importance to the church, though many religious books of general appeal are bought by public libraries. A loan library would go a long way toward making evangelical Christians as well informed on religious matters as Christian Scientists have become through the Christian Science reading rooms. It is rather astonishing to find many quite up-to-date Sunday Schools without any equipment for the use of a teacher who suddenly faces an unanswerable question from her class. A good one-volume dictionary of the Bible and a one-volume dictionary of religion and ethics, like that new work by Shailer Mathews and Gerald Birney Smith, should certainly be found in the library of every Sunday-school. Why should not some of the standard pedagogical works for religious teachers be found there also for the convenience of the teachers? The missionary work of the church lags for the lack of accurate knowledge of fields. The church can hardly expect the public library to maintain from tax funds an up-to-the-minute library of Christian missions. This is the business of the church, and such books should be a part of the library of every local church. There seems to be a slackening recently in the emphasis upon the educational phases of the missionary propaganda in favor of the hot-house results of revivalistic preaching. This must pass. In the long run the church will carry on missions because it knows. A hundred dollars put into the right kind of books is a better investment for a church than a thousand dollars put into a new carpet.

The Churches and the Young People

SECTARIANISM must bear the blame for many conditions among American young people that are unhappy. There is no place where the young people of the community may come together in a religious way, and set up ideals and standards of conduct for which the group will stand. Denominational leaders long since thought it desirable to segregate the young people that they might be steeped in denominational dogma, and their societies mulcted for various petty little offerings for benevolent boards. The young people should have been canvassed for missionary support as members of the church and not as members of some society which is to pass out of their lives after awhile if they are to continue in their missionary loyalties. The short-sighted managers of the church never looked beyond their noses in this matter. Most of the young people of the churches these days are in the movie shows, dance halls, and in the parks rather than in any sort of church meeting. They have not responded to the denominationalized program. It is because of this that some of the gravest moral problems of our day have arisen. The dance is worse than it ever was. Even the Dancing Masters' Association seems appalled at the way dances are perverted and made to serve the lower passions. The improper dressing of the girls, the misuses of automobiles in secret liaisons, the late hours of most young couples and the development of the youthful bandit are all familiar signs of the times. Is it not time for the churches in every community to ask the question whether the older methods of organizing young people are not obsolete? The young people of the churches of a given city should have a common organization with branches in the local churches. This city-wide organization of young people would make it possible to get the expression of the herd instincts at times under other direction than that of the commercialized amusement organizations. Some day all recreation will be under the direction of the community rather than of a profit-making business corporation, but until then the church must by greater wisdom of organization make headway against the evils of this present dangerous time.

Our Social Bloc System

AMERICAN society deals unfairly by the farmer. He clamors for his rights, and—to use words the President employed for a different purpose a while ago—by the Eternal, he proposes to get them. He has been too long conscious of this injustice not to be thoroughly sore. And society is now so alarmed by his clamor that he is at last in the way of getting what he is after, at least some of it. The Non-Partisan League of the Northwest may have failed, collapsed, been knocked in the head, been put out of business, but it threw a scare into the ranks of heretofore complacent bankers and millers and elevator operators and railroad managers who are charged with having ruthlessly exploited the farmer. The agricultural bloc in congress has made a good many people mad. They have said some very bad words about it. But it has made itself feared, at any rate. Big financial and industrial interests are afraid of the farmer. He is talking socialism and numerous other kinds of radicalism. He shows a disposition to act boldly enough upon his social "vagaries" to disturb the even balance of the economic status quo. At last a President puts himself and his administration on record as sponsor for certain specific measures for the relief of the farmer in market control, in credit, and in other phases of social status, not content with the time-honored vague compliments to the tiller of the soil as the savior of the nation and the bulwark of society. The farmer is fed up on compliments from men in positions of public influence; he is out now for his rights, for justice, for what he believes is properly coming to him.

Is not this familiar and characteristic American talk? That vocabulary has long been the common speech of the workingman in American industry. He has proved his case so fully that numerous statesmen, publicists and students of social problems, in no way identified with the workingman guild, speak the language with even greater fluency and eloquence than does the workingman himself. Society has been given clamant warning that labor must be accorded its rights.

Injustice to the farmer is in some respects more flagrant than that from which the artisan suffers. Why does society awake so tardily in his case? Plainly because he has not yelled so loud. He is too easy a mark.

Ergo: if you want your rights, yell for them. Make a fuss. Scare somebody. Build a fire under the dear public. This is a crude way of formulating a social philosophy which is soberly accepted, and, couched in less vulgar vocabulary, is offered as the permanent basis of social organization. Few who know the conditions under which the farmer and the workingman have been compelled to discharge their social mission will deny the injustice they have suffered, or will question the justice of their claims for redress. The laboring man is now suffering new indignities and deprivations for which not he, nearly so much as society at large, must yet pay dearly. The utmost the farmer is likely to gain, through all the present clamor in his behalf, will be but a palliative. It will not permanently cure the severe and multiplied social ills which flow from our false and unjust agrarian policy.

The very futility of the bloc and guild system adds new ground for the conviction in its disfavor which many social philosophers entertain on other grounds, fundamental grounds. Compelling the group to fight for its rights is a poor social program, and furnishes weak support for a civilization. This is true whether the groupings follow political or industrial or religious or any other social lines of cleavage. A society which permits and, indeed, deliberately orders its program after a fashion flagrantly to do injustice to certain social groups, cannot save its face before any one of those groups who rise up to vindicate their rights. But, all the same, such a society is in a bad way. It is good for neither the farmer, nor for the society of which he is a part, that he should cultivate the attitude of mind which prevails today in rural America. It is not good for the laboring man, nor for society, that American labor is in its present state of mind. Neither of them is the stuff out of which thoroughly good citizens are made. Neither can become and remain a thoroughly efficient community builder. It may be asserted that this state of mind, with all of its objectionable features, is preferable to a continuance of the flagrant injustice from which these two social groups have long suffered. But we should not allow our society to be forced into such a choice. Either horn of the dilemma impales precious social values. We ought not to be gored by either.

These are only two. There are other social groups already claiming only secondary consideration, and likely, with the opportunity, to thrust forward their claims to foremost recognition. Let them, says a certain school of social philosophy. The more the merrier, and the surer the survival of the fittest. Organize our social scheme on that basis. Do not outlaw or even rebuke the bloc, but organize more of them, and let it be generally understood that only those get what is coming to them who go after it. This philosophy seemed more cogent eight years ago than it does now. Thoughtful people are pretty sick of running a society on that basis. The plan simply carries over into the current processes of civilization the methods and ideals which, under the guidance of militaristic and imperialistic statesmanship, wrought what humanity has passed through during the years following 1918. The farmers are fighting, are cultivating the fighting spirit. No group ever took the field under such inspiration without committing grave excesses in the day of its triumph. American labor did that in the days of its power during and immediately following the world war. The north did it during the reconstruction days after the civil war. Germany did it in her victory over France in 1870. France is doing it now, with a high hand and with a lamentable vindictiveness against the foe which not she alone but others stronger than she helped to prostrate.

It only clouds the issue to point out that France suffered severely from an overbearing Germany from 1870 onward, that a Bismarckian policy was bred of bumptious Napoleonism, prior to 1870, that the south was wrong in attempting to secede from the union and nurse negro slavery, that injustice to the workingman and the farmer, has been notorious and outrageous. These are all facts. But not even such facts successfully gainsay the assertion that war is bad, and that class-conscious and embittered farmers and workingmen, fighting for their rights, are poor material out of which to make citizens of a democracy.

How long should oppressed social classes endure injustice? It would be ridiculous for classes preying upon them, rolling in luxuries bought at the expense of their too rigorous and unrequited toil, to press upon these the fine altruism of the Christian ethics. Should the oppressed endure once or seven times or seventy times seven? That may be a question for the oppressed himself to weigh very carefully. But it certainly would be an inglorious appeal in the mouth of the exploiting middleman or the domineering employer or the grasping stockholder. No, society cannot complacently throw an unjust burden upon this or that group, in a supercilious demand that it shall practice the forbearance recommended by the Christian ethics. But the implications of that ethics are sound. The clamor for rights finally defeats itself, in the sacrifice of the dearest social values, if not in the utter wrecking of society. There must be found a way around this disastrous dilemma. The farmer and workingman must be insured full justice. And he must not be compelled to fight for it till his spirit is embittered and he loses all sense of the universal brotherhood in a full democracy. All of us must care so much for the well-being of all to throw down the gauge of battle in his own behalf. A melee of contending blocs and guilds and embittered factions is not a civilization. It cannot even maintain the fearful truce of the jungle. In the end it is bound to create more and graver injustice than it corrects. The system breeds corruption and social inefficiency as the seed the plant. Guilds of laboring men whose highest ambitions are trained upon extracting the largest possible personal gain from their service, confirm in the industrial system just the dolessness and loafing and puttering and decadent craftsmanship which the critics of American labor have been given all too substantial ground for charging of late. Farming is not efficient. Taking the methods and programs of the American farmer by and large throughout the country, our agriculture is scandalously inefficient. The organization of a powerful congressional bloc and an unregulated agricultural guild, in full control of agricultural production and distribution, offers no assurance of the needed improvement. It rather promises a perpetuation of wasteful methods which have already brought agriculture into disrepute. The farmer needs the cooperation of his whole society, not arbitrary power to fend for himself. He needs recognition of his true place and service in a complete civilization, not the ability to turn on the screws until his oppressors shall themselves howl.

We are still fighting the war. The issues are shifting all the time. But war is on. Industry is war. Politics are a despicable scramble. Private gain is the end of prevalent industrial, political, social and even religious ambition. Of course a sectarian religious order has no redeeming message for such a day. It is itself black with the offending pitch. Its own methods and ideals are being tragically realized and practiced in other departments of the social order. It has done the work effectively; it has carried its message across; its inspirations have inspired. Quite too true! It, as well as the numerous social groups it has inoculated with its divisive, self-seeking spirit, needs now a gospel of real brotherhood, a sense of citizenship in a democracy, an inspiration to service which shall so fill each with zeal for the good of all that none shall find occasion nor shall desire to expand his energies in a strife for particular or class rights. It would be a good thing if we might try the gospel of Christ.

The Tin-Type Men

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I VISITED a Great City, even Washington. And I walked down the Front Steps of the Capitol, and I kept in the Middle of the Steps. And just outside the Gate, behold, two men with Tin-Type Cameras. And they cast one look at me, and went on talking to each other.

And as I walked along Pennsylvania Avenue, I said unto myself, Those fellows are swift and accurate Classifiers. They thrive on the men who come from the Back Counties, inviting them to have their Pictures taken with the Dome of the Capitol behind them, and they guarantee to finish the Picture and deliver it in a Mat and Frame in Ten Minutes, so they can take it home and exhibit it the whole length of Main Street. But when they looked at me, they knew I was not in that Class.

And I told it unto Keturah, saying, Behold, they knew when they saw me that I was no Rube. They beheld no hay in mine hair, neither was there milk on the toes of my sandals. They did not know that I was not a Senator or a Justice of the Supreme Court.

And Keturah said, I have visited the Senate and divers times, and once I looked in on the Supreme Court; and if thou hast any comfort in looking like a Senator, or a Justice of the Court, that is an inexpensive gratification, of which no one should seek to deprive thee.

And I said, O Keturah, I have told thee but the half. Behold, I went also to the White House, and there were the Newspaper Men with their Cameras, yea, and men from the Movies; and when I came away, they also looked on me and gave me no more attention than the Priest and the Levite gave unto the man by the Jericho road.

And Keturah said, Happy shouldest thou be. For if thou art no Yokel, neither art thou a Movie Star nor Representative of a Foreign Power endeavoring to insure the Peace of the World, but just a Respectable Elderly Citizen, who hath good right to walk down Pennsylvania Avenue in Either Direction, and attract no attention, save it be from a Taxi Driver.

And I was glad that I attracted no attention either from the Tin-Type men or the Movie Men, but was permitted to go about mine Own Business.

For whatever the advantages of life at either end of the Social Procession, there are marked advantages in being a citizen who can pass down Main Street or Pennsylvania Avenue and attract the attention neither of the Camera Men nor of the Detectives.

VERSE

Barnacles

“MY Soul is sailing through the sea,
But the Past is heavy and hindereth me,
The Past hath crusted and cumbrous shells
That hold the flesh of cold sea smell about my soul.

“The huge waves wash, the high waves roll,
Each barnacle clingeth and worketh dole
And nindereth me from sailing!

“Old Past, let go and drop i’ the sea
Till fathomless waters cover thee!
For I am living and thou art dead;

“Thou drawest back, I strive ahead the day to find.
Thy shells unbind! Night comes behind
I needs must hurry with the wind
And trim me best for sailing.”

SIDNEY LANIER.

A Creed

I DO believe
That, while in this old world few things are sure,
Right, truth, and love forevermore endure;
That these are 'mongst the things most worth our while —A song, a smile,
The wiping of a tear from eyes that grieve.

I do believe
That in the day of famine or of feast
That one is richest who has sought the least;
That, spite of all earth's woes, and tears, and pains,
Love is, and reigns;
And sunshine through the ages Time doth weave.

I do believe
God plants some seeds of gladness in each day,
And smiles on children happy at their play;
That living men, though paupers, churls, or slaves,
Are more than graves
To which the grass and mosses damply cleave.

Our Philosophers and the Mind of Jesus

By Edward Scribner Ames

IF ONE takes up a book on contemporary philosophy such as Professor Perry's "Present Philosophical Tendencies" there will be found beneath the difference in terms a surprising similarity with what is now seen to be the teaching of Jesus. The identity is not in the incidents mentioned nor in the form of words but in the general attitude toward life. To some readers this fact is at once evidence of the influence of the teachings of Jesus on our age. To others it is convincing proof that philosophy has so defined and shaped the course of thought that it has created the medium through which historical Christianity is interpreted. In any case the identity is a fact, and for one interested in both philosophy and religion it is a very arresting fact.

The first great similarity is the empirical procedure. Modern philosophy in all its schools adopts the scientific, experimental method. Since Descartes it has stressed the necessity of dealing with reality at first hand. The reaction from scholasticism discredited its bookishness and its formal dialectics. Francis Bacon eloquently voiced this discontent with the past and became the apostle of experimentation and of the invasion of new fields of natural phenomena. The development of philosophy since Bacon's time has been in the direction of his vision. It has learned the spirit of science and has sought to keep close to facts and to experience. A new logic has been developed which sets forth the methodology of the sciences. It is no longer concerned with the deductive procedure of the old syllogistic reasoning but analyzes and formulates the processes by which knowledge and imagination enter into the formation of creative judgments and working hypotheses. The processes of observation, classification, invention of hypotheses and critical verification are all involved in the widening of the world of action through reflective thought. They are the processes by which the mind of man has made the revolutionary discoveries of the last three hundred years.

THE EMPIRICAL METHOD

Philosophy also uses this empirical method in sketching its picture of the world as a whole. It employs the results of the various natural and social sciences to make its interpretation of the reality and meaning of life in its larger aspects. The urgent problem of the place and importance of moral values in the world is also dealt with by this empirical method. Wide surveys of the various stages of social evolution have been made as a basis for the comparison of different mores. What is called civilization is distinguished from cruder types of life by the use of better tools, more elaborate social organization, permanent records, more varied arts, and more effective control of the forces of nature in the service of man. Men come to cherish more refined and more elaborate moral ideals and they eagerly inquire what fate may be cherished for these ideals in such a world as this. The mind of man, freed from ages of superstition and external authority, grapples with these vast problems undaunted and unafraid, seeking no special revelations, refusing to forego inquiry in any sphere of experience.

In passing it may be said that this appreciation and use of the scientific method is not "rationalism." Rationalism in the proper use of the term designates a type of thought which was especially prevalent in the eighteenth century. It held to a faculty of "reason" in man and greatly exaggerated the place and function of logical proof and demonstrative certainty. It minimized the importance of feeling and instinct, of habit and custom. The phenomena of the subconscious and of suggestion were not understood. Rationalism was unable to attach sufficient importance to sense-perception and to the tentative procedure and conclusions which characterize the empirical sciences. The constructive value of the trial and error method could not be appreciated by those who looked for absolute truth in the form of mathematical postulates or of indubitable intuitions. Wherever modern science and "rationalism" are identified there is inexcusable confusion if not misrepresentation.

JESUS APPEALED TO LIFE

Jesus was empirical in his thinking. He did not use the phrases of philosophy but he employed the method of dealing with facts and basing his observations upon the realities of actual experience. He rejected the claims of mere tradition no matter how ancient or honored. He ventured to say, "It hath been said by them of old time but I say unto you." Nor was this just the substitution of one kind of authority for another. Jesus made it clear that he appealed to life and not to books. His parables are the reflection of life as the people lived it and they recognized that his teaching was entirely different from the teaching of the scribes and the expounders of the inherited tradition.

Jesus urged his disciples to know the truth and thereby to gain freedom. He enjoined them to call no man master. "Wisdom is justified of her children." It does not require any special authority or signature to make it valid. He expounded the law of cause and effect in terms of seed and fruit. "By their fruit ye shall know them." You can judge grapes and thorns through observation and the same principle applies to teachers of morals and religion. Prophets are found to be false or true not by their claims or dress but by the justification of their teachings in the searching test of experience. Both science and the teaching of Jesus respect facts and events in the order of nature. Jesus had the utmost confidence in this empirical procedure. He declared that whoever built upon this foundation would have an enduring house which the winds of controversy and the storms of doubt could not shake nor undermine. There is here the same quiet confidence which the scientist enjoys. He believes in the uniformity of nature, in the sequence of events by dependable laws and in the possibility of securing an increasing knowledge and control of those laws.

Another quality of modern thought which is also characteristic of Christianity is the emphasis upon practical achievement. It is often referred to as emphasis upon the will rather than upon the intellect. It is surprising to see with what unanimity present day thinkers are stressing the volitional attitude as the more natural and primary and fruitful. "Arm-chair" philosophies are discredited and so are theoretical dogmas and out-worn creeds. The old deductive logic and a priori method and the rationalistic form of proof are all discarded. They have no standing among the leading minds of either science or religion. Francis Bacon proclaimed the hopes of the new learning and its practicality. His great word was: "Knowledge is power." One objection he laid against the scholastic learning was that it did not yield power. It was "delicate," and "barren." The new knowledge yields the secrets of nature and enables man to control her great forces with foresight and precision. In his "New Atlantis" is set forth with vivid and expectant imagination the marvels which could be looked for from this practical application of science. More and more the physical sciences have justified that dream and for three hundred years these prophecies have been receiving fulfillment.

WILL AND INTELLECT

Modern philosophy stands in the closest possible relation to the sciences particularly with reference to the method which it employs. One of the distinctions between science and philosophy is that each science deals with a limited field of phenomena and is in so far partial in its scope. Philosophy, however, seeks to deal with the whole, with the totality, with the universe and its essential nature. But in making its estimate of the whole, philosophy aims to employ the conclusions of the different sciences rather than to depend upon theoretical speculations. Consequently modern philosophy has an intimate relation with the factual and the practical. Philosophy has always been supposed to develop in her devotees discrimination and discernment, self-restraint and a somewhat stoical endurance of the shifts of fortune. It is thus a practical guide in the conduct of life. To have a philosophy is to have worked out some conception of the relative value of different forms of behavior and to have a sense of the relation of one's own view to other differing and contrasting views. It is therefore not difficult to understand why philosophers are so much occupied with problems of education, social philosophy, and ethical idealism. In several modern systems it is definitely held that the intellect is the servant of the will, that the mind labors in the interest of the desires and aids their fulfillment. Thoughtfulness springs from the conflicts of action and seeks to smooth the way for fuller action again.

JESUS A BEHAVIORIST

In this respect, too, the teaching of Jesus is surprisingly in accord with the dominant tone of present-day reflective thought. A man in prayer is not heard for his much speaking, according to Jesus. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven."

There is one passage which sounds so much like a modern behaviorist or pragmatist or voluntarist that its very appositeness almost makes one wonder if it could have been meant as it reads. This is the statement which Jesus made when his critics were questioning the validity of his teaching. He insisted, "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine" whether it be true. It is one of the cardinal principles of education that we learn by doing. Experience is the great teacher. Even the refinements of theoretical knowledge develop best in connection with practical activity. Laboratories and experiment stations are agencies through which action sets the conditions for knowing and also furnishes the means for testing and verification. Jesus conceives the relation of thought and action much in the manner of the modern psychologist. He does not sharply separate the thought of the heart and the overt deed. In fact, he cut the knot of many sophistries when he insisted that the lustful thought was of the same nature as the lustful act, that covetousness was as reprehensible as theft and that love as an active attitude of will was the fulfillment of the law.

A third common interest of modern philosophy and the religion of Jesus is their humanitarianism. Jesus proclaimed the primacy of human life above all cults and institutions. The Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath. The poor publican had more favor in the eyes of God than the meticulous Pharisee. Lazarus was not to be judged by his poverty or his repulsive sores. The fine linen and the sumptuous fare of the rich man could not disguise his emptiness of soul nor weight the balances of the great Judge. In the parable of the last judgment, Jesus identified himself with all human beings so that whoever gives shelter or bread or clothing or a friendly visit to the sick and imprisoned ministers to Christ himself. The thief on the cross, the woman of the street, the prodigal son may obtain forgiveness and attain paradise. In the course of history great social reforms and humanitarian causes have felt themselves to be the embodiment of his gospel. The abolition of slavery, the emancipation of woman, the reform of prisons, of poor laws, of education, the destruction of the saloon and the opium den are felt to be steps in the triumph of the spirit of Christ. Human values are supreme in the teaching of Jesus.

IMPORTANCE OF THE INDIVIDUAL

The humanitarianism of the philosophers since Descartes has been dominant and universal. Descartes, often called the father of modern philosophy, began with the conception of the central importance of the individual. From the self, as the one thing of indubitable and absolute reality and importance, he proceeded to validate the world and God. He focussed attention upon the individual as of supreme moment and conceived it to be the task of thought to begin with the ego and to interpret everything through it. In Spinoza's thought the intellectual love of God was the supreme ideal and it involved a transformation within the individual by which the life of desire and emotion should be subordinated to the true life of the soul. That true life consisted in the exercise of pure thought, the principle of the divine reason within man. In quite other terms but with a meaning not so remote Rousseau proclaimed the value of the common man. He looked upon the conventions of society as departures from the original state of nature. In a life according to nature there would not exist all the artificial distinctions of class and rank and social inequalities. The very titles of the great philosophical classics reveal the dominance of the human problem. They were all concerned to analyze the nature of the mind of man and to discover his relation to the order of the world. Locke wrote "The Essay Concerning the Human Understanding"; Berkeley, "The Principles of Human Knowledge"; Hume, the "Treatise on Human Nature"; and Kant created an epoch in philosophy by his "Critique of Pure Reason." All had ultimate reference to the conduct of life. Kant in his ethics found the supreme fact to be the presence of the moral law in all men of every rank and station. The supreme moral obligation is obedience to this law. This obedience is the condition of the realization of a "kingdom of ends," a society of good will, in which each person treats every other as an end withal, and never as a means only.

HUMANITARIAN IDEALS

This recognition of the chief interest of life as centering in man and in the fulfillment of human potentialities through social relationships led the philosophers of the last century to support by their interpretations and personal influence many practical enterprises for the realization of such ideals. The close relation between T. H. Green and Toynbee Hall illustrates the attitude of the whole idealistic movement in England. The Cairds, Bosanquet, MacKenzie and others of this school identified themselves with various experiments in the direction of the practical application of their philosophy. The utilitarians, though proceeding from different premises, nevertheless agreed that humanitarian reforms were the proper concern of sound philosophy. John Stuart Mill not only championed utilitarianism, which he defined as the greatest good of the greatest number, but he applied it in the advocacy of the cause of representative government, the labor movement, woman suffrage and other reforms. He conceived utilitarianism as including a program for the abolition of poverty, ignorance, crime and disease and all that destroys human happiness. Herbert Spencer gave a wider perspective to the conception of social-ethical questions by putting them into an evolutionary setting. He gave new emphasis to the idea that a philosophy of social welfare and of its progressive achievement is itself a very important aid in the achievement of social progress. The idea creates new hopes and furthers its own realization. In America the leaders in philosophy for a generation have magnified these humanitarian ideals. Royce and James and Dewey, each with his own approach, have fixed attention on the nature, education and enrichment of human life. The great work of Royce was "The World and the Individual"; of James, his "Psychology," an epoch making analysis of mind and its functions; of Dewey, "Democracy and Education," to which he is constantly adding important writings on social philosophy and ethics.

A fourth characteristic of modern philosophical thought is also prominent in the religion of Jesus, that is its idealistic optimism. Belief in progress is a clear mood and a deep conviction of modern philosophy as it was of early Christianity. With the philosophers it is a cautious and critical hope. With Jesus it was a buoyant, spontaneous faith. In both ways of thinking the possibility of progress lies ultimately in the possibility of changing human nature. A recent book by Professor Hocking of Harvard is entitled "Human Nature and Its Remaking." He shows how transformation takes place through modification of the natural impulses, the unfolding of new traits and the cultivation of selected ideals. Social psychology, which is promising a better understanding of all kinds of human motives, values and modes of behavior already reveals widespread changes in the mores and folk-ways of the race. It is not a forced conclusion that where such great and often rapid changes have occurred through unperceived and unconscious influences, it is possible to deliberately and effectively modify interests and modes of behavior through education and changing environment. The "creative intelligence" of mankind is just beginning to deal with human nature itself with scientific understanding and efficient skill. Not only does the conception of a better human life in small groups find champions among the wise men but there dawns upon their thought a fairer vision than men have ever had before of the possibility of creating a world society in which all peoples of the earth shall share.

THE DREAM OF JESUS

Everyone knows that these were the very dreams of Jesus. His main idea was that of the kingdom of heaven. That kingdom was first something within the heart but it was also imagined by him as extending to the whole world. He told his disciples that there were other sheep beyond their own fold which would be included. The kingdom is like leaven which spreads. It is like a little grain of mustard seed which grows astonishingly. And the method of this development is through changing the will and the purposes of the individual. He can be converted. He can repent. He can cultivate faith in better and nobler ideals. A little of that faith will remove mountains of selfishness and sin. He believed in the possibilities of human nature. There is little or nothing in his teaching to justify the common idea that man is sinful by nature and that he inclines more easily to the evil than to the good. The altruistic, social attitudes are just as deep seated in our animal and human nature as the selfish and egoistical. The mother cat will save her kitten from the burning barn with self-sacrificing devotion although she has the greatest fear and aversion for the fire and the pain. Loyalty to the group is the commonest trait of the savage. For its safety and success he readily gives his life.

The tender regard of Jesus for little children and his reference to their teachableness as that which admits anyone to the kingdom of heaven is evidence of his estimate of them. They did not need any religious ceremony to free them from original sin. Jesus evidently believed in natural goodness and the possibility of its cultivation into mature and stable character. On one occasion he said to the Jews who opposed him, "Why do ye not of your own selves judge righteous judgment?" To ask his enemies such a question implies the ability on their part, "unregenerate" though they be, to reach right conclusions. It is the challenge to fair play, to an impartial view of the facts.

KINSHIP TO SPIRIT

Jesus was no pessimist. Nor is there a pessimistic system of philosophy in contemporary thought. His religion and the dominant spirit of our reflective life are idealistic and forward looking. Both look upon the things which exist and regard them as capable of improvement. Both have the temper of youth, of adventure upon great undertakings, of confidence in the power of good-will, and intelligent effort. Both trust in the strength of collective experience and in the ideals of the emancipated common will.

The summary of these coincidences and identities of the minds of Jesus and of contemporaneous philosophers is likely to surprise and stir the souls of those who think of them for the first time. The popular mind has too long been victimized by those in the fields both of religion and philosophy who have magnified differences and kept the two interests as far apart as possible. But as the procedure of modern science and philosophy becomes more firmly established, and as the teaching and spirit of Jesus emerge into the brighter light of critical knowledge, the facts speak for themselves. Both are experimental. They reject external authority and rely upon criticized, enlarging experience.

Both are practical. They refuse to be enticed into the barren abstractions of verbal discussions and fruitless speculation. Both are humanitarian. They recognize that a man is worth more than a sheep. They believe in the possibility of improving human life through knowledge and love and service. Both are therefore optimistic. It is not an easy, smug optimism but an athletic, discerning, adventurous faith in melioristic, cooperative, social progress.

These are marvellously significant facts. For the first time in human history a sane, practical, vital religious faith finds itself in league through all its profoundest attitudes with the free intelligence of mankind guided by the technique and productivity of genuine scientific method. Religion, without science, has often ended in sterile ceremonialism or arid sentimentality. Science, without urgent spiritual values, threatens to become merely an ingenious instrument for any conceivable purpose whatever. Many regard the great war as an appalling illustration of what can happen when science is enlisted in the service of inadequate ideals. But when the simple, human faith of Jesus and the sophisticated intelligence of mankind discover their essential kinship and the possible multiplication of power through their conscious cooperation a new and unimagined era of human history will dawn.

Dives Turns Philosopher

By Harry F. Ward

ONE of the tribe tried it once before, you remember, and in the judgment of Jesus did but prove himself a fool. So far no court of competent jurisdiction has been found willing to reverse that decision. But it is a changed and mayhap a wiser Dives who now speaks to us. He knows few days of ease and no nights of revelry. His portion is hard work and simple living, save for an occasional business banquet. At his gate no Lazarus lies unheeded and untended. His philanthropy reaches even to the ends of the earth and his expensive time is lavishly given to some individual need that reaches his attention through personal business or church connections. Also Dives is now devout. Many memorial institutions of religion bear his tribal name, and there is no more zealous defender of traditional doctrine. But in the main matter he has not changed. His chief concern is still with this world's goods. Only his present problem is not the enjoyment of his surplus but its investment. Therefore his current attempt at philosophy has to do with power, not pleasure.

Moreover Dives has flourished like a green bay tree from the nourishment of ever expanding markets and mass machine production. Likewise the corporation and the stock market have helped him to multiply and to occupy the land. By the aid of these devices he has become a goodly company, with a host of wistful followers eagerly accenting his leadership and waiting the first opportunity to become a blood brother of the tribe. So it is a corporate Dives who now speaks to us through a chosen representative, who had best be viewed impersonally, for the significance of his words lies in the fact that he speaks for many. His voice is the voice of invested capital, for the most part.

THE CORE OF CORPORATE PHILOSOPHY

Consider then the core of the philosophy of life of this corporate Dives revealed in these recent utterances.

"One lesson that capital has long ago learned, which labor is learning today, is that it must take pot-luck with the times. . . Learning how to take pot-luck together, that is the biggest thing that can possibly be accomplished by both."

"They (the security holders) properly may and ultimately will dictate the personnel, the governing rules—rates of compensation to employes—and all other matters pertaining to the properties and business and management of the corporation. . . They are entitled not only to a fair and reasonable return on their investments, but to all the net proceeds of the business. . ."

"Money is just as important as it ever was. Without it nothing can be done for anyone or for any country. Remarks from the lips of man, especially from those who know nothing concerning their subject, amount to comparatively little. Money talks louder and more effectively than anything else."

Not so simple this as the crude social philosophy of those earlier members of the tribe whose account with life was so summarily balanced by Jesus, for power is more complex than pleasure. Yet in the course of history those who have chosen to follow the Galilean in proclaiming the gospel of God to mankind have had some reckoning with the philosophy of the rightfulness of might. How now does it look to them when it appears in terms of the acquisitive society? The matter stands for judgment. Are these sayings of Dives the words of wisdom; or are they but the latest masquerade of ancient folly?

"Potluck together with the times!" This sounds like an expression of the New Testament spirit of sharing. Maybe Dives has absorbed more than beneficence from his pastors. His utterance was such a compliment to the effectiveness of preaching that most of us accepted the statement at its face value and Dives thereby accomplished his purpose, which was to secure moral sanction for a general reduction of wages. Down they went, and down they are still going, in most cases without any relation to the standard of living, in some cases far below the possibility of a decent standard of family life. "Liquidation of war-time labor," the technical apologists called it. Such was the moral authority of the fair sounding generalization invoked by Dives as it reverberated through the land in the varied reiteration of a million printing presses that few stopped to ask for all the facts in the case concerning the respective shares of capital and labor in war profits, and fewer still to raise the previous question of what a general reduction of wages meant in social consequences as against what it would mean if the balloon of war finance were deflated at the expense of Dives. The policy of wage reduction was approved as just and fair by all "right-minded" people. If organized labor resisted it was demonstrably a public menace, if it objected plainly it was hoggish. Of course labor should be willing to take pot-luck with the times as capital does. Who dare dispute it?

AS CAPITAL DOES

As capital does? "Aye there's the rub." For Dives has come to his present place and power by discovering a way of taking pot-luck with the times that avoids hardship. He has learned to do with money what Joseph taught the Egyptians to do with corn. Indeed he has improved the method by making the fat years provide him with interest for capital that never existed, so that the average earnings of his watered stock over a period that includes the lean years are sufficient to turn the water into gold through the value it thus acquires. By this and other equally efficient devices Dives has stabilized his power, so that his capital suffers no periods of unemployment while labor walks the streets looking for work. Thus by and large he has taken out of the basic industries more than they ever cost him, yet still owns them, and operates them in such fashion that they provide his tribe with increased luxury even in the days of depression. Having thus depleted the pot of productive industry to provide for his permanent security Dives now generously invites labor to take a lower standard of living on the ground that capital must be content with lowered returns, a phenomenon which is not only illusory because of its transitory nature, but which completely disappears when the situation is viewed as a whole.

In the main, there has yet been no diminution of luxury but a marked fall in the well being of the wage workers. The lavish wealth of certain sections of our cities still amazes travellers from impoverished Europe, while labor and the farmers tighten their bolts, and an unnumbered multitude knows not where the next meal or bed is to be found. Of course some of the Dives family lost money, and more will, but this does not affect the main facts that productive labor is enduring hardship while invested capital has acquired and is acquiring still larger possessions, and with them claims upon future production. A competent economist estimates that eight billions of new capital was accumulated in this country in 1921, and that six billions of it is held by Dives. This was done while Dives was persuading us that a reduction of wages was not only necessary but also just. Here is a large, solid, cold fact to be examined now that the warm glow generated by his unanimous sentiment has subsided. Looking all round that fact it appears that what most of the followers of Jesus accepted as just and fair turns out to be a stupendous piece of exploitation. Verily, "by their fruits ye shall know them!"

DIVES AND JESUS

To denounce now as monstrous the proceeding which formerly received our sanction is of little avail. What was done with our approval goes on being done despite our denunciation, and for the most part automatically. That is the way the financial machinery of Dives works and the reason he has been able to secure our assent to its justice (of which he has convinced himself) is because we have not known nor understood the facts in the case. True we have trained men in Christian colleges to handle these facts, but seldom have they been instructed as to their human meaning. They have been allowed to accept the world of Dives as the inevitable, permanent order in one set of relationships, even though they have accepted the world of Jesus in another set of relationships. Some who have thought to compare these two have found that such knowledge does not easily educate a family in the world where Dives rules. Is it not then time for the church to make place for such men among its ministry, as an order of skilled teachers, that the world be not destroyed by the deceitfulness of riches.

Meantime will the messengers of the Gospel of God declare themselves concerning the social morality of Dives, by which he justifies grinding still further the face of the poor? Will they make it clear that what has fooled the workers into accepting lowered wages, and the government into reducing taxes on great wealth, and the rich into thinking themselves public benefactors, cannot possibly fool God. Simply and clearly, so that the common people can hear and understand, will they say to Dives and all the would-be Diveses, that we are living in the kind of universe where his policy and its results cannot possibly endure. For that assertion they have proof in plenty now piling up. The reduced wageworkers cannot buy, the farmers cannot sell, and they in turn cannot buy from the factories, so all the wheels of the interlocking economic machine slow up and many of them stop. Dividends are passed and banks are in trouble. Dives is amazingly clever but he forgot what simple folk long since taught their children about the goose that lays the golden eggs, forgot also some words of deeper wisdom: "Be not deceived, God is not mocked." Viewed in its larger aspects what was done because it was immediately profitable by men the world counts wise turns out to be economic imbecility, and even from the standpoint of his own self interest Dives once more proves himself a blundering fool.

POWER AND PROCEEDS

Concerning his other maxims there will be no confusion or hesitation for the followers of Jesus. All power to the owners of capital and to them all the net proceeds? Why of course that is folly, just as ridiculous as the dictatorship of the proletariat. Do not an enlarging company of employers believe in some form of employees' representation and some kind and degree of profit-sharing? Has not the church declared for the development of industrial democracy as one practical expression of the principles of the gospel? The man who thinks he can establish the empire of finance in these latter days is worse than foolish; he is crazy, you say. But softly! This corporate Dives of ours does not stop to think of the absurdity of such a thing; he proceeds to do it. His crude philosophy of power is infectious because it is manifestly the crystalization of his accomplishments. He has destroyed all labor organization in the industries he directly controls, and against all others he has inspired a nation wide campaign for which he has elicited almost as much general approval as for his reduction of wages. He successfully defied the government of the United States in wartime by refusing to cooperate in its labor policy; with equal success he uses its courts to evade that policy in peace time, or to aid him in the ruthless repression of the right of labor to organize or even to exercise its constitutional guarantees of freedom of assemblage. He has even silenced those in his own house who do not support his doctrine and practice of power. Just now Dives may well be a little pleased with himself. He has gone a long way toward the dictatorship of the plutocracy.

Upon some of his methods the churches have declared judgment with precision, and without fear or favor, but they have not yet made the people of the country understand that his main policies are folly. Is it because they have not joined the issue at the right point? Have they been assaulting outposts with skirmishing parties instead of attacking the main position with all their forces? They have said some effective things about the way Dives plays the game but have they said enough about the game itself, and its goal? Do they think it sufficient that some of the rules of the game be amended a little because at their solicitation Dives has promised to amend them? Is this where the matter halts? Does Dives go on strengthening his power and preparing for our civilization the inevitable ruin that waits upon tyranny because we thought to change his ways and did not see that it is his nature that must be transformed?

The present nature of Dives and his motive is clearly revealed in the last of his current maxims: "Money talks louder and more effectively than anything else. Words, mere words, amount to comparatively little." There is no danger of the pulpit delaying to declare this one of the oldest of follies, and proving it too up to the hilt. But our professional interest in the value of words must not blind us to the fact that fool's patter though it may be nevertheless Dives makes it go. The plain fact is that money does talk at times louder and at times more effectively than anything else, in church as well as in state, though usually its effectiveness is in inverse proportion to its loudness. It talked effectively enough to make both parties promise in the last campaign to take the burden of taxation off the rich and put it on the people of moderate income. It talks effectively enough to make the ecclesiastical conscience very tender about being unfair to capital. Just how effectively it can talk we shall know when a situation arises that demands a successor to the steel strike report. It is just now talking loud enough to justify and sanctify legally and morally the millions created out of the war and thus, as Keynes points out, is hastening the day of its ultimate confiscation. That day will be neither pleasant nor profitable for any of us, yet it is an inevitable day unless the motivation of our acquisitive society is changed.

MONEY'S LOUD TALK

The plain fact to be faced is that Dives has but uttered the accepted maxim of our money grubbing times. With most people money does talk. They want the ease and power that it brings more than they want the Kingdom of God and its righteousness. Dives is simply the fruition of the acquisitive society, the bearer of its banner, the voice of its will. As long as we pay him the deference and wait upon his counsels for the promotion and incidentally the commercializing of church enterprise the truth of this matter will be obscured. As long as the church shares the current bondage to things it will lack the penetration of him who looked upon the Dives of other days and declared him a simpleton.

Yet there are in the pulpits of this land no small company of free souls to whom it is clear that the widely accepted philosophy of Dives is but piling up for humanity wrath against the day of wrath, who see that the acquisitive society is building its house upon the sands. That the acquisitive motive is fouling all the springs of life; that it is destroying the will to work, killing the instinct of craftsmanship and strangling the spirit of service; that it is breeding antagonism, raising hate, and scattering the seeds of war, is known to every thoughtful man. Then is it not high time, amid all the talk of reform and progress, for the men who know these things to stand up and tell this hydra-headed modern Dives that the day of his worldly wisdom is far spent and with eventide comes the voice of God: "Thou fool, this night thy soul is required of thee!" For unless ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

The Coin

INTO my heart's treasury
I slipped a coin
That time cannot take
Nor a thief purloin—
Oh better than the minting
Of a gold-crowned king
Is the safe-kept memory
Of a lovely thing.

SARA TEASDALE.

The Glass of Fashion

By Alvin E. Magary

“PROFESSING themselves to be wise, they became fools.” That is the Apostle Paul’s idea of what happened to the pagan, dissolute society of ancient Rome. It is also the idea of “The Gentleman with the Duster,” of what is happening in modern England. And it is the idea of not a few thoughtful people of what is happening in America.

Who this gentleman with the duster may be, we do not know. He wrote the “Mirrors of Downing Street,” and followed that volume with the book I am discussing, “The Glass of Fashion.” I have heard it said that he was Mr. Harold Begbie; I am inclined to dismiss that idea. He may be Mr. Keynes, author of “The Economic Consequences of the Peace” or one of the brothers Strachey, or, possibly, a dignitary of the Anglican church. It does not matter. What does matter a great deal is that he has written a book about English society that is full of suggestion for us here in America. The things which have seemed to him to be threatening the vitality of social life in the politico-aristocratic circles of London are the very things about which careful-minded neighbors talk with serious concern when they discuss the life of their own community.

FOLLY, NOT VICE

“The object of this book,” he says, “is to convince people of two truths hitherto obscured by tolerance and careless thinking—the danger of folly and the value to a liberal state of a valid aristocracy.” “Folly, not vice, is the enemy. Our curse is not original sin, but original stupidity.” We have no established aristocracy in this part of the world, but we do have men and women who, by reason of their position, commanding means, having time and inclination for leadership, conducting large business interests, or for any one of a dozen other reasons, are leaders among us. A large percentage of you who will read this are of this class, men of business and professional life, regarded as successful and emulated by those who wish to be successful; and women with the influence and opportunity that culture and comfortable incomes secure. If there is anything wrong with the moral tone of America we ourselves are to blame. We cannot pass the responsibility on to others. When we read such a book as this, then, let us not sigh and remark on the sins of hereditary foreign privilegeers; let us rather consider whether we are profitable citizens here in our republic.

Folly, not vice, is the curse. Some of us have read that remarkable and slightly nauseating self-revelation, the autobiography of Mrs. Asquith, who is now in this country. We have wondered at this woman of near sixty, wife of a former prime minister of England, who publishes the details of her early love affairs, how she explained matters to her husband’s first wife, quotes letters she received when her baby died, informs the world concerning her husband’s devotional habits, and retails details of her various confinements. How can a woman of her sharp intelligence be betrayed into such vulgarity? Simply by the self-deluding life she has lived. “Conceiving themselves to be clever they became fools.” Writing of her this author says, “She is the more deadly foe to traditions because her attack is not aimed at the primitive virtues of humanity. . . she is a devoted wife, an exemplary mother, and she believes in God . . . Her attack is the more fatal because it is aimed from the cherished center of domestic life. . . . She breaks no commandments but will not keep them within the bounds of decency. . . . She is not evil, she is not base, she is by no means without good qualities. But how disastrously she has lost her way! Observe that she does not know when she offends good taste. She is terribly immodest without being aware of it.”

Now let me say this, very deliberately, as an expression of calm judgment: There are people in every city, in our own social circles, who are to be described in exactly those terms. They are not evil, they are not base; but their influence on the life of the community is wholly bad. They are pitifully unaware of the unworthiness of their own lives and they are terribly potent in leading the unwary into their own vain ways. They think they are clever, but they are fools. They mistake vulgarity for vivacity. They break down habits and conventions which are the safeguards of civilization. They are proud of their ignorance of those things which their fathers regarded as the most precious possessions of the human mind. They are restless and they crave excitement. When they read, they read not the thoughtful, which captivates the mind; but the erotic, which titillates the appetite. They are far more the enemies of our country’s peace and welfare than the loudest-mouthed agitator that ever stood on a soap box.

You say there are but few such people? However many or few they may be, they have a place among us. They are among your neighbors and social acquaintances. You meet them constantly. You dine at their homes and they at yours. You meet them in business, on the boards and committees of charitable institutions, you may even meet them in church. They may not have come to the point of throwing aside all modesty and restraint, but they are on the way toward that very thing, and unless you are wary and courageous you will be infected with the poison that is so subtly destroying them.

THE CURSE OF CYNICISM

Along with the curse of folly there comes the curse of cynicism. This writer pays his respects to Colonel Repington, who has published his war-time diaries. Here is a born aristocrat, handsome of person and brilliant of intellect, a man not without industry, who rendered genuine service to his country during the war, yet a man whose life is frivolous at the core, a man who, believing himself to be clever, has manifestly become a fool. They who love folly must inevitably become fools. This man tells of his conversations, drinking tea with idle women while thousands of men were dying in France each day. He tells of parties where they enjoyed “a great rag”—referring to that quaint pastime in which women are chased about the house and clawed when they are caught until their clothing is half torn off.

"Mrs. Duggan," he says, "was in the most attractive widow's weeds imaginable . . . In fact, she looked like a fascinating nun." . . . And again, "Le Roy asked me the inevitable question about the end of the war and I said that I saw no reason why it should end until the Huns were more badly beaten. Since nations counted money no more than the pebbles on a beach and all would probably repudiate in one form or other at the end of the war, there seemed to be no reason for stopping, especially as so many people were growing rich by the war. The ladies liked being without their husbands, and all dreaded the settlement afterwards, industrial, political, financial, domestic."

This is a sample of the heartless, frivolous talk that went on. While boys were living in the filth of the trenches and dying amid the horrors of the battlefield, this man argues that it is just as well to go on fighting because in the end the nations can repudiate the debt in money, because war is profitable to the profiteer and because the ladies liked being without their husbands. When he sees a widow he sees, not a woman whose husband has offered his life for his country; he sees a woman who has been given an opportunity to dress "like a fascinating nun."

THE DANCE AND THE FUNERAL

I knew a man who came from Europe on a ship belonging to the government of the United States. In the hold of that ship were the bodies of hundreds of dead soldiers. Sunday morning came and a religious service was held in the salon, to the evident impatience of a number of the passengers. The moment the benediction was pronounced there was a rush, a rattle of jazz music and the dancing began. One might maintain that, logically, it is no worse to dance on Sunday than on any other day, or to dance on a funeral ship than on any other kind. It is not a matter of logic. One cannot argue a thing like this. It is a matter of insight, of decent feeling, of humanity. Colonel Repington, fastidious man that he probably is, yet does not see the vulgarity of his comments on a widow's weeds. Something fine is wanting in his mind. One feels that, if it amused him, he would do a hornpipe on the grave of his grandmother and convulse the crowd at the next Sunday ragging party at Lady So-and-so's, by telling about it.

A poem by Alfred Noyes published in the Saturday Evening Post during the war comes to mind. The poet imagines a crowd of these people dancing the hours away while their sons and brothers and neighbors are struggling with their country's enemies:

The cymbals crash and the dancers walk,
With long silk stockings and arms of chalk,
Butterfly skirts and white breasts bare
And the shadows of dead men watching 'em there.

Are there any such violations of fine feeling among us here in America? I think there are. Compare, for instance, the modern jazz wedding with the wedding of your mother. Of all the occasions of social life, surely a wedding should be the most beautiful, the tenderest and the most chaste. Yet it has become common for a wedding to be the occasion for a riot of senseless frivolity. Young people are gathered together from far and near and for days there is a succession of every kind of racket that the over-stimulated imaginations of young men and women can invent. A young man and young woman who have first embraced in a jungle-dance to the rhythm of music but one remove from savagery, proceed to a jazz courtship and end with a jazz wedding, with bachelor dinners from which young men must be carried home and with ushers befuddled in the aisles of the church. Compare this, I suggest, with the wedding of your mother and decide which kind of wedding your daughter shall have when the time comes for you to entrust her to some man's love.

MANNER AND DRESS

If you have daughters, consider this incident, related by Mrs. Asquith with evident relish. One night she attended the opera in Dresden and, during the evening, made eyes at a young officer in a white uniform. She was dressed, in accordance with her life-long purpose to be noticeable, in a scarlet dress. When she was on her way home, alone, she heard footfalls behind her and turned to discover the young officer following. He walked with her to her door and was dismayed to discover that she would not go with him to the private room of the hotel for supper. He had mistaken her for a woman of the demimonde, and when she is fifty-six years old she proclaims this triumph of her youth to the world!

If you have daughters, consider. There are young women in every city, daughters of people like you and me, who are so dressed and be-dolled that they could not walk down Broadway in New York or State street in Chicago without the same mistake being made a half dozen times in a city block. I am not speaking of the length or shortness of their dresses—a certain type of women produced the same effect when their skirts trailed to the ground. It is far more subtle than that. Every man knows exactly what is the difference between a smartly dressed woman and one immodestly dressed, though he may not be able to describe it. It is not a matter of inches so much as of intention. If you have daughters, consider this.

But you will ask, what can we do? The answer is, You can be right—clearly, insistently, aggressively right. You can refuse to degrade your own manners because your neighbors have degraded theirs. You can refuse to tolerate the loose practices that threaten to establish themselves among us. "Of all intellectual shallowness none is more disastrous to the higher life of the human race than that which ignores the attitude of men and women to the simplest questions of right and wrong." This writer turns his thought toward Russia and asks, "How are the few fanatical followers of Karl Marx able to hold millions of people in the iron grip of a despotism which crushes both soul and body? The answer is that the multitude composing the Russian empire long ago ceased to feel the infinite importance of moral ideas. Because there is no cleavage in their minds between right and wrong, there is now no vigorous public opinion, no moral force against which tyranny of any kind would oppose itself in vain. Russia has a thousand qualities which deserve the admiration of mankind, but lacking this one of moral earnestness, it is stricken with death." Social bolshevism is the forerunner of economic bolshevism. It happened in Rome; it happened in France; it happened in Russia; it will happen in America and England, unless the tide of destructive living is turned back.

WHAT CAN WE DO?

What can we do? We can assert with renewed power and conviction those principles of pure living which are woven into the fabric of Christ's teaching. We can insist on the recognition, in our own households, of simple human dignity. We can make those about us understand that we will have no traffic with the questionable. We can think more of others and less of ourselves and our pleasure. When you men feel that you must add to the natural pleasures of a game of golf the spice of the gambler's chance, when you play for piker's stakes in the presence of the small boys who carry your clubs, you become, in the effect you produce on that boy's sense of what is right, an enemy to the common good.

You can teach yourself and those about you how pleasant it is to live in the practice of the simple and unostentatious life. "Fashion," says this writer, "in degrading manners and morals has also degraded the happy playfulness of the human spirit. This is a matter for reflection. Life is no longer amusing. It is not vivacious, but noisy. There is no zest, no richness, no sparkle, no fire, no splendor . . . There are crazes instead of stability. There is a rush for excitement, a taste for cocktails and cocaine, a constant winding up of the brain to experience reaction. The whole secret of happiness, quietness at the center, is lost. The one great reward of existence, a sense of growth, is forgotten."

What can we do? Burne-Jones wrote to Mary Gladstone, "My dear, if twelve of these men would hold together for one ten years, the whole aspect of the world would be changed—and twelve men did hold together once and the whole aspect of the world was changed." If the nation is going wrong, it is because it is being led wrong. And the leadership rests with people like you and me, who wield a powerful influence within a small area. We cannot blame our own failure on statesmen or public teachers; we cannot drift idly in the current and talk about a want of leadership; we cannot rest the blame on that vague nonentity, "the times"; we are responsible for the influence of our own lives and we cannot evade that responsibility.

BEGIN AT HOME

Above all, we of the church must put our houses in order. If we have been drifting we must turn about and live resistantly. Live fish swim against the current; the dead float on the surface. We must rule our own houses, not in tyranny, but in love. And we must not be too cowardly to let our neighbors know what we believe and what we reject. "It is for those who hold that without faith in the immortality of man there can be no right thinking to assert that great faith with a crusading vigor, to assert it and reassert it, until humanity recovers its spiritual dignity and the long labors of evolution find at last their final impulse in conscious co-operation." "He who would save the human race from darkness must go back to the light of the world, not to assert the claims of theology, not to strengthen the hands of clericalism, but simply to make faith in a spiritual purpose the very breath of human existence." Or, as Paul expressed it, thinking of the tragic follies of pagan Rome, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation."

Mysticism and Adventure

By Arthur B. Patten

MYSTICISM is defined as "the doctrine that man may attain through contemplation and love to an immediate consciousness of God." So there will be various types of mysticism, depending upon the type of God whom we contemplate and love. If "our God is marching on," then our mysticism will be a communion with his adventuring will. But if our God is a great quiescence, then our mysticism will be only a pious meditation, without the romance of forth-putting love. To Jesus Christ God is the loving world-will of the kingdom of heaven, and mysticism is a creative communion. To Buddha (if there be a God) he is the eternal quietude and retirement of Nirvana, and mysticism is abstraction and absorption into his passionless rest. The Christian Paul found God by living and moving, and having his being in fighting the good fight of faith. Yet he was a mystic, for he contemplated and loved the immediate presence of God—albeit of the God whose will is found where he works rather than where he waits. The real Christian mystic finds and knows God by willing to do his will. That was the formula of Christ.

Medieval mysticism neglected the present creative will of God. It contemplated the works of God, but did not commune with his wonder working, creating power on every common day. Modern mysticism does not contemplate less, but it communes as well—with the dynamic will of God, whose creation groans and travails, awaiting the revealing of His cooperating sons. Medieval mysticism worshipped a God whose works were finished—a God who had gone way back and sat down. Modern mysticism worships a God who is going over the top today—the adventuring God of the new creation. Medieval mysticism was intuitive, but lacked initiative. Modern mysticism is not less intuitive, but the God whom it knows immediately is the God who is building a new world now. It is more interested in the God who is a foreground than in the God who is a background.

Then modern mysticism realizes that the devotional man is the whole man. The medieval type was fractional. It was marked by both partialism and pessimism. Its saints did not have to be citizens. Or if they were citizens, then their citizenship and their heaven were not of the same world. However, Paul was a mystic who could say, "Our citizenship is in heaven."

Shortly before his death, the late Dr. Peter Forsyth dropped a pregnant phrase, "Piety must not take the place of faith." Medieval mysticism was pious, but it had little creative faith. So it was doomed to "public impotence." Real Christian mysticism communes and cooperates with God's omnipotence today. So the modern mystic may be and must be a man of affairs, a man who finds the God of the heights in the high projects of civilization. He does not contemplate the God of the status quo, but communes with the God whose presence on earth is the power of adventuring righteousness and love. The true mystic is a citizen-saint. The place where he finds God supremely is where conscience grips some vital problem and love illuminates some new way of life—where "new occasions teach new duties."

Mysticism is said to be the poetry of religion, and it is.

But poetry is not all lyric. It is also epic and dramatic. The true mystic comes into tune with the infinite in all this range of inspiration, but more especially as he lives an epic life of personal achievement in harmony with the will of God, and a dramatic life of social attainment in contact with the interacting wills of his fellow men. If we imitate Christ, we shall extend the lyric range of mysticism to include the epic and the dramatic. Modern mysticism is to be the great dynamic of the democratic drama of America and the world. When we are vital enough as mystics to put God into all life, then the communion of saints will become the glory of the new citizenship.

What Happened at Washington?

THE full measure of what has happened at the armament conference cannot be taken accurately for many years to come. The most promising of diplomatic phrases can be easily twisted and "interpreted" by governments as new incidents arise. The Holy Alliance was very promising in its phraseology and the czar of Russia believed he had inaugurated an era of European peace. Yet we are able to say that the Washington conference has accomplished certain sure results. It has made possible the saving of billions of dollars in battleships within the next fifteen years, and the tax burdened nations of Europe needed that badly. In fact, the only government that could afford to build forty million dollar dreadnaughts was our own. But if we built them Japan must and Britain would. Winston Churchill pleaded last summer for a quarter billion naval building budget because of what we were proposing to spend. The cash saving is worth something just now but that does not, within itself, mean much for peace. Wars are not dependent upon the size of fighting ships.

The real gain in the "scrapping" program is in its moral significance. It is a victory over those disciples of force who plead that the way to prevent war is to prepare for it. President Harding confesses his conversion from force to the moral means of preventing war. It limits the possibility of wars of aggression, especially between America and Japan. However, unless a new era in international policy arrives within the period covered by the Washington treaties they will not mean much to Europe, whose nations are already limited by their war poverty. Britain does not fear any aggressor for the next decade or two, because her potential enemies are disabled; and her own disablement would inhibit any aggression against a first class power. But America and Japan are both in a position to fight, and the psychological factors were working to that end. The reduction of the resources of aggression plus the creation of a neutral zone "between the Pacific fortifications of the two nations is a great step toward peace. The effect will be to turn the minds of both nations away from the points of sensitiveness and friction and to reduce to a minimum those blind factors which make for war.

Peace and the Pacific

Some wise man once said that the Pacific would be the focal point of world problems for the next five hundred years, and a scholarly Japanese recently warned us that unless we found new ways for international understanding and relationship a "cultural war" between orient and occident was inevitable within a century. But the Pacific is not yet the storm center of the world. That doubtful honor still belongs to Europe, and there is no reason to expect that the storm center will be shifted for at least a quarter of a century. When the shift begins, it is quite as likely to move eastward through Russia as westward through America—indeed it is much more likely unless there is a radical change in Japanese attitude toward Siberia.

It was realized from the first that the success of the effort to limit armament depended upon a solution of the Pacific problems, and for that reason the Pacific issues were included in the call. It was popularly said that China was the key; it might quite as appropriately have been said that Japanese militarism was the bete noir. The success of the conference is measured more by what happened between China and Japan than in the scrapping of battleships. Certain naval experts said, in effect, "Let them scrap the dreadnaughts—they will not be used much in the next war anyhow." Admiral Sims' opinion, frankly spoken, lends confirmation to this judgment. The submarine is stoutly defended by Admiral Fulham, who also defends the use of poison gas. The conference put submarines under so-called "laws of war," but it banned poison gas. This, however, is nothing new. Gas and submarines have always been so classified, but in the late war both were used to the limit. Mr. Roosevelt used to insist that no law of war will work when the conflict is on. Germany justified every violation of the accepted laws of war had broken them first. An American state department official announced in 1917 that England had broken nearly every law of war. English military men pleaded Germany's overt acts as war. English military men pleaded Germany's overt acts as justification, and they no doubt had the better of the argument, but all this illustrates the impossibility of enforcing rules of war where there is no super-power to compel obedience. In the late war America's entrance was essentially the voluntary intrusion of such power, but unless there is some league or association, some organized embodiment of world opinion, the adoption of such rules will provide but the flimsiest security.

So what was done in the Pacific is the real register of progress toward peace. The step taken at the Washington conference is of course purely a diplomatic arrangement rather than the creation of any permanent assurance. Mr. Root's four points are little more than a formal reiteration of John Hay's open door doctrine; they add nothing substantially new to the understandings previously assented to and so flagrantly broken by Japan's twenty-one demands in 1915. But they do secure official confirmation of these previous understandings as a basis for future negotiation, and that is gain.

Japan and China

The fundamental thing involved in the far east is Japanese imperialism. From the old Realpolitick standpoint it has an adequate apologetic. Japan has done in China, Korea and Siberia just what European governments have been doing for more than a century, that is, she has annexed territory on the principle of national expansion for industry, commerce and trade. She began with a deliberately planned war upon China in 1894, creating a pliant attitude on all future questions. Possessing Port Arthur, preferential rights in Manchuria and Mongolia followed; Korea was conquered and assimilated politically. Sakhalin was secured and now eastern Siberia is occupied. Shantung was taken as a step in the policy of military penetration, Great Britain and France consenting to it in consideration of Japan's naval help in the time of their great emergency. For all this Japan is not to be condemned beyond others; the condemnation rests upon imperial policy. But Japan cannot maintain this policy at a time when the rest of the world is inclined to turn away from it or at least to modify it with definite turns toward peaceful as opposed to military penetration. In the light of this turn in policy Japan came off very well at the conference.

Before the Washington conference China was the door-mat of the imperial powers. She is now raised to the dignity of at least the doorkeeper of her own destiny. She is in the way of recovering Shantung again, though she must travel a thorny road before acquiring final title to her own. Japan renounces group five of the iniquitous twenty-one demands, but gives China a blank refusal to renounce the others, Japan is still in both Manchuria and Mongolia with a well fixed determination to stay. China gets Wei-Hai-Wei again, but England will watch her from Hong Kong and Japan from Mukden for a long time to come. She may get the removal of foreign post offices and legation troops, and the abolishment of the rights of extra-territoriality, and again she may not, for none of these are included in the treaties. Their only guarantee consists of pious gestures of intention. She is denied the right of fixing her own tariff though her right in this respect has been enlarged. Japan defeated a motion to inquire into concessions granted in the past, and the British government is today insisting that the national government validate a millionaire-making concession secured from a bandit chief who captured a province and gave away its riches to an English syndicate as a means of securing money for his own designs. Poor John Chinaman has troubles of his own in his effort to overturn thirty centuries of traditional exclusiveness and political apathy and become a free citizen of the modern world. He has gained much from the conference as a result of his great effort and the friendly offices of the United States, but there are still many cords of imperial interest bound about his limbs. On the whole we may say that there has been distinct gain, but we cannot affirm more than diplomatic gain in the relations of Japan and China. No epoch making constitution has resulted from the conference.

The Four-Power Pact may be gain or loss as the denouement alone will show. It may be defeated in the senate. There is strong argument to be made against it as a balance of power agreement. It is rather gratifying to find those who slaughtered the league of nations because of article ten now advocating this pact with its article two; article ten required unanimous agreement of all powers before there could be action—article two apparently leaves it possible for two or three to act without unanimous action. This pact may also make dealing with Japanese designs in the far east a much more delicate matter than if the three great interested powers were not in such an alliance.

The Conference and The League

President Harding frankly hoped that the conference would initiate his favored association of nations. It has not done so, though there is provision made for this country to call another conference after eight years. Meanwhile the league of nations disarmament commission will hold its postponed meeting in Paris on February 20. It was postponed because of the calling of the Washington conference. It may be said that President Harding took the agenda out of its hands, and that may be defended as wise because this country is not in the league and this country was needed to make any action meaningful at the present time.

Nothing done at Washington has any binding effect beyond the limits of whatever nations sign this or that treaty; the league will no doubt make the main gains of the conference effective for all nations. In that lies the strength of the league idea over against the limitations of the conference idea; the conference operates more easily because it calls into council only those nations directly interested and acts only on a few immediate things, but the league alone can give the moral backing of mankind and furnish that continuing administration without which the best made plans of diplomacy may be twisted and interpreted from things benign to things of evil. Every treaty passed at Washington will be registered with the league secretariat and none could be ratified by European governments if there were anything in them that contravened the league's covenant.

The league can call all the world, inside a decade, to make the limitation program permanent, and the recovery of Germany and Russia will make that imperative, if not in a single decade at least in time. Several commissions were appointed at Washington with no provision made for any reports to an authoritative body; the league will furnish the proper body to hear these reports. It will be in a position to carry the naval limitation program on into army limitation, once France is won from her militaristic policy, and she will be won ere long from such a policy either by England's influence or by a new election or by both. She was the "bad boy" of the conference, if such a mixing of metaphor will pass the type sticker, and Japan was a sympathizer throughout. One cannot shake off the feeling that there was more than bald lying in the charges of the eastern Siberian commission. Such attitudes make manifest the influences the conference had to work against and which the league will have to confront continuously.

On the whole the league is a distinct gainer from the conference, and that is one of the chief gains made. The league means conference, but conference made effective by the moral and legal backing of all the great governments of the world—if America will join it. We have moved in that direction in a way to save our political face, and time and the tides must carry us further until we are in a league even though it be a modified one. The Republican platform promised to "provide methods which shall secure instant international conference when ever peace shall be threatened by political action." The league is in being; fifty-one nations are in it; it is a going concern; it is not perfect but it will evolve a constitution as did the British kingdom and it, or its counterpart, alone can guarantee peace.

FOR youth the coming of winter has no terrors; but the aged know that it is a season which will exact a heavy toll from their ranks. Since my last letter we have lost a veteran traveler in Sir John Kirk, the friend of Livingstone and Lord Bryce, one of our noblest citizens; and though Pope Benedict was not old as these others were, he, too, had reached the age which cannot disregard the warnings of the cold season. But there is nothing for tears in the departure of such men as these. They have done their earthly task and earned their rest.

The News of the Pope's Death

Nothing can show the changed religious atmosphere in this country like the manner in which the news of the pope's death was received. Nothing but deep sympathy for a bereaved church was revealed. The late pope, it must be admitted, was gravely criticized in some quarters during the war. Some fervent voices in the heat of the war declared that he should have raised his protest against the German treatment of civilians in Belgium. But others maintain strongly that he used his widespread influence on behalf of peace; and they quote his memorable letter. But in the midst of such criticism or approval there is little of the old bitter feeling against Rome; the fierce language formerly used of the papal see is little heard. And the Bishop of Manchester of today, with the goodwill of his people, can send a letter of condolence to the Catholic Bishop of Salford and add to his signature the words, "In our blessed Lord." The change disturbs some Protestants; but if I were a Roman I should feel not a little uncomfortable. The days of hostility have their gains for a church in the minority, as our free churches well know. It is sometimes better to be attacked by honest foes than to be tolerated by courteous neighbors, many of whom, like Gallio, smile tolerantly upon all such things.

Lord Bryce

There will be no need to tell American readers what manner of public soul Lord Bryce was. He must seem, because of his sympathy and adoption, one of their own number. On this side Bryce was regarded as one of our chief men. It may almost be argued that had he been less accomplished he might have done more. He did so many things and did them wonderfully well; but in parliament though he was honored for his learning and his integrity, he never had the place to which he was entitled. He was always a Gladstonian liberal; he had a passion for the defense of small nations; he inherited his old friend's brief for the Armenians; but it is indeed hard to mention any of the great human causes which did not claim in him a friend and an advocate. It may not be so well known that he was ready to speak and to write with the warmest sympathy upon the international service rendered by foreign missions. No one believed more than he in the fundamental necessity for the gift which the missionary offers to the world of men. It was a strength to us to quote this statesman with his unrivalled knowledge of the world. The man who had been everywhere and knew everything was ready to speak a good word for the cause of foreign missions.

A Study of Death

The famous astronomer, M. Camille Flammarion, has put out the first of his volumes upon Death. It is a striking review of the evidence which has convinced him as a man of science that our "psychic personality is endowed with powers that have as yet been analyzed very little." He believes that the existence of the soul has been finally proved against the arguments of the old materialism; and since it can operate outside the range of the bodily powers there is a strong presumption that it will survive beyond death. He does not approach the problem from the side of religion. Indeed he declares that his psychic facts are better established than the facts on which the historic religions rest; and he looks for a new attitude to death and the after life—an attitude based upon science, not upon faith. On the other hand, his marshalling of evidence is widely removed from that which is found in many spiritualist works. He is not in the least ready when he meets with mysteries to call to his aid the hypothesis of discarnate spirits. He is calmly and dispassionately scientific and along his own road he has reached a definite belief in the survival of the soul.

What Is a Philistine?

We are faced in this country by the possibility of a reduction in the amount which we spend on education. We have to economize, and we have been told that we must save on many things, and not least upon education. But there will be a fight before these reductions are carried out. The fight would not be doubtful if we had not so many philistines in our ranks. If the question is asked, What is a philistine? no better answer can be given than to take a passage from the Educational Supplement of the Times. It is a fine diagnosis:

"That is the first point to be grasped about the philistine; he is one who starves himself in everything except food; and education itself may be the beginning of this process of starvation. It will be, unless, from the first, it is presented to the learner as a kind of spiritual nourishment which will make him, not only good, but happy. At bottom, the philistine is one who refuses happiness, who believes that in this life it is dangerous and irrelevant. In his old Puritan form he thought art was sinful because he refused and despaired of happiness; then he was intent on survival and success in another world. Now he despises art, though no longer a Puritan, because he cannot eat it or drink it, or make money out of it; and he despises science and philosophy for the same reason. Education itself is for him a means of training children to make money or to be the efficient tools of those who make money. And behind all this materialism which seems to us so wicked and brutal there is always a pathetic despair and refusal of happiness, a sense that the universe itself is hard and sinister, and that one can escape disaster in it only by consenting, in one's own way of life, to its malignity. That is to say, there is always fear at the bottom of the philistine attitude, and it can be prevented only by a system of education in which for this fear is substituted a boundless hope and a belief that, in its nature, the universe is kind, giving us finally that which we ask of it, if only we will dare to ask in action."

A Flexible Unity

Canon Leslie Hunter has been pleading for "a flexible unity" in the church. To him the problem of unity is not a problem of garrison life but of the army in the field. "The unity movement is part of a larger movement for the reconversion of the church to Christianity so that it may effectively evangelize the world." Such a unity must be flexible. "The problem is not merely to devise a scheme which will bring the several churches together, but to devise a scheme which, having reunited them, will keep them together. Any scheme which regards the church primarily as an institution will not do this. The danger of unity is always stagnation. You can achieve unity in an institution by rigid organization at the sacrifice of life and movement. But unless the reunited church is a movement free and supple in its organization, it is bound to be broken into pieces again on the wheels of Time. Unless

The Core of the Imitation of Christ

Here is a closing word from an admirable little book on "The Message of Thomas a Kempis" by the Rev. E. J. Ives, published by the Student Christian Movement: "Let him come to me his poor one, and make me glad. Let him put forth his hand and save a poor wretch from every difficulty. Come, come; for without thee no day nor hour is joyful; for thou art my joy and without thee my table is empty.' (Book IV, 21:2.) This is the very core of the book: union that brings likeness, fellowship that brings such a way of sharing Jesus' outlook on life that we are drawn to walk as he walked and to carry on the work which Jesus began by doing and teaching. It is a union which renews the nature of the disciple and issues not only in walking after him, but also likeness to him, so that he becomes known to the world through his disciples and the world marks from their life and manners that they have been with Jesus and have learned from him."

CORRESPONDENCE

Roosevelt—Another View

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: May I ask for space in which to emphatically dissent from your editorial on "The Enlarging Roosevelt" in your issue of February 2? There is indeed a growing impression concerning Mr. Roosevelt, but fortunately for the future it is not of the nature your editorial implies. There well may be, however, an enlarging Roosevelt if enough eminent Americans can succeed in launching a Roosevelt cult. The impression of the first Napoleon has not diminished through the years but who would say that there has been a proportionate increase of joy or peace for France? We should ponder well the concluding words of an article on Napoleon by Marshall Foch published on the centenary of the Emperor's death. The Marshall says: "In my view, the deep reason for the disaster that overwhelmed him must be sought elsewhere. He forgot that a man cannot be God; that, above the individual, there is the nation; that, above men, there is the moral law; and that war is not the highest goal, since, above war, there is Peace." (London Times Napoleon Supplement, May 5, 1921.)

The late ex-President could not concur in any such pacifist sentimentality, neither could he subscribe to the assertion in your editorial that he was a believer in arbitration. Mr. Roosevelt is his best witness on the merits of peace and war and arbitration versus might. I quote: "No triumph of peace is quite so great as the supreme triumph of war. The courage of the soldier, the courage of the statesman who has to meet storms which can be quelled only by soldiery qualities—this stands higher than any quality called out merely in time of peace." (American Ideals, page 253.) "The twentieth century looms before us big with the fate of many nations. If we stand idly by, if we seek merely swollen, slothful ease and ignoble peace, if we shrink from the hard contests where men must win at hazard of their lives and risk of all they hold dear, then the bolder and stronger peoples will pass us by, and will win for themselves domination of the world." (The Strenuous Life, page 20.) "Scant attention is paid to the weakling or the coward who babbles of peace; but due heed is given to the strong man with sword girt on thigh who preaches peace, not from ignoble motives, not from fear or distrust of his own powers, but from a deep sense of moral obligation" (The Strenuous Life, pages 30-31.)

Such sentiments are typical; likewise the concluding two on the folly of real arbitration. "First and foremost, the United States must seriously prepare itself against war, and show itself able to maintain its right and make its weight felt in the world. Next, it must abandon both the policy of poltroonery—the policy we have practiced as regards the Lusitania and Mexico—and the policy of recklessly making promises which neither can nor ought to be kept—the policy practiced in the proposed all-inclusive arbitration treaties five years ago, and, above all, in the unspeakably silly and wicked thirty all-inclusive arbitration-commission treaties actually negotiated under the present administration." (Fear God and Take Your Own Part, page 170.) "Arbitration is an excellent thing, but ultimately those who wish to see this country at peace with foreign nations will be wise if they place reliance upon a first-class fleet of first-class battleships rather than upon any arbitration treaty which the wit of man can devise." (American Ideals, page 249).

With a war-devastated world seeking its way out from the welter of blood and iron into a community of power through "silly and wicked" treaties is it possible, I ask, that the apostle of "the strong man with sword girt on thigh" shall, like our beloved Lincoln, grow larger from year to year?"

The Other Side of the Towner Sterling Bill

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have read with interest the communication of President Penrose concerning the Towner-Sterling bill which appeared in a recent issue of The Christian Century. May I be granted the privilege of offering a few thoughts in reply to those arguments.

In his first argument President Penrose calls attention to the great war debt we are carrying and says the expenditure for education should not be undertaken "unless it can be proven to be absolutely necessary." When the war showed us that 24.9 per cent of our population was either entirely illiterate or had only very limited literacy (could not possibly write a letter) and that about 30 per cent were physically unfit for military duty; when we find that the standard of maturity demanded of our teachers is so low that one-fourth of all the teachers in our public schools are under 21 years old, that about 5 per cent have had no education or training above the eighth grade, that 25 per cent of all our teachers have had a total of not more than two years of high school training, that only one-fifth of all our teachers have had a training equivalent to a full four year high school course and a two year normal course or college training above that; when the teacher turnover is so great that one-fourth of all our teachers have had two years or less of teaching experience; when in a great state like Indiana, for example, several of the schools are maintained for just a little over 100 days each year; when in many of our southern states this standard is lower; when in some of these states no effort is made at any really efficient enforcement of their low standard compulsory education laws; and when often in the same state the taxable wealth behind each pupil (enumerated) will vary in different districts all the way from fifteen hundred to twenty thousand dollars, it would seem that the passage of some law whereby national assistance and encouragement could be given to help when help is needed and to more nearly equalize educational opportunities was "absolutely necessary" to our national well being and the safety of our liberties.

As to combining this question with that of carrying our war debt, this seems to me most unsatisfactory and unjust. If necessary, war debts can be refunded and carried a few years longer, but when our children have grown up and gone out into life we cannot then call them back and give them the education which was denied them as children. We must educate now the children who are now with us to be educated. Too long, all too long, have we thought of the education of our children in terms of the tax rate and we have subordinated this to other considerations which were not as imperative.

Again the letter says that education is a function of the state. Let us write this large, for nothing is taught more conclusively by the history of education in the United States. But this same history also proves that nothing can be more destructive of educational initiative and efficiency than that of granting full local autonomy to individual local school districts. The condition of the Massachusetts schools about 1825 is a striking example.

When, however, the statement is made that "the advocates of the bill assume that all functions of national life, including education, must be directed by the national government" an absolutely untenable position is taken. Nothing is farther from the minds of the advocates of the bill. The last sentence of section seven of the bill reads as follows:

"All funds apportioned to a state.....shall be distributed and administered in accordance with the laws of said state in like manner as the funds provided by state and local educational authorities of said state for the same purpose, and the state and local educational authorities of said state shall determine the course of study, plans, and methods for carrying out the purposes of this section within said state in accordance with the laws thereof."

This same language is repeated in connection with each proposed appropriation and occurs five times in the bill.

This would seem to be enough, but as a final safeguard the following provision is incorporated in section thirteen:

"All the educational facilities encouraged by the provisions of this act and accepted by a state shall be organized, supervised, and administered exclusively by the legally constituted state and local educational authorities of said state, and the secretary of education shall exercise no authority in relation thereto; and this act shall not be construed to imply federal control of education within the states, nor impair the freedom of the state in the conduct and management of their respective school systems."

It is difficult to see how this could be stated more emphatically or more clearly.

President Penrose's article further conveys the idea that federal assistance would destroy local initiative and that the normal schools need no aid. The facts themselves as gathered from our past history and present status are the best answer to this. To quote one example, the land grant colleges were established in various states by federal appropriation but today by far the greater part of the maintenance expense of these colleges is met by taxation within the states themselves. The same has been found to be true in regard to state appropriations to local communities. When the recipients have had to raise by their own efforts an amount equal to that received, such grants have always proved to be the greatest and most effective inspiration to local endeavor, efficiency and progress. They have never led and can never lead to dependency or a feeling of "feeding at the public granary" as long as the states must duplicate the appropriation received. The actual working of the plan is its own best argument, and the facts mentioned above show that much inspiration and assistance are needed.

As to normal schools, they are graduating each year only about 15 per cent of the number of teachers needed to fill the new positions incident to the growth in population and to fill the old places which become vacant through various causes. This has been due partly to the poor salaries paid to teachers but also largely to the fact that the normal schools have limited physical equipment, their faculties are not on a par with college faculties doing the same grade of work, their general educational standard is comparatively low and as a whole they are not attractive as higher institutions of learning. I know there are some marked exceptions, but the statement is true for the great majority and the general facilities for training teachers for our city elementary and rural schools is one of the very weakest links in our whole educational system. The normal schools must have encouragement and assistance if they are to do what may reasonably be expected and if they are to attract the brightest of our high school graduates.

In addition to all of this we need, so much, national inspiration and leadership (not domination). This can come about only through a recognition of the relatively great importance of education in our national life and making that recognition something more tangible than mere reiteration of empty phrases. To many close students of the question it seems that this can be brought about only by having a representative of the interests of education in the councils of the nation equal in rank with that of other cabinet members. There has been no attempted domination on the part of the government through the Secretaries of Labor, Commerce, or Agriculture and we earnestly pray for the time when the education and training of our children may rank in the national government equal in importance with the diseases of our sheep and our hogs and the breeding of our horses and cattle.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Host of the Lord*

THIS is one of the most inspiring stories of all the Old Testament. Again and again it recurs to us as we meet some seemingly unconquerable obstacle, as we face forces apparently by all worldly standards too much for us, and by divine intervention the walls crumble into dust before our eyes and the material forces vanish into thin air. If God be for us who can be against us? "They that are with us are more than they that are with them." Do you get the picture? The prophet and king on the city wall behind the entire valley about the city filled with the soldiers, horses and chariots. The young king is frightened; well may he be for the host is formidable. Man for man the king's warriors are no match for the enemies. Already he can see his capital in flames, his family torn forcibly from him and he can feel his neck in the disgraceful rope of his conqueror. He turns his blanched face to the man of God and to his infinite surprise he sees that face radiant with joy and hope. The prophet saw what the king could not. It is ever so: the spiritual person sees what the materialist never can. The prophet prayed God that the king might have his eyes opened to see the spiritual realities; when the prayer was granted the young ruler saw the mountains round about his city filled with innumerable armies, crowded with chariots—all of fire! Tell me, did the king see more truly with his fleshly or his spiritual eyes?

I recall one afternoon when Reginald Campbell of the City Temple, London, came to my university. Eagerly we crowded to see and hear him. We saw a man with a most spiritual face, possessing a rare sympathy with college men. He spoke about the reality of spiritual facts. He told us that these facts of our own spiritual experience were just as scientifically real as stones or stars or microbes or brain-cells. All the realities are not seen with fleshly eyes; microscopes and telescopes do not reveal all the wonders of the earth and sky.

God is a spirit and he is real. Christ is a spirit and he is real. The most real part of my self, the most enduring, the most far-reaching is my spirit. And "Spirit with spirit may meet." This is very comforting.

"God is round about me,
And can I be dismayed?"

Not only Dante saw the heavens filled with singing choirs of redeemed souls; not only Paul saw crowds of spiritual spectators watching with intense interest the race of men on the earth, Jesus himself sitting as the judge, with the crown in his hand for the victor; today we may see the skies filled with spiritual forces that fight for the causes of righteousness. We say the stars fight for us—what do we mean but that unseen spiritual hosts battle for the right?

All that we are trying to say is this: that when God is on our side the victory is assured. The unlimited spiritual forces of the universe guard us, the spirits of just men made perfect fight with us. Someway we cannot think that Moody, Spurgeon, Wesley and ten thousand other saints have entered into rest; we must think of these militant souls as alive and keenly interested in the battle on earth. We have no use for what is called "spiritualism." In fact, we detest it as we do pre-millennialism, Christian science, theosophy, Bahaism and a lot of other wild isms and cults, but we do believe that personality persists and that all the good and great constitute the glorious company of the apostles, martyrs and saints of all ages. We like to think of this heavenly company as intensely interested in Christ's cause in this present world. Channing, who certainly must be called a rational man, somewhere paints a picture of this noble assembly in heaven. Surely they must be interested in us—their spiritual sons and daughters and our attempts to carry on their work in the world. Thus not only God, considered as a Person, but all the noble souls since the world began may be thought of as this spiritual host. Does this sound naive and childlike? I am willing to accept responsibility for its positive truth and worth. It is thrilling to feel the sympathy of God, of Jesus and of all the aristocracy of heaven in our struggles here. It is no longer a single-handed fight, one battles as one of the spiritual warriors of the universe. Death—well, what of death—the release from the material—the leap to the glorious company in the blessed community of the spiritual realm.

Personality and Power

Of this book, Edward Shillito says, in a recent issue of The Christian Century:

"There is one society which has mastered the art of preparing courses of study. That society is the National School Union. Each year the union issues an outline for the Sundays of the year. Preachers and others who are at times hard pressed for material find these outlines fresh and unconventional and enriched with a large number of references to literature. The new book for 1922 has for its central theme 'Personality', and is the best thing of its kind known to me."

The Prophetic Ministry For Today

By BISHOP CHARLES D. WILLIAMS

The Lyman Beecher Yale Lectures for 1920

FOR years Bishop Williams has tried hard to do the work of a prophet to his own times. He has practiced a persistent faith in the power of the spoken word to keep before men the high and unwelcome standards that alone save a people from perishing.

He talks here most intimately of the calling and work of the ministry, so understood, in the hope of aiding his colleagues and himself to stand fast in their allegiance to this great Commission to the end.

Genuineness, earnestness, courage, intellectual honesty, spiritual passion—these are some of the fundamental characteristics of Bishop Williams, according to Dr. Joseph Fort Newton. An outstanding preacher-prophet, he is well able to discuss "The Prophetic Ministry for Today."

Presbyterians Have a New Leader for Brooklyn

The Presbyterians have a Board of Church Extension connected with the Brooklyn-Nassau presbytery and this board has recently secured a new secretary in the person of Dr. Joseph Dunn Burrell. He succeeds Rev. Robert W. Anthony, who has been secretary for the past six years. Dr. Burrell was pastor of the Classon Avenue Presbyterian church of Brooklyn when the war broke out. He served in France with the Red Cross and then entered the service of the New Era Movement. In recent months he has been New Era secretary for the Metropolitan district. Dr. Burrell says with regard to his new work: "It takes a bold spirit to face the problems of a great city. My chief encouragement is not in the consciousness of any special wisdom on the subject, but in the fact that I know Brooklyn well. In the past thirty years it has changed from an American, in fact a New England, type of city to a real cosmopolis. As one item it possesses the largest Jewish center in America. The Italian population, and also the colored have increased considerably and the gilded domes of the Eastern church may be seen here and there."

Religious Education Program Proves Successful

The religious education program being carried on by the south town churches of Evanston, Ill., is proving a great success. St. Luke's Episcopal, Second Presbyterian, Hemenway Methodist, Pilgrim Congregational and Evanston Church of the Disciples are united in the task. The enrolment has grown steadily through the year and now totals 364. Miss Phoebe Wilson gives her full time to teaching, and Rev. F. A. McKibben gives part time as director while engaged in some other religious education enterprises. The instruction is given in three church buildings, chosen with reference to their accessibility to the school buildings. In the enrolment of the school are members of thirty denominations, many of them Catholics and some from homes entirely without religious convictions. The cost per pupil is ten dollars per year. The funds for all the operations up to the present time are financed, and the second semester will be financed at an early date.

Virile Indianapolis Minister Makes His Protest

Rev. F. L. Davison, pastor of the Englewood Christian church of Indianapolis, is a young man with positive convictions. The governor of Indiana had been engaged to address a fathers' and sons' banquet in his church when the newspapers announced an increase in telephone rates through the action of the governor's utility commission. The pastor canceled the invitation to the governor. He publicly inquired of the mayor of Indianapolis recently concerning his alleged attitude in favor of beer and light wines. The Englewood church is carrying on an employment bureau which is placing many workmen in jobs. Some are given temporary employment in odd jobs, while others are being given a permanent settlement. Many working people live in the neighborhood served by the church, and from this working class constituency 350 new members were received during the past year.

Thousand Students Wait on Ministry of Popular Pastor

Does any minister in America preach on the average Sunday to an audience of a thousand students? It may well be doubted whether more than one minister has this honor. Rev. Walter M. Haushalter is the minister of the Disciples church at Columbia, Mo. The student editors of the University Missourian recently made a survey of the churches. This survey revealed the fact that over a thousand students are in the Sunday audience of Mr. Haushalter. While only 500 Disciples students are in attendance at the University of Missouri, 800 express a preference for the church of the popular minister. The secret of Mr. Haushalter's success is that he has organized a student congregation with its own officers, mid-week business and social meetings and its own membership roll. This device solves the Disciples problem of the reception of the unimmersed, and provides a church membership in the college town without disturbing the loyalties to the old home church. The Sunday school of the student congregation is held in a theater, and now has an enrolment of over four hundred. Mr. Haushalter had a pastorate in the East before coming to Columbia.

Dr Covert Wants No Yellow Laws

The cry of secularists over the country that the reformers were trying to fasten blue laws upon us has been a smoke-screen to conceal their own attacks upon historic American institutions. Dr. Covert of Chicago showed them up recently. He said: "All this talk of Blue Laws is by the avowed enemies of good order. They are forcing the words upon us and insisting upon the debate, hoping to make the whole American system of Sabbath keeping ridiculous. They are among those who will prefer 'Yellow Laws' with all kinds of laxity and recklessness and vulgarity. Worse still, they are apostles of 'Red Laws' under which anarchy runs riot and nothing we hold dear is safe."

President of Disciples Convention Is Honored

Rev. Stephen E. Fisher, president of the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ, was honored with a banquet at the beginning of the twentieth year of his ministry at Champaign, Ill. Mr. Henry E. Wilson, of the local Y. M. C. A., presided, and the banquet was attended by university professors and prominent citizens of the Twin Cities. Mr. Fisher is the dean of the group about the campus of the University of Illinois, and he has been one of the outstandingly successful church builders of his religious communion. He graduated from Eureka College in 1900, and since then has shepherded but few churches, having served as pastor at Gibson City for a few years preceding his pastorate at Champaign. Prof. A. W. Nolan of the University of Illinois spoke with keen appreciation of the minister, detailing conversations of children, students, the poor, and the rank and file of the community. Mr. Fisher is president of the approaching Disciples convention, and as such is in frequent demand at Disciples gatherings.

Expansion of Disciples Work at State University

While the Disciples were the first religious communion of America to found Bible chairs at state universities, they have not yet set up these chairs at all the universities where they have a considerable student body. The development at the University of Illinois is comparatively recent. The Illinois Disciples Foundation has in recent years employed students as auxiliary helpers to work in conjunction with the local church. This is the first year in which Bible instruction of a university grade has been given. Rev. William V. Roosa was appointed recently as a teacher of the Bible, and after examination by the university authorities, his work has been approved. At the University of Missouri the Disciples have a theological seminary. At Lawrence, Kans., Ann Arbor, Mich., Bloomington, Ind., Charlottesville, Va., and Austin, Texas, Bible chairs are also maintained.

Christian Endeavor Organization Gives Wireless Concert

In the District of Columbia the older Christian Endeavor workers have an Alumni Association which performs many helpful services. This organization recently gave a radio concert in the chapel of the Church of the Covenant with a very interesting program of vocal music and Shakespearian readings. It is said that 150,000 wireless operators within 200 miles of the city enjoyed the concert. Broadcasting sermons and religious services is now one of the latest fads in the religious world. Recently the first religious service sent into the air from Chicago was given by a Methodist church in a western suburb.

Organize Religious People to Stay at Home

Some churches are criticized these days for having too full a program. Some member of the family is at the church every night in the week with a consequent break-up in the family life resulting not only from the movie shows, but from the program of the church itself. It is an interesting and significant fact that the state organization of Christian Endeavor in Oklahoma has set apart the last week in February as a Stay-at-Home Week. It is proposed that during this

The Finding of Moses

ON a tablet dug up from the ruins of ancient Nippur was recently found a Sumerian inscription, detailing in almost identical words the Biblical story of the birth and finding of Moses.

Written nearly 5,000 years ago, centuries before the Scriptures were more than traditions handed down from father to son among the children of Israel, it yet forms an almost exact parallel to the Scripture narrative. This curiously interesting inscription is but one of the many thousands that have enabled scientists and historians to correlate the histories of the ancient peoples that lived and fought over and died in the land of Palestine in the times of Moses, of Joshua and the Prophets. Now translated into English and for the first time made easily available, this and a thousand other stories of intense interest to every man are to be found in

Minimum Wage for Ministers a Growing Movement

The sweat-shop manse is to disappear from religious industry if present signs do not fail. The working of little children at odd jobs and the slavery of an educated woman to unusual household industries to keep the wolf away from the front door will no longer protect church members from an increase in giving. Last June the Presbyterian and Methodist churches of Canada took action establishing a minimum wage in the ministry of fifteen hundred dollars a year. The Congregational denomination of the United States has recently taken similar action. Many weak churches will be asked to pay two-thirds of the minimum salary on condition that the other third is provided by the Home Missionary Society of the denomination. It is believed that over two hundred thousand dollars will be needed for this advance step immediately and that seven hundred thousand dollars will be the ultimate requirement as the weak churches one after another meet the conditions of home mission aid. It is reported that the Presbyterian denomination will take a similar action in the General Assembly in June. Denominational leaders have been stung by the persistent criticism of a denominational program which declared for a minimum wage among hand-workers, but sweated the people of the manse in a way no longer tolerated in any industry. The Congregational year-book shows that six hundred thousand dollars was added to ministerial salaries last year in that denomination. The average salary in 1920 was 11.8 per cent higher than in the previous year, and 45 per cent above the standards for 1916.

What the Fundamentalist Preacher Is Like

Boston is finding out these days what the Fundamentalist preacher is like. This modern Athens, which is always ready to get mildly excited over a new cult, is listening to the preaching of Rev. J. Frank Norris of Ft. Worth, Texas, who is holding revival services at Tremont Temple. He is expounding such prophetic themes as the return of the Jews to Palestine, Antichrist, the Second Coming and Armageddon. In Ft. Worth he has what is claimed to be the largest Baptist church in the world, a congregation of five thousand people. The church school refused to use lesson quarterlies and studies the Bible chapter by chapter. The preacher dresses in a gray business suit and discourses on such themes as styles in women's clothes and the latest movements in politics. The Texas church is a great organization, which employs fifteen stenographers.

Sectarian Institutions Are Cut Off

The state auditor of Pennsylvania has recently cut off from public support a great many sectarian and fraternal institutions during recent weeks. As might be expected, a large number of the institutions affected are Roman Catholic in faith. The Presbyterians had one hospital on the list and it has been stricken off as well. The Protestants of the state affirm that they are glad to support the state officers in this change, which is clearly in accord with American thought and practice.

Disciples Society Bows to Conservative Element

The board of managers of the United Christian Missionary Society of the Disciples of Christ was called together in St. Louis in special session on January 18 and 19 to consider the clamor which has come up from the conservative congresses held recently. The demands of the conservatives were given consideration, and most of them were conceded. Because this kind of compromise seemed to guarantee peace for the practical work of the organization, many voted for a program to which in their private thinking they do not agree, if one may judge from past utterances. Dr. C. M. Chilton, one of the most loyal missionary pastors in the church, resigned from the board, though his resignation was not accepted. A resolution offered by Rev. Z. T. Sweeney of Columbus, Ind., with reference to the much-discussed question of open membership practice on foreign fields, was adopted. The text of the Sweeney resolution is as follows: "As a purely administrative policy, the board of managers announces the following: In harmony with the teaching of the New Testament, as understood by this board of managers, the United Christian Missionary Society is conducting its work everywhere on the principles of receiving into the membership of the churches at home or abroad, by any of its missionaries, only those who are immersed, penitent believers in Christ. Furthermore, it is believed by this board of managers that all of the missionaries and ministers appointed and supported by this board are in sincere accord with this policy, and certainly it will not appoint, and indeed it will not continue in its service, anyone known by it to be not in such accord. It disclaims any right and disowns any desire to do otherwise." This action on the part of the board of managers will become historic, for it is the first time in a hundred years of history that the Disciples through any general organization have ever legislated upon doctrinal questions. Whether the adoption of this resolution means that some China missionary must now be selected as a "scapegoat" of that situation remains to be seen. A minor concession offered by the board of managers to the conservative element was the adoption of a resolution declaring that no effort was being put forth to make state and provincial organizations subservient to the united society. The principle of comity in mission work in the homeland has been much attacked, and this was dealt with in an innocuous resolution, which was, however, reassuring to the reactionaries. It is also to be recommended to the International Convention at its next meeting that the constitution be amended to permit amendment of motions reported out of the recommendations committee.

Dr. Ainslie Faces His Critics

Dr. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, president of the Disciples Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, has replied to his critics in a frank letter to a conservative minister in Kansas City, Rev. James Small. He confesses an entire lack of interest in the current discussion among the Disciples of "open membership" classing it with the discussion of "open communion" among the Baptists and "open pulpits" among the Episcopalians. Dr. Ainslie declares his firm belief in the organization of community churches in which all the Christian people of the community shall be made welcome. His assertion of the right of Disciples churches to determine their own practice in the reception of new members rings with the old-time note of liberty characteristic of the denomination a generation ago. Dr. Ainslie's letter is as follows: "My Dear Brother Small:—Complying with your request out of the lengthy discussion at the preachers' meeting on Monday morning, I am glad to write you as follows: 1. I am not enough interested in open membership among the Disciples either to advocate it or to oppose it. It is a question that may be very properly classified with open communion among the Baptists and open pulpits among the Episcopalians, all three of which are purely theological questions, and consequently are of secondary interest. 2. My church in Baltimore does not practice open membership, but if they wanted to do it, they would have that right without consulting other churches among the Disciples, unless they choose to do so. One thing the Disciples got in their beginning was freedom, and I am sure that my church would not think of surrendering that richly purchased heritage. 3. Several community churches are associated with my church in Baltimore, and I approve of those churches receiving into their memberships persons from other churches, irrespective as to whether their baptism was by immersion or sprinkling. I advocate this policy in all community churches around the world. 4. I practice baptism by immersion of penitent believers only, because that was the apostolic baptism, as I see it, and I have never practiced any other; but I do not regard Presbyterians as any less Christian because they practice baptism by sprinkling. I will not for a moment think that I am any better than they are because I have been baptized by immersion and they by sprinkling. Were I to think otherwise I would be a Pharisee of the Pharisees. I am writing you kindly, but frankly, for I have nothing to hide, either."

er in my theological thinking or my religious practices. I follow John Wesley's motto: 'I think and I let think.' With cordial regards, Peter Ainslie."

Was Columbus a Jew?

The Knights of Columbus are said to be agitated over the recent assertion of a historian that Christopher was a Jew. Much of the zest in this large Catholic order comes from the assumption that America was discovered by a Catholic and belonged to the Catholic religion. The historian asserts that Columbus concealed his religion in order that he might have his opportunity of making the western voyage. The committee of the Knights of Columbus which is charged with rewriting American history will now have a task.

Christian Endeavor Societies Have the Christmas Spirit

The Christmas record of Christian Endeavor unions in various large cities this year is very creditable. In Canton, O., the union arranged a Christmas party in the city auditorium which was attended by over 600 boys and girls. The young people distributed over 300 pounds of candy, 8 crates of apples and 600 toy balloons. Four troops of Boy Scouts acted as ushers at the party. The Detroit Union provided fifty Christmas baskets for poor families. The Lawrence, Mass., union made 500 Christmas stockings, and filled them for the poor children. The Brooklyn, N. Y., union provided a Christmas party for 375 children of their fresh air home.

Florida Home for the Aged Is Opened

In the sunny southland the Disciples of Christ have opened recently another home for the aged. Located at Jacksonville, Fla., it is indeed well qualified to make the lives of aged religious people pleasant. Twenty-five people have already been received, and they are coming in continually now, arriving from various sections. Though the benevolent work of the Disciples of Christ is among their newer ventures, nevertheless this work has already grown to very large proportions. It has not been hampered by theological discussion as has the missionary work of this communion. Disciples custom makes Easter Sunday the day for special offerings for this work.

Japanese Church in Los Angeles

The new Japanese church building in Los Angeles will house the federated activities of both Congregationalists and Presbyterians. The Japanese have contributed $20,000 to the new building and the remainder must be secured otherwise. The Los Angeles Presbytery has asked their Foreign board for $7,000 and the board of Church Erection for $7,500. The methods of the Congregationalists in securing their part of the fund have not yet been announced. The largest Japanese colony in this country is in the city of Los Angeles, and it is believed that the new community church will be a great force in the life of the Japanese in bringing their lives into harmony with Christian principles.

Churches Have Acted for World Peace

The statistics analyzing petitions received in Washington on the subject of world peace indicate that the work of the protestant churches in behalf of peace has been effective. Out of 11,135,187 petitioners for a thorough-going policy of the limitation of armaments, 10,000,000 of these mentioned in their petition the Divine Guidance. The Federal Council of Churches in presenting these statistics indicates that among the forces influencing public opinion at this important time, few have been as important as the church, if indeed any.

Moderator Is Very Active in Behalf of the Church

Not in a long time have the Presbyterians had a more active moderator than they have this year in Dr. Henry Swearingen of St. Paul. One hears of him in every section of the country, and his church has been very gracious in permitting him to give so much time to the work of the denomination. Among his addresses scheduled for the near future are those to be given at Presbyterian Field Days at New York and Brooklyn the latter part of February. At these same meetings Miss Alice Robertson, member of Congress from Oklahoma, and formerly an employe of the Presbyterian

Premillennial Program for China

Just how the premillennialist group looks at the problem of world redemption is well indicated by a recent address by Dr. R. A. Torrey. He has been in China and comes back with a very definite point of view with regard to Christian missions in that country. He says: "The union universities and theological schools in China are a great menace to the future of the church in China. As those universities have no creedal basis, it is impossible for one denomination, however orthodox, to restrain other denominations from sending out men thoroughly unsound. In one instance, for example, the Presbyterians refused a certain candidate in their denomination who was to go out and teach in one of these universities. They refused him because they regarded him as theologically and radically unsound; but this same man then applied to another denomination and was accepted by them and sent out by them to teach in the same university where the Presbyterians had refused to accept him. China needs salvation, not education. I believe we have made a great mistake in putting altogether too much money, and too many men and women, comparatively, into education and altogether too little and too few into evangelization. Another mistake we are making—at least, I think it is a mistake—is the undue eagerness we are showing to get the highly-educated classes, and the influential and the rich. One great missionary body has said that the other missions can go to the poor and uneducated and such-like, if they wish, but 'our mission is to the educated and to the leaders.' This, certainly was not the program of Jesus and his apostles."

Roman Church Elects a Pope

TURNING aside from the well-known politicians of the church, the college of cardinals have selected as the next pope the Archbishop of Milan, who was made a cardinal during the last year. His selection was undoubtedly dictated by some feeling of the need of extending the diplomacy of the church which has been so successful during the past year or two.

Cardinal Ratti won his spurs during the war as a special envoy to Poland. As Poland changed rulers several times during the war, the problem of the church was a very difficult one. It was an occasion requiring the greatest tact upon the part of the papal envoy, and it is said that he succeeded in so thoroughly maintaining his reputation for neutrality that various governments allowed him to continue in power. This diplomatic triumph greatly impressed the recent pope, who made him a cardinal.

Among the first acts of the new pope were some calculated to inaugurate a new era in tradition of the papacy. Pius XI. has already violated the tradition of the papacy of fifty years' standing that the pope is the prisoner of the vatican. He appeared, and gave a blessing to the people. The papal troops were saluted by the troops of the Italian government. How far Pius XI. may go with this new policy is not known, but newspaper correspondents have ventured to hint that he might even visit America in the course of his reign.

It is announced that the American cardinals arrived too late to participate in the election. It is believed that the rules governing the conclave will be amended so that henceforth the election of the pope will not be so entirely in the hands of the Latin cardinals. With rules as they now are, it is ridiculous to speak of the church as truly Catholic when its most significant election can take place without the representatives of some of the leading national units of the church present.

Vocations Within the Church

By Leonidas W. Crawford

"It is a fine volume to place in the hands of talented young men and women who are undecided as to their vocations, but who might be led to consider the many lines of Christian activity which have ordinarily been given little emphasis."

PRINCES —OF THE— CHURCH

By W. ROBERTSON NICOLL
Editor of The British Weekly

IN THIS new volume Dr. Nicoll pays tribute to thirty-three of the pulpit notables of England, who made the English pulpit glorious from the late eighties to the present date. All of these preachers the author knew personally, and most of them were intimate friends. The following are some of the men discussed:

Dr. Horatius Bonar, Dr. R. W. Dale
Bishop Lightfoot, W. Robertson Smith
John Henry Newman, Bishop Westcott
Canon Liddon, Henry Drummond
James Martineau, Principal Hutton
Silvester Horne, Dr. Barnado
George Matheson, Frederick Robertson
Ian Maclaren, Principal Rainy
Marcus Dods, Hugh Price Hughes
Alexander Maclaren, Dean Church
C. H. Spurgeon, Joseph Parker.

"A panorama of genius" indeed! For these names are among the very greatest of the modern church. Catholicity of spirit and true insight characterize this latest volume of the great British editor, who alone could produce such a work as this is.

New Books on Christ in Today's Life

In the amazingly puzzling times in which men find themselves today, there is no fact of greater significance, or more hope-radiating, than that thoughtful men are turning for guidance to the great Teacher and Master. New book catalogs bristle with striking titles which point to Him who alone can lead men out of darkness into light. The Christian Century Press has selected the following as really great books. All of them endeavor to see Jesus, not merely as a hero of the first century, but as the true leader for men and nations in this twentieth century.

Jesus and Life

By Joseph F. McFadyen, D.D.

A fresh and searching interpretation of the Gospel of Jesus in its social implications. The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, says in his preface: "We are realizing as never before that the christianizing of men, of all men, in their relations is not so much a matter of interest to the church as a matter of life and death for the world." ($2.00).

The Guidance of Jesus for Today

By Cecil John Cadoux, D.D.

This book is an account of the teaching of Jesus from the standpoint of modern personal and social need. Says Canon James Adderley: "It recalls by a shock to the bewildering problem of applied Christianity and makes us once more suitably uncomfortable. I want everybody to read it." ($2.00).

The Open Light

By Nathaniel Micklem, M.A.

This interpretation of Christianity by one of England's younger Christian thinkers takes its title from William Morris's lines, "Looking up, at last we see the glimmer of the open light, from o'er the place where we would be." The author says: "I hope this book may help to make Christianity appear more reasonable and more beautiful." ($2.00).

Christianity and Christ

By William Scott Palmer.

"Twelve years ago," says Dr. Palmer in his introductory note, "I was profoundly influenced by the critical examination of Christian documents and of Christian origins, by science generally and by the new movement in philosophy. I felt impelled to revise my religious beliefs. It was a kind of stock-taking, and took the form of a diary, now long out of print. Many trials have come upon the Christian religion and the church since then. It seems to be time for a new stock-taking on my part; and I propose to write a new diary and in it ask my new questions and find, perhaps, new answers." Dr. Palmer is author of "Where Science and Religion Meet." ($2.00).

Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus

By Principal A. E. Garvie, D.D.

This is not a new book, but a new edition of a very great book by the noted head of New College, London. The Congregationalist says of the book: "Its chief value is in its emphatic insistence upon the genuineness of the human experience of Jesus, coupled with the constant acceptance of the uniqueness of his nature as the only-begotten and well-loved Son of God." ($3.00).

Silhouettes of My Contemporaries

By Lyman Abbott

"THIS is a collection of intimate sketches of the great—by one of them," announce Doubleday, Page & Co., publishers of the book. "The most striking and lasting impressions of Lyman Abbott's eighty years' association with great men are here given. The most interesting history is personality. Here are seen interesting men through the eyes of one of the wisest of observers."

"The one exception which we should take to this fascinating volume is to its title," says the New York Tribune. "A silhouette is a portrait showing just one side of the subject and without a touch of color or gradation of light and shade and without the slightest background or environment. But these pen-portraits of a few of the great men whom Lyman Abbott has known in a lifetime of more than eighty years are vastly more than that. They show various sides or phases of their subjects, they are rich in vivid, vital, natural coloring, and they have an abundance of background and of circumstantial setting. . . . It is the highest of tributes to his catholicity of mind and spirit to say that he does this so perfectly in all cases that we should be at a loss to select any one of the chapters of his book and say, Here is his best work; with this subject he was most at home."

The book has just been published. It contains 381 pages; finely bound in cloth; gold lettering; frontispiece portrait of the author.

Playing Hide and Seek with the Voters

THE old fashioned game of hide and seek is in vogue once more. The congressmen are trying to find the wily voters, and tag them. The rewards offered are of wide variety. In a wet city, the congressman proposes to vote for a nullification of the constitution of the United States so that the crowd that still hankers for booze may not be disaffected. Of course he has to calculate on a certain sheep-like obedience to party standards on the part of the church crowd or he would hardly dare to make such promises. Another group of congressmen are keenly interested in a bonus for the soldiers. It is not humanitarian feeling on their part, or they would plan to vote for something that would be socially helpful to the young veterans of the nation whom we all held in high esteem. The ordinary congressman does not care who carries the burdensome taxes if only able-bodied young men may have a little easy money to spend next year. A statesman would plan to encourage education and home-making among the young men who defended the flag, rather than to throw out for votes a bait that has no social significance. Of course each congressman is quite willing to vote a higher tariff wall to protect such infant industries as the steel trust and other impoverished industries. The tariff will once more be the political football of the nation instead of the object of serious study by economists. The times never more clearly indicated the duty of religious people to become political independents. It is well enough to possess a political tradition, but it is far better to have a set of political principles, and to vote for these principles, no matter what party name is at the head of the column. This year church folk should sternly rebuke the men who would nullify the constitution of the United States. They should resist forms of taxation that lay an unequal burden on the poor. Particularly should they be on the alert to withstand the efforts of the jingoists who are not all abashed by recent events.

An Expensive Imperialism

SOUTH America has for many years watched certain action of the United States government with apprehension. The feints against Mexico have always been disquieting. The virtual control of the politics of the Central American states has seemed to those Americans who live on the other side of the equator an unwarranted interference. While the freeing of Cuba was acknowledged to be altruistic, the taking of Porto Rico seemed to them to offset this. A long time ago an after dinner speaker somewhere in the United States indulged in spread-eagle patriotism by predicting that one day the American flag would wave from pole to pole. Few of us in the United States have ever heard of the incident, but the report of it comes from South America. All over the southern hemisphere this story continues to be told until this day. The latest act of aggression on the part of the United States is in San Domingo and Haiti. Here the gravest administrative abuses have grown up under the pretense that we were teaching the black men of these republics the art of government. The next Pan-American Congress will be held later in this year. At that congress the American delegates are sure to be asked some very embarrassing questions. The solidarity of the western hemisphere is a goal worthy of many sacrifices. It cannot be achieved without careful statesmanship. There are five thousand Latin Americans studying in American colleges and universities. Thousands of North Americans are going to the south to sell our mechanical products. There is prospect of a commerce and a friendly interchange of spiritual goods that is very attractive. At this moment the finest cooperation is being set up between American missionaries and the government agencies of South America. To sell the friendship of a whole hemisphere to satisfy our oil kings and our commercial brigands in the weaker states is a suicidal national policy. Our program in San Domingo should be one that could command the wholehearted approval of the Latin nations.

Reactionaries Fight Education

DENOMINATIONAL schools are having a hard time of it these days with threatening deficits on one hand, and, on the other, reactionary critics hampering every effort of the colleges to get themselves on a sound footing. Eureka College in Illinois was last year offered $135,000 by the General Education Board conditioned on enough more being secured to make $400,000. This announcement was received with joy by the college constituency. Early in the campaign to meet the terms of the conditional gift, the college was attacked by a Baptist of the "fundamentalist" group, Dr. W. B. Riley of Minneapolis. The latter charged that the General Education Board was engaged in an insidious propaganda in behalf of theological heresy. Covetous men who had wondered what their excuse would be when approached by solicitors have been only too glad to believe the reports which had their origin in Dr. Riley. Those who know the situation and know how moderate are the views held by Eureka teachers find the situation ludicrous, even though exasperating. Meanwhile it is interesting to note just what this campaign of obstruction accomplishes. Were it possible to cause Eureka college or any similar school to fail, the present students and the potential student body of the future would not go to Moody Institute or to the institution carried on by Dr. Riley. They would almost certainly go to one of the state universities, or to some other independent university. Here they would face the facts in science, history and literature, often not tempered by a teacher who had a genuine interest in interpreting the place of Christianity in the modern conception of the world. How do men of the Riley school of thought imagine that they are benefiting the youth of the country by their course of weakening public confidence in our Christian colleges?

The Evangelization of Children

CHILDREN are the hope of the future for the church. The older historic communions have recognized this in their insistence upon catechetical instruction, even though they have not been enough in earnest in the matter to make their catechisms over in the light of our modern knowledge of the child mind. Protestantism has succeeded amazingly in bringing children under Bible instruction, and failed signally in harvesting upon this colossal enterprise. It is an astounding fact that up to a few years ago the average Protestant communion had no other idea in winning children to Christ than by means of a big emotional decision day. It is less than five years since the Methodists produced a manual for the use of their ministers in guiding children into the church. Most other communions have no manual, and their ministers too often follow the rule of chance. In the ordinary evangelical home there is a reaction against decision days. The parents are saying, "Let the child grow up and then choose a religion." It is like saying, "Let the child grow up and then choose a country." Things do not happen that way in human life. The home needs to be won to a cordial cooperation with the evangelism of children, and it can be won when once it is possible to announce that the churches are really producing in the child life a result to merit the hearty approval of real friends of children. The children can be won to a sympathetic understanding of the aims of Christ in the world. Their loyalties can be enlisted in his sacred cause. They can be made to appreciate what the dedication of a life to the service of God really means.

Death of Springfield's "First Woman"

AS extraordinary a woman as the middle west has produced was Mrs. Catherine F. Lindsay of Springfield, Ill., who died on February 1. Her influence extended throughout the church life of Illinois in all denominations and was national in its scope within her own, the Disciples, denomination. Though often called to devote her talents to some far-stretching general organization, either in an executive or didactic capacity, Mrs. Lindsay's genius was devoted to an intensive cultivation of the field with which she had immediate and most intimate contacts. Thirty years ago she organized the women of the Springfield churches into a "Missionary Social Union." Down to the time of her death she was its president. Two ideals loomed continually before her, whose interpretation she was ever making through the quarterly meetings of the Union, and the numerous study classes that grew out of it: the Christianization of the world and the unification of the church. With an intensity of spirit that was excelled only by the lucidity and vigor of her intellectual apprehension, she gave to the entire religious and cultural life of central Illinois, a leadership that was incomparable. Not the least remarkable fact about Mrs. Lindsay was the life-long growth of her mind. Beginning her public career with conservative convictions she reflected in her later views the vision that has been progressively defining itself in the heart of the present generation. The petty things of sectarianism fell away and her mind gradually assumed the mould and manner of catholicity. She gave a daughter, Mrs. Paul Wakefield, to the mission field. Her distinguished son, Vachel Lindsay, the poet, and another daughter survive her.

The New Eloquence

IF the average man, trained in the manner of our schools, were asked to name the greatest oration which has fallen from American lips he would doubtless say, Webster's Reply to Hayne. Lincoln's address on the battle-field of Gettysburg was a greater human utterance, but we rarely or never call it an oration. It is the "Gettysburg Speech,"—by which we do not mean to detract from its greatness, but rather to admit that oratory may not compass all of the elements of greatness in speech.

There has been a decline in Webster's type of oratory, and if the plain layman wishes to know why, he need only re-read his Reply to Hayne, commonly thought to be his greatest effort. Its delivery must have been enormously impressive. An eminent Briton remarked, on the occasion of Webster's visit to England, that no mortal could be as great as Mr. Webster looked. One can readily imagine the crowded senate chamber, the strained attention of the listeners, and hear again through the silent print the sonorous voice. One can feel the majestic poise of the man even in the reading. The magnificent periods roll out in a deluge which overwhelm so ordinary a person as the Senator from South Carolina.

But it takes more than manners to make the orator. And many of the manners of this effort are repugnant to the senses of today. Its great theme alone saves this deliverance from the oblivion into which most political oratory has fallen. The plea for the preservation of the American union is perennially fetching. Liberty and union are two such volatile as well as vital substances that the wedding of the two will always be as thrilling and romantic as the love note in fiction. Webster consummated the banns in masterly fashion, and the oration can never die. But the manner and method have passed, or are in the way of passing, and ought to pass. For an orator of today to practice them is to throw himself into the class with Vardaman and Jim Reed. What drew many of the auditors to the crowded senate chamber was the realization that a scrap was on. The debate took the form of a personal encounter, and it was already developing into a sectional strife. Reason and truth cut less and less figure as the contest progressed, and passion and self-interest and malignant tricks of forensics took the center of the stage.

Six and a half pages of the opening of the speech of the "Reply" are taken up with the mastiff's growl over the lesser canine's barking. "Honorable gentleman" is interlarded everywhere throughout the oration in reference to an opponent with whom the orator figuratively wipes the floor. And, in the introduction, he finally warns his foe that, while the speaker is a man of self-possession, and trusts he will not be "betrayed into any loss of temper," yet, if provoked too far into crimination and recrimination, "the honorable member may perhaps find that in that contest there will be blows to take as well as blows to give." Throughout the long speech there is abundant opportunity for those so disposed to enjoy the fight. There are pages upon pages of flinging sectional taunts, until the dispassionate reader cries a plague upon both South Carolina and Massachusetts for their mutual pugnacity.

If this is true eloquence then there has been a decay. The pulpit has suffered even more notably than has the forum. The homiletic eloquence of earlier generations, whose decline many thoughtlessly deplore, partook of similar quality with the political vituperation and personal or sectional encounter which passed for oratory. Debates between eminent sectarians were common enough, and drew the largest crowds in the assumed interests of religion. In an isolated town of the southwest a short time ago, two ministers of rival denominations indulged in the sort of debate which was thus once common. After the affray was over, one church went to pieces completely, and the minister left town. The other minister disappeared shortly after, and the church languishes. The laymen may still display a morbid curiosity in that kind of homiletic eloquence but he does not care to support churches which live off it, or assume to sponsor it.

How much the eloquence even of Beecher gained its appeal from similar considerations has not yet been estimated. Not long ago in the midst of a historical discourse in Plymouth Church of Brooklyn, Dr. Hillis, while describing a dramatic occasion in that church during the sixties or late fifties of the past century, pointing to the left of the pulpit, explained, "And just then a brick came through that window over there." The speaker on this particular occasion chanced to be Wendell Phillips. But Beecher, the regular incumbent of that pulpit, gained much of his fame through brick-bat oratory during times when brick-bats flew thick and fast. Not his rollicking humor nor his incisive biblical interpretations were sufficient to explain his contemporaneous fame. His utterances scarcely entitled him to a fame in other generations apart from his seizure of the imagination of his contemporaries. When he visited England and won to his faith turbulent audiences assembled initially to mob him, he was the ambassador of a great idea, but his eloquence took on the belligerency of the age as well as the courage and good humor of a rare spirit.

How essential is belligerency to great oratory, as our standards have gauged greatness? If we shall answer the question intelligently and sincerely we shall probably have fewer tears for the passing of eloquence held in esteem by generations who gloried in the masterfulness of the forum or of the pulpit. The pulpit which made capital of such passion either in the interests of sound theology or in the flaying of dissenting sectaries, has undoubtedly lost its power. Audiences will not assemble and listen to discourse of that character. There are other types of oratory for which they have as little use, so that the way of the preacher is beset with interrogations and doubts. But even though strong speech to massed congregations must pass entirely, it may well be discarded if it must be fired by the kind of passions which inflamed this eloquence of a former age.

However fleeting may be such oratory there is an eloquence of the heart and of enriching experience which can never pass, and which is coming more and more into its own. This sort of eloquence may not succeed so well in swaying large masses of people assembled in one enclosure. It certainly ought not to try to do so by resorting to any of the trickery of the "old school" of oratory. To sweep a mass of men with spellbinding emotional appeal is not good religion, nor is it true statesmanship. If war is wrong then a challenge to fight, or the fiery answer to such a challenge, is a prostitution of oratory. Lincoln's majesty of character is nowhere more grandly revealed than in the temper of his Gettysburg speech, that address which we do not think of calling an oration, but which is the most human utterance eminent American ever spoke. The occasion was thought by most to call for oratory, and contemporaries would have acclaimed the Websterian type. They planned for and got that type in the oration of Everett on that very occasion. His grandiloquent effort was roundly applauded by the assembled multitude, while Lincoln's brief and dispassionate remarks passed without a hand-clasp, the audience being so surprised by its brevity and lack of passion, or else being unconsciously overawed by its simple majesty, that they stood or shuffled in embarrassed silence. Yet that kind of utterance lives and grows in eloquence with every passing generation. Perhaps the time and the conditions will never come when it will be acclaimed as oratory. Perhaps oratory is in decay because it deserves to decay. Perhaps a world which is wearied of incessant wrangling, and of the belligerent spirit which prompts it, is permanently out of sorts also with forensic arts which both express and foster that spirit. Perhaps we ought not to bring great assemblages of people together to have their passions played upon by pugnacious masters of word and gesture and seductive logic. Perhaps the kingdom of heaven will be more truly and more rapidly advanced by inducing people to think than by working them up to clamorous assent to what almost any trickster of the platform may for the moment convince them is the truth. Perhaps a thinking, working, serving church will prove a more eloquent testimony to the saving truth of God than will a church which stakes its all, or even its most, upon docile attention to what masterful pulpiteers declaim as the divine revelation.

Let the New Creed Be Enforced

IF the creed adopted by the board of managers of the United Christian Missionary Society is to stand, there is only one honorable course for the society to pursue, and that is strictly to enforce it. The creed was expounded in an editorial in The Christian Century two weeks ago. It is printed at the head of our correspondence section in this issue. It is the most clean-cut and unabashed effort to bind the Disciples churches, ministers and missionaries to a formula of theological opinion that has ever been made by any official body representing the entire denomination. The full significance of the action taken by the board will appear only to those who are aware that the historic genius of the Disciples has been the conviction that human creeds are schismatic. The assumed right to formulate creeds and to bind them upon men's consciences has from the days of Thomas and Alexander Campbell been regarded as one of the structural factors responsible for the breaking up of the body of Christ into innumerable sects.

Nor have the Disciples held this view as a principle of churchmanship only; for it has been their deeper conviction that the binding of a human interpretation of the Scripture upon the church or any section of the church was essentially a usurpation of the prerogative of Scripture itself, and hence a froward and impertinent invasion of the realm of divine sovereignty. "Where the Scriptures speak, we speak; and where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent"—this has been one of the most popularly used apothegms to define the mutual limits of human and divine direction in Disciples church life. The motto is not always easy to apply, it has its own inherent ambiguities; but there never was a case in which its application is more clarifying than in the matter of the proper procedure when unimmersed Christians present themselves for membership in Disciples churches. The New Testament is absolutely silent on the subject. Therefore "we" are to be silent, granting to each congregation of Christians the right to adopt a procedure in harmony with its own understanding of the mind of Christ. Clearly such an issue never presented itself to the New Testament church. According to Disciples and Baptist understanding of the New Testament church the only form of baptism practiced was immersion. There were therefore no unimmersed Christians to deal with. The problem is without the faintest help either from a "Thus saith the Lord," or a New Testament precedent.

The resolution adopted by the board of managers bases itself upon "the teaching of the New Testament as understood by this board of managers," but the board offered not a scintilla of New Testament teaching to support its creed. Nor can it do so. All the scriptures it might quote in support of the practice of immersion are irrelevant. Neither the mission churches on the foreign field, nor the churches at home which have adopted the practice of receiving unimmersed Christians into fellowship desire to practice baptism by any other mode than immersion. They show no signs of a change of conviction with respect to immersion, but they have reached the point in the developing spirit of Christian fraternity where they can no longer in good conscience insist upon the rebaptism of one who has been inducted into Christ's body by some other mode. It is not baptism that is in controversy; it is rebaptism. And there is no dogma in this day of deepening fellowship among Christ's disciples that is more repugnant to earnest seekers after Christian unity than the dogma of rebaptism. It eats the heart out of fellowship. It nullifies where it does not wholly inhibit the impulse toward unity. It is the quintessence of sectarianism, and no headway can be made in the gracious enterprise of uniting the broken family of God until this dogma is rooted up and flung away.

It is because of this vital relation of the rebaptism practice to sectarianism that the opposite practice has come to be called "the practice of Christian union" in the local church. No advocate of the more generous procedure imagines that with its introduction the goal of unity is already attained. There will remain much ground yet to be traversed. But a long stride will have been taken toward unity when this sectarian obstruction shall have been left behind.

In face of the great repugnance with which Disciples of more generous impulses regard the creed adopted by the board of managers, The Christian Century holds that the only honest course for the board now to pursue is to act upon their resolution. There are times when it is possibly defensible in ethics to resolve and then fail to act. But a situation has grown up in this communion which makes moral integrity more important than orthodoxy, more important even than the ideal of Christian unity. This resolution is only one of similar but less unambiguous resolutions adopted at other times by various Disciples organizations. None of these has been enforced. They were adopted as sops to Cerberus, and never acted upon. The latest instance, prior to the present one, was the so-called Medbury resolution adopted by the General Convention at St. Louis nearly two years ago. It provided that the officials should make an investigation of the practices and convictions of the foreign missionaries on this same subject, giving them the opportunity to indicate their opposition to open membership. If they could not conscientiously sign on the dotted line they would understand that their support would thereby automatically cease. This resolution, while adopted, was never acted upon. We believe a more wholesome condition would have obtained today if the board had undertaken in good faith to act upon it. Its nullification by inertia gave occasion to the present just charges of bad faith which the reactionary critics are hurling at the United Society.

The truth is that in recent years the Disciples official mind has become accustomed to playing fast and loose with its own convictions. Thoughtful observers of Disciple procedure cannot help wondering whether in adopting the present course the board of managers was not again playing fast and loose with its convictions. Knowing the personnel of the board as we do, we are amazed that Dr. Chilton is the only member who seemed prompted to take radical action to voice his protest against being committed to a formulation of New Testament teaching which many of his confreres on the board know as well as he is not New Testament teaching. The greatest danger in the present issue is not theological reaction, but moral disintegration. An ethical obscurantism is inevitable where convictions of truth are played with in the fashion that has been growing upon the Disciple official mind for nearly two decades. Rev. Mr. Sweeney, the author of the resolution with its creedal core, says it is irrevocable; that it is as impossible to reverse it as to reverse the eighteenth amendment. It was a great achievement of this brilliant strategist.

Very well—let it be enforced! Let every secretary and minister and missionary in the employ of the United Society, at home or abroad, be given the privilege of declaring that he is in "sincere accord" with this creed and the policy based upon it. It is hardly sufficient to say that one is in accord with it because it is the mandate of the board and one must bow in obedience to the will of the board. He must, according to the resolution which has already pledged him in advance, be in "sincere accord." That is to say, he must have some positive conviction on the subject quite apart from the authority of the board of managers, and quite apart from what he conceives to be the present state of opinion in the denomination. His accord to be "sincere" must register his own individual conviction in opposition to receiving unimmersed Christians into fellowship.

And if the board fails to take action in this direction it would hardly seem that a missionary's conscience could accept with indifference the pledge that the board has made on his behalf that he is in "sincere accord," unless he really is. The burden of initiative rests with each missionary to make it clear by his silence that he is in such accord or by his candid confession that he is not. It is hard to imagine by what sort of casuistry any other course of conduct may be devised. Whatever consequences of personal inconvenience or injury to the practical work result from this procedure, we hold that they cannot begin to compare in seriousness with the moral consequences that will result to the Disciples of Christ from the continuance of the state of untruth in which the United Society has allowed itself to become entangled.

And there are yet other aspects of this situation. The moral obligation rests not upon the missionaries and secretaries alone, but upon every member and congregation of the entire denomination. The United Society is the only agency through which Disciples churches and individuals may with confidence make their missionary and benevolent offerings. All such churches and individuals will be thrown back upon the question as to how vitally an action like this affects the ideals which lie at the root of their missionary motives. Do we give to missions just to be giving? Or do we give because the agency through which we give and the missionaries whose service our gifts support are fostering the ideals in which our hearts are enlisted? Every church must now ask itself whether it wants to propagate a form of Christianity underwritten by an unchangeable creed. As a church of Disciples, will it have the same passion in giving to a missionary society which has closed the Holy Scriptures and written into its constitutional law an interpretation of the scriptures as "unchangeable as the eighteenth amendment," and therefore impenetrable to any further light that may sometime break forth from the word of God?

This sort of speech would sound strangely familiar in Disciples ears if we were applying it to the so-called "creed-bound denominations," but it will be poignantly irritating in its application to the Disciples themselves. Yet it is no less vital and crucial an issue that the denomination faces. The issue is not the practice or non-practice of open membership. The issue is whether or not the board of managers has the right to fix upon the churches its own private interpretation of the New Testament. It is not a question of closed or open membership; it is a question of a closed or open New Testament! Is there no alternative for those who believe that the Bible is able to take care of itself without authoritative creedal interpretation, except to support a missionary organization which has decreed that its own creedal interpretation of the New Testament shall be sincerely accepted by all Christian laborers whom it has in its employ?

If the creedal resolution cannot be rescinded, we hold that the best way to find an answer to these questions is to let it be seriously enforced.

Water in the Bath Tub

A Parable of Safety the Sage

SIX days I labor and do a part of my work, and on the seventh I rise and work a little harder. And on the morning of any of the six days I stand in my Bath Room, and set the water to running, and it Runneth Slowly.

And I know the reason. For my neighbors also rise early, and swallow their Breakfast, and they run to Suburban Trains that convey them unto the City, where they buy and sell and get gain. And on the six days they leave the Hay at about the same time that I emerge. And I have a Vision of my neighbor on the right hand getting into his Tub, and my neighbor on the left hand doing the same.

Yea, and I know that my neighbor across the street and his wife, and his son and his daughter all take a morning plunge; and my neighbor around the corner, and his wife and his son and his daughter and his man-servant and his maid-servant and the stranger within their gates are all lined up at the Bath Room door.

But on the Sabbath Day, I have a vision of my neighbors taking an Extra Nap, they and their wives and their sons and their daughters and their man-servants and their maid-servants and the stranger within their gates. Therefore on that morning doth the Cold Water gush forth as it were a fountain, and the Hot Water as a Geiser. And I have abundance of water.

And I know that I can have the Same Felicity on any day of the week when I choose to rise an hour more early in the morning.

And the same is a Parable, yea, and I will make a Parable of it. And I will say unto men, If there be in life any good thing which thou desirest, and which now is forbidden thee in any large degree because it must be shared with all thy fellow-men of average ability, emerge then from the bunch of them that line up among the average: yea, rise thou a little more early in the morning, and that which thou desireth, if it be lawful and right, go after it and get it.

For the men who have attained more in this life than their competitors have largely been they who arrived at success while average men were taking their last nap, or yawning for admission to the Bath Room which was Already Occupied.

Many men of genius have I met, and the secret of success for the most of them was an Alarm Clock set an hour ahead of the Bunch.

VERSE

Shackleton

YOUR goal was not some island of the blessed,
A zone of gardens, sweet with pink and chrome;
You had no thought to find at last a home
Where you might pause, by labors unoppressed:
Fearless and strong, you set upon your quest;
Ice-fanged the ways that lured your dauntless ship,
Endless the night that held you in its grip,
But stout the heart that beat within your breast.
Your sires were Northmen, sturdy viking soul;
You rode the icebergs as a summer sea;
Their crystal peaks, their cold, strange mystery
Lured on and on—then death revealed your goal:
You dropped your anchor, dared the ghastly shade,
And faced your Captain, calm and unafraid.

Winter Joys

UPON old Winter's face I cannot look
But I do see a rosiness below;
However deep is piled the drifted snow,
Visions I have of singing bird and brook,
And flowers in every sunny forest nook;
So feel about me winds of Elfland blow,
And feel within my pulses come and go
Great joy, as when we read a golden book.
I often think that if forever we Beheld the rose its loveliness were naught—
No more to us than any common weed;
But let us lose it, lo! in memory
Reborn, within the gardens of our thought,
It fills the soul with all the joy we need.

Omnipresence

ONE on the field of battle,
One in a friend's warm heart,
One in his laboratory,
One in a poet's art,
One in a life-long sorrow,
One in the plow-turned sod,
One in the eyes of a little child—
But all alike found God.

"Not Far From Any of Us"

GOD is a vision seeking eyes,
A way that is set where no path lies,
Scattered parts that dream a whole,
Soul love that cries for soul,
Spirit asking form in all,
Will that gropes for hands, a call,
Imprisoned yearning, truth unthought—
God is a destiny unwrought.

Is the Social Gospel a Gospel?

By William S. Mitchell

IT IS the fashion, in our time, to speak of the social message of Christianity as "the social gospel." But is it really a gospel? That word has had rather a distinctive meaning through the Christian centuries. There is in it all the glad news of Christianity's Christ, the hope, the joy, the deliverance, the passion, the fervor of Christianity in flame. In using the word one is conscious of overtones of great spiritual victories and undertones of personal religious experience. The word's backgrounds are the spiritual awakenings of Christian history, those under Luther and Wesley and Whitfield and Edwards and Finney and Moody. Is there anything like this in what we call the social gospel? Is it truly an evangel or merely a Christian philosophy? Is it a message from God or merely a social theory? Is its end social salvation or merely social reconstruction?

If the truth be known it is such questions as these which are holding many men aloof from this great new movement in Christianity; men of social sympathies, responsive to the human needs of our hour and yet for whom the distinctive gospel of Christianity is still purely individualistic. Hundreds of such men find their hearts warming toward this new and mighty passion which is discovering itself in modern Christianity and yet are secretly fearful lest its acceptance may prove to be the forsaking of the central message of their faith. Is the social gospel then, in this evangelical sense, a real gospel?

THE SOCIAL WORD OF GOD

The thing which is new in the social preaching of our days is the profound and prophetic consciousness that this message is the word of God. It is this consciousness which is putting new passion into social preaching and new fervor into the preacher's heart and new responsiveness into the hearts of his hearers. Like Israel's prophets the modern social interpreters of the gospel feel profoundly that they are truly declaring God's very word to the men who live in their day. Sluggishly the conscience of Christendom is beginning to stir uneasily under the prodding of these new and impetuous prophets of a new day. Vaguely the materialistic forces are beginning to be aware that a new champion is in the field. Angrily bestirring themselves they have already bludgeoned a foe or two into silence and have issued their warnings to others but the annoyance continues and increases. Force is proving a failure in silencing these spokesmen for humanity who dare to speak boldly and who claim the authority of God for the things they say.

Is this thing which men are beginning to preach everywhere really God's word or is that merely an obsession on the part of those who preach it? One of those mad hysterias after war? A mere wave of emotionalism? Or is this thing truly a new revelation from God himself and are these men genuine prophets?

The claim of the social gospel to be truly a gospel rests surely on its ability to answer this first demand whether its message be of God, or merely of man. And the Book corroborates the claim, in truth more strikingly than it sustains the claims of that which we have always known as the gospel. Amos and Micah and Isaiah sound strangely modern to a present-day sermon taster. The things they were preaching against in their ancient day are largely the things men are preaching against in our day. The new note now appearing in the social message of Christianity, its identification with the will and word of God, is the ancient and recurring note of the prophets. It is with the same prophetic fire and passion and fearlessness that men of today are making known the will of a righteous God. From social sympathies and social service we have advanced to social reconstruction and that in the age-long spirit of Christianity which seeks to bring the whole of life and the whole of the world under the sovereignty of God.

CAN SOCIETY BE CONVERTED?

That which we have always known as the gospel founds its message supremely upon the New Testament revelation and finds its power in the saving act of Jesus Christ. Is there anything of this in the social gospel? The question is pertinent, for history shows that the prophetic preaching of social righteousness was apparently without the power to save Israel and Judah from their sins. The total of its accomplishment was the creation of a tiny group of true Hebrews, lovers of Jehovah and followers of righteousness, whom God preserved as his means of redeeming the chosen people. In contrast the whole of Christian history reveals a power which can change and redeem and transform the life of evil wherever that life is encountered. Is the social gospel a power like this? Can it convert and save and transform by a force within it which comes from God?

The crux of the problem of society, as modern Christianity sees that problem, lies here. With all our preaching of the social gospel have we actually the power to change a society which is still largely pagan into a truly Christian society? We know what is wrong with our world, and that Christ must set it right, but how is this setting right actually to be done? How can a modern city, or a modern nation, or a modern social class be converted and become Christian? If the social gospel is truly a gospel it must accomplish this miracle. Can it do it?

Any real change which is to be wrought in modern society must be deeper than mere externals. It must go farther than merely an economic revolution, a mere re-statement of social principles, a mere reconstruction of social ideals. It must affect those deeps of the human spirit which are the source of all this social world. The social structure is incredibly slow in its building and is cemented by time and sanctified by custom. It is well nigh impossible to destroy it. The ravages of war utterly removed many a town of France, razed its walls and pulverized its stones, but the guns left intact the invisible structure of its social living. Housed in new buildings erected upon streets straightened, living under new and sanitary conditions, the old social structure still persists. Old customs, social habits, economic ideas are sanctified by age, reinforced by unconscious selfishness and buttressed by class feelings we never knew we possessed. Only the dynamite of tremendous moral conviction can stir these hoary foundations and upheave them that others may take their place.

SOCIAL SIN

This much the social gospel is actually achieving through a new and swiftly growing consciousness of social sin. There is coming a new moral conviction to the folks who call themselves Christian—the conviction not that certain practices and attitudes here and there are wrong but that the whole social system in which we live must be reconstructed in accord with the Christian conscience. The social gospel is creating this conviction of sin, and any message which is able to create a conviction of sin affecting the very bases of social living is surely proclaiming a new gospel to the world.

The final test of any gospel is this, whether, having brought men to penitence for their sins, it is able to deliver them from the sins it has revealed to them. Can the social gospel do this? It has made known with increasing clearness and deepening conviction the unchristian character of modern society in its practices, its ideals, its attitudes, its very basal principles. It has brought men to see that these things are sins against the Almighty God, sins for which men must ask forgiveness, sins from which mankind must be delivered if God's will is to be done upon earth as it is done in heaven. Can the gospel which has accomplished these marvelous things in a materialistic society go any farther? Has it any dynamo apart from the recognition of the truth of its condemnations? Is there in it a power, yes, a supernatural power, which can free modern society from its sins and save it for the kingdom of God? Can the social gospel literally save social sinners and a sinning world?

Years ago, discussing this very question with Professor Harry F. Ward, the advisability of special meetings for this type of social evangelism was considered. If the writer is not mistaken, at one time Dr. Ward held several meetings of this description, devoting one week to individual evangelism and another to social evangelism. In much of the discussion of social evangelism there has been latent the idea that this was a different thing from individual evangelism. In these days there is a growing conviction that there are not two processes by which men attain the will of God, one by which they attain his will for their inner and personal life, and another by which they attain his will for their outer and social living, but that the processes are identical; in fact that any evangelism which is worthy of the name must transform the whole of life, inner and outer, personal and social, into conformity with the will of God.

ANOMALY OF CONVERSION

The anomaly of a conversion which attains an individual experience of God and utterly fails to touch and transform the social living of men has become unbearable in this day when social sin is coming to be seen so clearly. The inconceivable separation of individual living from social responsibility making it possible for the same person to enjoy a devout and holy religious experience and at the same time in his social practices commit sins in violation of the most fundamental Christian principles must end. It must be made impossible for a soul to commit itself to Christian decision and continue such social practices as for it to continue living in personal sin. If there be in fact such a thing as social sin then, for the individual, it is a matter calling for repentance and forgiveness as surely as individual sin.

An enlightened Christian conscience has become uneasy under spiritual standards which allow a man to be transformed privately but leave him still a social sinner. We are becoming impatient with the religious experience of individualism which utterly divorces itself from the moral demands for Christian social living. We are not converted by compartments. A saved man must be a saved life in all its relations or become an abnormality or a hypocrisy in the blazing light of the modern Christian conscience. When the conviction of social sin is fully established by the enlightened conscience it must take its place with all other things counted sin in the moral transformation of conversion. It is probable that the great appeal of Christianity for tomorrow will be its appeal to men to identify themselves in all the relations and responsibilities of life with Jesus Christ.

A DYNAMIC NEEDED

Can the social gospel so appeal? Can it bring in the place of the old, self-centered, indifferent life a new life as visibly changed in motive, in ideal, in dynamic as the best of the old individualistic evangelism? The hour is ripe for a new mysticism which must go hand in hand with the social gospel and furnish it with the supernatural dynamic by which it may effect its transformations of life. Frankly, if there be no such dynamic, if all that the social gospel can do is merely to change the ethical thinking of men our task cannot be accomplished. This will be increasingly clear as the social gospel comes to close grips with those great superpersonal forces of materialism which even now withstand it. We have already had a taste of that struggle in the reaction from the steel strike report. However Christian, in an individual way, the individual members of these vast corporate social personalities may be, the personalities themselves are not Christian. Their fighting ground is established by centuries of custom, by all the sanctions of habit and privilege and way of thinking. Even to question the right to it is to threaten the social sanctities. They are entrenched with all the ramifying system of the money and political powers and the control of these over the very thinking of men. They have at stake the things for which this present world will fight the hardest—privilege and power and money. "This kind goeth not out save by fasting and prayer!" "Verily we fight against principalities and powers!" It will take the power of the living God to deliver men and to deliver social groups and classes from these powers of sin. We have been so in habit in our later thinking of discounting the supernatural and its part in our social achievements that we have come to reduce the coming of the kingdom to a merely educational process whereas the very desperateness of the struggle before us must make new and mighty demands upon God. The man who does not see that this thing in which we engage is to be the great spiritual struggle of Christian history is blind to the nature of its facts and to the source from which deliverance must come.

THE GROUP CONSCIOUSNESS

The most interesting phase of the vast social transformation we are about to witness will be that involving the social group and its conversion, if we may term it so. Not only must we bring individual men and women to new and Christian ideals of social life but we must literally redeem great social groups—corporations, classes, communities, nations, races. The group consciousness has not played a very large part in our later religious conceptions of sin and salvation. During the war, on the day set apart by the President as a day for penitence and prayer, the writer searched his particular denominational hymnal through from cover to cover to find appropriate hymns—and could not find them. He was not alone in this experience. Hymns expressing individual and personal contriteness for sin there were in plenty, but not one confessing the sin of the nation, of the group; and yet it was with this conception precisely that the prophets had most to do. Not until there comes a new consciousness of social guilt as well as social sin will we be able to reach the seat of the disease which is threatening the destiny of our modern world.

Strangely, in message and method, we are being driven back to the prophets. There we will find how we may reintroduce the lost consciousness of group sin into religion. It can come only as the prophets knew it, through the identification of the noblest, loftiest moral conscience of the age with the sinning group. As we read we see the prophets sink their flaming souls into the vast, indifferent, sinning mass of the nation. They are not apart from the nation. They are a part of it. Israel's tragedy and Judah's shame are theirs. If the nation go down to sheol they will go with her. The method of the prophet is the only method which will introduce into the vast, indifferent masses of a modern world the spiritual dynamic of God.

THE SAVING REMNANT

It is the modern version of the old doctrine of the Remnant. Society must be saved by the smaller group within it which is conscious of both sin and remedy. If social redemption is to be accomplished the Christian must have a part in it, not stand aloof as a bystander awaiting the conversion of the socially unregenerate. He must profoundly identify himself with the sinning group, whether that group be his corporation, his community, his class or his nation. That is what he is in the world for. He is salt, and salt is for saving. He is a contact point with God in a world that knows not God and cares not for God.

Not until the Christian community in a world of sin is conscious of this identification and burdened with its responsibility and crying out to God for the deliverance of its sinning group will deliverance come. It will be out of such spiritual travail and vicarious suffering must come new and vaster spiritual processes which are to deliver our world.

It will not be an easy thing, this gospel for a new day. At present it is militant in its assault upon wrongs so anciently entrenched as to seem a veritable part of the divine plan for the world. But into it, before its evangel is finished, must come all the passionate, tragic earnestness and yearning of the prophets, and of Christ; but the end is sure—this world must become the kingdom of the Christian's prayer. That end will surely come. We, who go into the highways and byways as the messengers of a gospel despised, resisted, hated, will certainly suffer many things for the gospel we preach, but we will help to bring in the Day. In the Day it will be remembered, as in the morning, that there were those who never saw the sunrise but whose faith and labors helped to bring the dawn, and that will be our reward.

Is Germany Repentant?

By George Stewart, Jr.

“IS Germany repentant?” This is the first question anyone who has been in Germany recently will be asked upon his return. If you mean repentant in the evangelical sense, one must answer the question in the negative. If you ask whether or not large sections of the German people are sorry for the war and for their share in it, the answer would be in the affirmative. It is impossible to judge the attitude of Germany or of any nation as a whole because of special sections and classes which feel differently and are in point of fact in different degrees responsible. Our tendency to look upon all Germans indiscriminately as of one mind is a survival of war days.

During the war the peoples of every belligerent nation were victimized by their own propaganda. News was artificially selected. Reports were only partial representations of the facts. Germany conceived of France not as composed of millions of Frenchmen, but as one composite Frenchman which they hated and feared. In German propaganda England was looked upon as one man, cruel, oppressive, and bent upon the destruction of the Fatherland. Russia, Italy, and America were alike personified and hated in the fashion that men despise individual foes. We of the allies in our turn generalized, Germans and all mid-Europeans were typified by one figure. He was here represented in one of our 1918 liberty loan posters. Germany was a big brute of a man with no vestige of civilization or humanity in his features, with bloody boots and the figure of a gorilla. He was the incarnation of murder, rapine, and all horrors. This grouping by all nations of whole enemy peoples into one type, and hating them as one person, has led to false ideas and continues to make difficult the task of those who are seeking to bring about eco-conomic and political harmony. For purposes of war it may be necessary to seize upon a type and direct a nation's hatred toward it. It certainly makes more easy the task of those who must foster nationalist enthusiasms and hatreds in order to sell loans, get necessary troops and keep the nation geared up to war time tasks, but it does not conduce to accurate thinking, nor to historical precision in viewing the events of recent years.

MONARCHISTS NOT ALL ARROGANT

"Is Germany repentant?" The question is impossible to answer by saying yes or no. I talked with many Germans last summer. They included officers and men now in service, ex-soldiers of different grades, working men and women, trainmen, farmers, church leaders, labor leaders, students, professors, an ex-chancellor, and other political leaders. I hazard the following observations, knowing full well that other investigators may have gotten different or even opposite impressions.

First off, one must distinguish between the return of the monarchy and an attitude of unrepentant arrogance upon the part of the German. One will meet many Germans anxious for a return of the monarchy who are sincerely sorry for their part in the recent conflict. They maintain that a government of and by the people is as possible under a monarchy as under a republican form of government. Again, the return of the monarchy does not mean a return of the Kaiser. I found no German whose opinion I thought would be valued in his country who wished a return of the former emperor or any of his house. Most all the old officer class with whom I talked wanted a return of the monarchy. Likewise many of the professors and elder churchmen desired the old order. They had been very happy, as they said, under the emperor and now they were suffering severely, many from lack of food and clothing. The students were variously estimated on this point, but probably fifty per cent desire a king under some sort of constitutional government. The labor unionists form nearly a solid bloc for the maintenance of the status quo. The question of the desirability of a monarchy is a matter entirely apart from the question of repentance and war guilt. With the Germans, constituted as they are, trained to external discipline and a paternalistic form of government it is fairly arguable that a monarchy might be the best instrument for disentangling the confused skein of German affairs, both internal and external.

A DIFFICULT QUESTION

And now to attempt an answer to the question, "Is Germany repentant," I recall a fine looking German boy struggling to achieve his university training. He was as open and frank as a college boy of his age in England or America. He said: "I entered the war with two million other German youths at the age of sixteen. I went in from pure motives of patriotism, the same way you enlisted in the American army. You cannot as a reasonable man think we were two million baby killers. We were lied to here as you were lied to there. They told you that Belgian children were having their hands cut off. Our press told us that the Belgians were burning out our soldiers' eyes. I know you think we were the aggressors. We cannot think that we were. We regret the war. We long for reconciliation, but we want both sides to admit they were wrong." Here one finds a difficult and serious problem which can't be gotten rid of by saying, "Make them pay until they do repent." If numbers of grown up men believe a certain thing, even though it be false, especially if they are serious minded men, it cannot be driven out of their heads by threats or fines. This sort of devil does not come out that way. There must be some method of getting together with these younger intelligentsia of Germany and revealing ourselves to them and having them expose themselves to us. Only then will we understand each other. They didn't cause the war any more than we in the American Army caused it. They and we went to the colors when our country called. That was all we knew. After that most of us believed what we were told and asked no questions.

Why aren't the Germans repentant, one always asks oneself, when they face and have faced since 1914 the moral indignation of Christendom. There are several reasons which partially account for the German attitude and which must be reckoned with regardless of what our own particular desires may be in the matter. In the first place, German officials charged with the conduct of the war were ceaseless in their efforts to create the impression that Germany was attacked. The war on all fronts was a conflict of press agents, pamphleteers, public speeches, and nationalist religions, as well as a struggle between armed hosts, and nowhere more than in Germany. Thought was directed and controlled probably to a greater extent in Germany than in any other country engaged.

THE HUNGER BLOCKADE

In the second place, the maintenance of the hunger blockade against the whole of Germany for nearly six months after the signing of the armistice first puzzled and then inflamed whole areas of the population, especially the educated classes. A German university graduate said to me, "We sank the Lusitania, thousands of us hated that dirty work. It was shameful, not truly German. But you maintained the hunger blockade, not against an army only, but against a whole civilian population and caused the death, at the lowest possible estimate by neutral observers, of ten thousand children a month from malnutrition. They became so puny that the least puff of disease carried them off. There have been grievous wrongs on both sides. Can the kettle call the pot black? Why should repentance be on one side only? It merely inflames our people to be told that they alone are in the wrong."

A third reason for German bitterness is that they feel the Fourteen Points, on the basis of which they maintain that they signed the document of November 11, 1918, have each and every one been violated in the peace treaty of 1919. As an instance of this, I heard a distinguished German official say that under Wilson's points, frontier partitioning had to do only with areas where there were dominant foreign elements in the population. Contrary to this interpretation, German territory has been taken where the population has been overwhelmingly German and put under the control of the allied and associated powers such as Danzig and Memel. The Germans also maintain that they were given to understand that disarmament was to take place pari passu among all the belligerents.

THE SILESIAN SETTLEMENT

A fourth cause which, according to German opinion, perpetuates bitterness and prolongs war feeling was the settlement of Upper Silesia. A German official said: "We regard it as follows: that in terms of Wilson's Fourteen Points, a uniform and complete self determination should take place for the entire disputed area. The powers declared that that portion where many Poles were resident should have a separate self-determination; on the basis of the vote taken, two-thirds decided for Germany. Formerly no one ever thought of giving each community a separate right to vote. There is no doubt, and I believe no American will doubt, that if as a result of the vote, the decision of the majority was for Polish sovereignty, the supreme council would have quickly given the territory to Poland. Some two and a half months have passed (this was spoken in July) and the worst sort of conspiracy has taken place since the transfer in spite of the votes of the people of this territory for union with Germany. To this must be added the fact that industrially Upper Silesia is a unity. The economic development is an evidence of the efficiency of German administration. It is one large centralized organization with water and electric power and other industrial facilities. If this territory is broken up it will be like cutting off a horse's leg. Three-fourths of the horse will not remain. If Upper Silesia is divided both Poles and Germans will lose." This at least represents the view of large sections of the German people. Since this utterance was made the Supreme Council divided Upper Silesia, on the whole unfavorably to German claims. This action was followed by a terrific upheaval in exchange and a fall in the German mark. The German press probably overestimated the weight which they thought should be given German claims for Silesian territory and minimized the Polish rights to the same. At any rate, Germany was united on the proposition that nearly the whole of the disputed territory should have come to Germany and the decision of the supreme council came as a shock which cannot help but increase or at least prolong the spirit of turmoil and unrest within Germany, whether reasonably or unreasonably.

ARMISTICE MISUNDERSTANDINGS

A fifth reason why Germany is unrepentant is due to the presence of the armies of occupation. The British and American armies are fairly well liked. There is even some intermarriage between the officers and men of these armies and the women of the Rhineland cities. The soldiers are well equipped and splendidly disciplined. The French troops are good fighting troops and on the whole well disciplined, but a good deal of unfortunate bitterness has been stirred up against them because of the presence of colored troops. Some of these colored troops are Negroes and some are dark skinned soldiers from North Africa who are not Negroes. Anti-French agitators have made the most of this situation and have aroused a great deal of indignation within and without Germany against the French for having these troops in the occupied territory.

Yet another reason for German unrepentance may be found in the armistice. The armistice was an entirely different transaction from that which took place between Grant and Lee at Appomattox. The German maintains that the armistice was not an unconditional surrender of a defeated foe. To the German invariably it was a cessation of hostilities by a nation still under arms, not in full rout, but only in process of being decisively defeated. As a German official put it, "We have made terms on the field and you seek to impose a verdict upon us. We treated for peace as a nation under arms, you seek to try us as a criminal." Again I say when we are seeking the rehabilitation of the world, we must take into consideration what men are actually thinking and not go forward on the supposition that they are thinking what we wish they would think. For the purposes of peace, it may have been best to continue the conflict until an unconditional surrender should have been won. But that question is impossible of settlement for it remains entirely in the realm of conjecture.

The foregoing are but some of the elements which enter into the fear, hate, and remorse complexes of the German mind. They are matters which must be frankly met by allied diplomats, professors, merchants, students, publicists, travelers, and all those who examine and influence the thought currents of the nations. We need to know what one another is thinking and why. Then we may begin again with truer understanding than ever before to win each other's confidence. The present situation cannot endure. It is intolerable. All the past interests of life such as scholarship, art, science, religion, at their best know no national boundary lines and those who value these finest things are increasingly clamoring, "Give us no more lies and propaganda. Let us know the worst. Let us know our mistakes we have made, and the misunderstandings about us, and we will try to bring about accord and understanding." The world is not whole without Germany, Austria, or Hungary any more than it is whole without France or Italy or England.

NONE ASSUME RESPONSIBILITY

Is Germany repentant? The student classes generally, although they deeply regret the war and are suffering as much as any one group because of it, feel they were fighting a defensive warfare. The propaganda of their government succeeded in getting all classes to believe they were attacked. Many of the older professors and churchmen who were able to take a little more detached viewpoint than the younger men hold the opinion that the Kaiser's advisers were responsible for the fatal march into Belgium which brought about the indignation of the world. It is difficult to get any one class to place the responsibility upon another group and impossible to discover any group which will voluntarily assume the blame for the violation of the treaty protecting Belgium.

The old officer class will nearly always seek to justify their actions throughout the war on grounds of military necessity. But this class is not as powerful as it once was and does not represent Germany as a whole. The labor unionists almost unanimously feel that the military group got the nation into the war and is responsible for all the ills to which Germany is now the victim. But here one will find little "repentance," for the workers by and large disassociate themselves from the militarists and see no reason why they should be remorseful for actions over which they had no control. They regret the war exceedingly and feel that they are victims of it in common with the laboring people of all nations.

One can formulate no simple statement of the way the German people feel regarding the war because they feel variously. And in answer to the question as to whether or not the citizens of Deutschland are repentant, one can only say nearly all are very sorry the war came on and some feel that certain classes are to blame, but it is difficult to find any one class or group which says, "We are the culprit, visit the blame on us."

Religious Advertising that is Different

By Guy Emery Shipler

RELIGIOUS advertising up to the present has centered almost exclusively around one idea; its purpose has been to appeal to people directly to go to church. For a good many years it has seemed to me that this type of advertising can never be really result producing, no matter how effectively the copy may be written and displayed—and heaven knows, most religious advertising has been of a sort to make the gods weep. I am not setting myself up as an authority in the matter of religious advertising, but every man has the privilege of getting a "bug," and it's hard to keep him from telling the world about it if the bug is restless enough.

The tendency of modern advertising has been toward telling in one's copy, as clearly as it is possible to put the story into words, what it is that one has to sell. It seems to me that the policy of such churches as do advertise has been to conceal as effectively as possible what it is that the church has to sell. The fellow "on the street" who hasn't gone to church since he was in school isn't going to miss his Sunday morning snooze, his slippers and newspaper and Mutt and Jeff just because some person announces in the Saturday evening paper that there will be a service at such and such a church Sunday morning, at such and such a time. Even if the person announces that he is going to preach on his recent trip to Mars that chap who used to go to church as a boy isn't very likely to give up his Sunday morning at home. He can find equally startling topics discussed in the best journalistic style in his Sunday newspaper. If he goes to church to hear something not so good he is under the added affliction of not being able to wear his slippers and smoke his favorite brier. Why disturb the Sunday morning peace of the universe?

THE CHURCH AS A MEMORY

Furthermore, this home loving person has his own idea of what the church is interested in—and he can't discover that he reacts with any great alacrity to the thing that he thinks the church has to tell him. When he was in Sunday School he heard a heap of talk about queer people who lived several thousand years ago, and was warned that he had better watch his step or he would find the climate into which he graduated from this present world not at all the sort of climate he would choose to live in. All this sort of thing he has grown to consider "bunk." He remembers the blood-curdling sermons he used to hear; he supposes that the parsons of today are still talking about the same sort of thing. Why doesn't the church grow up, he asks.

Well, he's right about some of it. Here and there clergymen are still trying to scare people into being good by grotesque descriptions of a place they have never seen, and telling them that they had better purchase first class tickets for heaven. Men who are gifted in such picturesque description—witness Billy Sunday—get large publicity. What the chap who stays at home on Sunday doesn't know is that these noise makers are passing rapidly off the stage, and that the average clergyman today is a college trained man, with a three years' theological training on top of that, and that he has gone through enough philosophy and science and history to have pretty sound mental balance. He has had enough of the best that modern scholarship can give to feel deeply the bad publicity given to Christianity by those in the past who have so misrepresented it, and who have been responsible for keeping sane men away from church in their mature life. How is the modern clergyman to get out of the mind of the man who stays away the belief that the church is still teaching the same sort of "rot" it taught him as a boy?

"CORDIALLY INVITED"

In attempting to answer this question I shall reveal, I hope, what I meant by saying that the church has got to have a different type of advertising than it has already had. In these days if a manufacturer of high grade automobiles wants to sell his product, he employs the best copy writers obtainable to do the task as well as it can be done. And what he wants done is the creation of copy that will describe as clearly as possible his product; what it looks like, what features it has that other cars lack, what he thinks it will do. If he can afford it, he obtains the best artist he can find—or that his advertising agent can find—to show the car as effectively as it can be shown on paper. He knows that to buy space in an advertising medium and merely announce that he is making an automobile and request people to come and look at it is a waste of money. They won't come.

Now the church advertising that is in vogue today is exactly this latter type of advertising. The church announces, usually in one inch, single column space, that there will be a service at eleven o'clock tomorrow and that the Rev. Mr. Blank will preach on the Great White Way. "You are cordially invited to be present," is added with the idea, apparently, that the chap who likes his slippers and Sunday paper is going forthwith to desert them to come to church. He won't do it anymore than he will come to see an automobile just because he is cordially invited to come.

I have said that the average man who hasn't gone to church since his youth believes that the church is still preaching and teaching what it taught in those days. How is he ever to know what it really is teaching unless the church tells him? And how is the church to tell him unless it catches him off guard when he is reading his newspaper or magazine? So my point is that the church has got to show, as clearly as words can show it, what the church has to "sell" today. It can, by a wise use of newspaper and magazine space, reach almost every man and woman who doesn't go to church, and who will never know what the church stands for unless he learns it from the printed word. The church has a message for every human being. Why not give every human being a knowledge of what that message is?

For example, what does the man who doesn't go to church know about what the church today has to say on the subject of right relations in industry? If he picked up his newspaper or magazine and saw a brief, telling message on that subject, is it not likely that his reaction would be something like this: "Well, if the church is teaching that sort of thing I guess I'd better get around and hear more of it." Or, suppose a man has suffered a great affliction. Suppose as a result he finds himself becoming embittered with life, hating people because, possibly, his confidence in someone has been betrayed. The game isn't worth the candle, he decides. Now the church has a helpful message for such a man. Why not give it to him, unselfishly, in the only way it can be given, that is, through the printed word?

The time is coming, I am convinced, when the Gospel will be preached in newspapers and magazines through the use of as extensive space as is now used by commercial organizations. The church will outgrow its selfish motive in advertising, that is, to fill its pews. (This, I firmly believe, is the estimate the average non-churchgoer places on the type of church advertising now in vogue.) If it tells its story, and it has a great and moving story to tell, it will reach millions of people it is not now reaching. And incidentally, it will find its pews filling up.

STORY OF CHRISTIANITY

Some day a great interdenominational organization will finance such an advertising campaign—some such organization as the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. The Interchurch Movement campaign was a passing move in this direction. It will buy full pages in newspapers and magazines to tell the story of Christianity, and will tell it through the use of the best brains that can be employed. I have a feeling that if some one of our great advertising agencies could catch the vision, it could itself start a campaign that would force the churches into the sort of undertaking I have outlined.

In the meantime the church federation of any one of our cities could do much in changing the type of advertising now used—and generally conceded to be futile—into the type of which I write. If all the churches in any one city would double their advertising appropriations, or even increase them by one-third, the extra space could be used each week to tell the sort of story that will sell Christianity to multitudes of people. The individual church service notices could still be appended, so that they would act as a directory for those who are interested sufficiently by the general message to go to church to hear more of it. To me it seems incomprehensible that this sort of thing hasn't long since been done. Every year the Advertising Club of America devotes a part of its program to the discussion of religious advertising. One wonders why it has apparently been so barren of results. Churches still go on running their little announcements of services each week—and effectively concealing the nature of their goods. It remains for some national interdenominational agency to display a bit of the sense and brain power of the commercial houses who have products they believe in and know can be sold.

Mending

By Winfred Rhoades

I USED to feel a bit miffed at times because the women of my family did not rush to the chance of doing my mending. Now I understand better, since I have sat with slow needle in awkward hand, and spent laborious hours over a single great fissure in the foot of one of my woolen golfers, or irksomely replaced lost buttons with so many thicknesses of thread that it would require the pull of Giant Despair himself to tear them off again. A cabin dweller learns to do many things.

It is good, perhaps, for a man to sit wearied over such tasks sometimes, and to discover that mending is a serious matter. We who have held ourselves, during all the centuries from the Old Stone Age onward, as lords of creation, take it for granted that women are to the manner born—that they come into the world with fingers itching, as it were, for the feel of needle and thimble and a job of mending, the more tedious the better. But mayhap they also would prefer to sit and read great books, or go out for a glorious hour on snowshoes. Nowadays when, a rent appearing, a woman says to me, "Oh, please let me do it!" I deem that I have met a notable example of self-sacrifice, or else have been honored with a signal mark of affection. Do not I know from experience how the minutes lengthen into hours, while the brook sings to me of pleasant resting-places, and the sun darts the invitation of its transitory beams, and the flowers lift up to me the promise of wild nose-gays, and all shouts to me to come out and play?

And yet, after all, is not mending one of the fine pursuits of life? It is something to restore rags to respectability, and to put back the broken into the active uses of life. And when it comes to broken fences, broken utensils, broken motor cars, broken bones, broken health—daily experience reveals much that needs to be mended, and calls for many a one to join in the business of mending. We cannot, nor would we if we could, be forever throwing the old to the rubbish heap and buying new. We have not money enough to buy new garments and new houses every day; and new hearts, personalities, and new worlds are not to be found in every market. The old must be taken, rent and worn and broken as it is, and reclaimed for further and better uses. And when little duds, used so hard in the day's play, are made ready at night by patient stitch for more play and more schooling the next day—when lacerated sensibilities are healed with comfort and a kiss—when disappointed hopes are taught to find happiness in some other way—when oft, oft broken vows are encouraged to yet another effort—when weakened spirits are made strong and brave for the conflicts and victories of life—when the endeavor to help some fellow human renews itself again and again in spite of repeated frustrations—have we not before our eyes mute but eloquent witness to the most beautiful thing in the world, that heaven-making passion which beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things, and which never faileth?

It would seem therefore as if this ancient and honorable occupation of mending must continue to be one of the world's momentous tasks, at any rate until the world is become a vastly better place than we have yet known. Regarded from the standpoint of its potentialities, mending assumes a new dignity and distinction in the eyes of those who would fain have a share in making the world that is to be. Would it not be very pleasant, for instance, if one could hang out a shingle:

BROKEN HEARTS MENDED HERE

—and then behold the sad faces that might enter one's office go forth some while later wreathed in the smiles of new hopes? Or suppose the neat black and gold sign at one's door should invite passers-by with this legend:

MORAL STANDARDS CAREFULLY REPAIRED

Would it not be a pleasing thing to take the cracked and broken morals that should be run upon in a day's contacts with folk, and build them up into something even more durable and more precious than their former state? Wherever one may turn his eyes, the significant task of mending calls aloud to be done. It thrills the blood to read in some great biography of the large achievements of a world-visioning, constructive statesman. But even the days of a statesman—not the noisy, hollow imitation whose blatant demagoguery and narrow provincialism have so much cursed the world, but the man who is patiently trying to leave the world a better place than he found it—cannot be altogether given to the fair new visions that enrapture his soul; they must be often spent at mending. Yet through this weary task of mending the statesman works toward the realization of his vision of the world that ought to be.

Very likely the office whose humble shingle offered the repair of hearts and morals would not be beset by scrambling crowds as would that office which blazoned before the multitude an invitation to come and have its fortunes mended. So many appear to prefer broken hearts to broken pocketbooks; and as for ideals—too, too often are they flung away for a bauble of pleasure or for the blinding glitter of a few cents. We have in the world a worthy and much bewhacked company of reformers, but, alas! how many are content rather to be conformers! The slimy pleasures that they see others engage in, they also hug to their bosoms; the world-ruinous practices whose mischief is ever before their eyes, these also they do not spurn. Miserable conformers!

MIRACLES IN LIFE-MENDING

Yet if one elect to use the implements and engage in the tasks of the mender, he shall find oftentimes that for him opportunity is to be spelled with a large letter. One hears people speak scoffingly, sometimes, of the social worker's task, this job of mending, as mere palliative work, and a misuse of energy. But it does not end with palliation; in its larger outlook and farther reaches it is miracle-working in its nature. Can I not relate—no, sometimes one dare not tell even the precious and luminous things of life too precisely. It is one of the consolations of memory, however, to think of those cracked or warped moral natures that were dealt with, so that the family became ethical leaders among their associates and the children became standard-bearers of ideals for their friends. It is a never dulling pleasure to recall to mind the young lives that have gone forth from homes where much work of ethical mending was needed to positions of trust and importance and worthy leadership in the world. To think of the hampered whose lives have blossomed forth into things of beauty and of idealistic service, to think of the unpromising homes that have been touched by the transmuting power of aroused aspiration, to think of honor enthroned where dishonor had threatened to become dominant, to think of loyal citizenship and transfiguring Christianity nurtured and brought to strength in lives where the issue seemed likely to be far otherwise—and then to place by the side of these memories the thought of the humble workers and their simple, sincere doings that had some share, in the difficult, crucial days, in bringing about the present worthy result: this is to know somewhat of one of the high joys of life. To all men is open some measure of opportunity to strive for such ends; but those whose daily calling affords them the personal contacts with individuals in the hour of stress which especially opens the way to this kind of endeavor—let them not fail to recognize for what great ends they may work, nor to rejoice in the fine quality of their privilege.

Is not this kind of labor, then, miracle-working in its nature? That which began as a task of mending is found in the end to have been a work of transformation and transfiguration. And if the manifest successes are fewer than the worker's ardent spirit pines for, yet successes he does see; and he knows, moreover, that in his daily labor he has not forgotten the greatest ends, but has tried to have a share in that dear vision of the mending of mankind, "Behold, I make all things new."

Shall We Forgive the War Debt?

GREAT BRITAIN is willing to say "Forgive us our debts and we will forgive our debtors." Should Uncle Sam say "We will forgive our debtors if they will forgive their debts"? The question is both, "Can we collect" and "Have we a right to collect even if we can"? It is an economic question upon which the rebuilding of the world may hang, and it is an ethical question upon which the salvation of our national soul may depend. On both counts it is an interesting study in the fundamental laws of both economics and ethics; and obedience to those laws is much more important today than any consideration of political opportunism or national advantage. We will learn by experience if we do not accept in faith that it is better to give than to receive, and also that the fundamental laws of politics, economics and ethics are the same.

We went into the war to save democracy; it was the greatest adventure in national idealism and the most profound example of national vicarious sacrifice ever made. But for our intervention Prussianism would not have been effectually and forever defeated; perhaps it would not have won outright, but it might have won a draw. Such a result would not have discredited Prussianism in Germany as it now is, nor would its ideals have been so effectually defeated in those other nations which have harbored the spirit of Prussianism through milder and less militant forms. So when Europe says, "Cancel the debts because that would redeem you from your failure to pay your full part in the war," we say, "No; we had no obligation to fight; it was your war; German guilt was black but whose hands were clean? We challenge you to open your archives to the impartial world and publicly to review your own imperialism." Germany made the war and the full proof of her better national mind today is given only when she acknowledges it, but she has a right to ask "Who in Europe is without sin?"

Will We Help Win the Peace?

We gave proof positive of our sacrificial purpose when we refused to share in the spoils of war. All others among the victors added colonies to their domains and demanded indemnities on their war expenses; we accepted nothing but the glory of having fought a good fight in a good cause. Will we now help to win the peace? It is as important as to win the war, for the victors are suffering today from the maladies from which we helped them to purge the Germans. The peace is a selfish, vengeful peace. Europe is not willing to listen to Almighty God who says, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay." No one was willing to accept American idealism at Versailles, and America herself refused to give up to her own ideals in peace as she had fought for them in war.

The men in Europe who see farthest see no way to win the peace unless America helps as she helped in the war. They keep their confidence that we will return to our war idealism in our peace purposes. At Washington we turned away from an opportunity to build the greatest navy in the world, voluntarily surrendering a superiority which any European nation before the war would have leaped to grasp. That renews confidence in us. Will America now, in like manner, turn away from the Shylock temper that demands the full pound of flesh in war debts and extend to a ruined economic Europe the same hand of help that we extended to a Europe threatened with the ruin of a century's gain in democracy?

Austria is bankrupt. But for relief agencies a million people would have starved to death this winter. Her money is worthless and her credit gone. England offers to give her a twenty year moratorium on her war debts if other creditors will join. The others all agree except Italy who says she will agree when America does. Austria owes us only $24,000,000—a mere bagatelle in her whole obligation and a picayune to our national wealth; but the whole scheme of relief is held up by our inaction, and millions suffer. In the same apparent spirit of indifference congress passes the refunding law. It definitely requires our European debtors ultimately to pay, and to begin now paying interest. We have a right to say, "You owe it legally; the war was not ours; we could have demanded that you repay us even our own war expenditures so far as any obligation to fight with you was concerned." But morally there is just as much to be said for a complete and utter forgiveness of the debts as there was for an entry into the war.

* * *

The Balance Sheet in Europe

Our late allies now owe us on principal and accrued interest roughly $11,000,000,000; it will be $12,000,000,000 before they can expect to begin to pay. Britain owes us approximately five billion, France three and Italy two. The others owe Britain as much as she owes us. If we cancelled England's debt to us she would cancel theirs to her; this would leave her even and relieve the others of double what they owe us.

Britain's debt is $39,300,000,000, or one-third her national wealth. France's debt is $46,000,000,000 or one-half her national wealth. Italy's debt is $18,000,000,000 or one-half her national wealth. Belgium owes $4,000,000,000 or one-third her total wealth. Germany's total indebtedness, including indemnities under the treaty, is $80,000,000,000 and her national wealth is $83,000,000,000. (Figures from Banker's Institute, London). We say to France, "Pay." France answers, "We cannot pay you until Germany pays us." And we wonder how Germany can pay for both if she cannot pay for herself. Our total debt is $24,000,000,000, or one-fifteenth our national wealth. Britain's debt averages $600 per capita, France's $1,250, Italy's $300, America's $215, and Germany's $1,350. No European government has as yet been able to balance its budget. Britain could if she did not have to pay a billion and a half a year for unemployment doles and would reduce her armies of occupation in Egypt and elsewhere as she has done in Mesopotamia and Ireland. France could if she would demobilize two-thirds of her vast military force of 800,000 men and put them to work. Germany could if she were given a moratorium on indemnities and extended credit for raw materials so she could manufacture to advantage.

There are 2,000,000 unemployed in Britain, which means that one-seventh of her population are in distress, unproductive and must be kept alive by taxation. In America there are 3,500,000 out of work which means that one-eighth of our people are non-productive and consuming their savings. In France the 800,000 in military units are unproductive and their support is piling the national debt higher. In Germany there are only about 500,000 unemployed, but the revival of industry is probably only temporary, owing to the extreme cheapness of goods to other countries which the fall of the German mark occasioned. When the mark went down there was a great rush into the German market from surrounding countries and a temporary revival of industry, but unemployment is now increasing, raw materials are nearing exhaustion, agriculture is in as bad a way as it is here in America, wages will buy less than half the goods they would buy in the pre-war days and there is no national credit. Lloyd George says, "Germany is near an utter collapse."

This is a distressing picture of continental woe, and Russia is not in it. A special committee from the American Chambers of Commerce returns home to report that 300,000,000 people in Europe are living on 30 per cent of the normal supply of food and raw material. England's export trade is down 63 per cent and she lives by export trade. America's exports were $3,743,000,000 less the past year than the year before. Germany is still buying more than she is selling and ex-premier Nitti says giving credit to such countries as Poland, Austria and Hungary is like taking a mortgage on the clouds.

How We Can Help

Two things must be done, namely, expenses must be reduced and credit must be extended. France was irritated by the McCormick resolution asking that we be shown budgets before we grant extensions of time on interest payments. When a good bank gets into a situation that threatens to ruin its working capacity other banks confer and tide it over; but they see to it that speculation and useless expenditures are cut out. Europe has vast working capacity; in fact, its potential earning power is about all it has. We can save that potential power through credit and we alone have the credit power. We have $3,000,000,000 of gold—more than all Europe together, and we cannot eat it or use it to raise the value of farm produce or pay wages. Gold is like water; it cannot carry trade unless it is liquid. It may be our curse unless we release it to redeem European money from an inflation that means bankruptcy. Military expenses and frozen credit are ruining the world economically. We have a right to say we will thaw out the credit only on condition that our debtors scrap the military establishments.

Last June I saw acres of unsalable cotton in the south. In July I saw an army of unemployed in England with 500,000 idle cotton spinners among them, and in August I found that there were 5,000,000 idle spindles in Germany—and millions are underclothed this winter. Wheat is so cheap our farmers cannot raise it without loss and bread is so dear in all Central Europe that the masses cannot buy it unless the governments pile up their debts by granting bread subsidies. Three hundred million Europeans are on a deficit economy over there, and in Britain and America millions are unemployed because they cannot get their goods through to those who need them.

To grant a moratorium on all war debts, indemnities included, would help to restore balances and revive credit. We could loosen that endless band of paper money that is choking economic life in Europe by either cancelling what they owe us and taking long-time credits on our gold supply and raw materials, or by administering what is due on their behalf as we did the Chinese indemnity. To do it we shall have to experience a renewal of that idealism which enabled us to make the sacrifices of war, but we need that to save our own national soul. When the allies borrowed of us they did not borrow money but war munitions. Thus if we give them back their notes we give them the munitions, and it is as logical for us to give them the munitions they gave us notes for as it was to give them the billions of dollars we used through our own armies on their behalf. It is just as good business and it is the same kind of morality, and they can no more recover from war's aftermath of ruin without such help from us than they could have won the war without our help. It is good economics and it is good ethics; the one is the body and the other the soul of the matter.

British Table Talk

London, January 30, 1922.

ALL the other news of this morning is overshadowed by the tidings that Sir Ernest Shackleton is dead. It is perhaps the part of such gallant adventurers to keep before mankind the call to live dangerously; only on such terms is our tenancy of this earth to be held with honor. And without any question the bracing influence of such men as Scott and Shackleton and all their peers falls upon the ethical ideals of the human race. Sir Ernest Shackleton, like so many of the great explorers, was a strong believer in the nearness and friendliness of the unseen Power. He was a mystic, who was conscious of Another present with him in the white and lonely spaces. Of this experience of his he made no secret. Others might reason and welcome, he knew that the unseen Friend was with him.

The Storm-Cones of Controversy Hoisted

There are still more signs of a revival of controversy in ecclesiastical circles. The attack made by Dr. Dixon upon certain English Baptists has been warmly and indignantly answered by Dr. Carlile. One passing reference may not be out of place. There is no reason why our brethren in America should not take their fellows in this country to task, but it is difficult to conduct a discussion except by cable, between America and England. The result is that an attack has an unfair start, and everyone knows how hard it is to overtake a misstatement or misapprehension with the smallest start. How much more with a month between! For one who reads the correction there are a hundred who miss it, so that it is conceivable that many readers in America led by Dr. Dixon really imagine that Mr. Fullerton and Dr. Shakespeare are dangerous teachers. We who know them are not moved in the least by such charges. We simply say, "Well! well!" and pass on. On our side the London Missionary Society has had to suffer grave misunderstandings from attacks in the press based upon entirely misleading selections. It may relieve some of our friends to read a selection carefully left out by these critics. It was passed practically unanimously by its board—the only dissentients being two members for whom the rest of the resolution was not strong enough on the side of evangelical truth: "The directors avail themselves of this opportunity to state clearly, both for themselves and their missionaries, that the Society holds loyally and firmly to the fundamental principle and object of the founders of the L. M. S., being convinced that there is salvation in none other than in the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord."

Dr. Orchard and His Ordination

Renewed attention has been drawn to Dr. Orchard through the disclosure of the fact, known to his friends for a long time, that he was ordained by "Bishop" Herford, who claims that his orders are valid according to the standards of the Roman Catholic church. With this action many of his friends do not agree. They think such "orders" lack reality and are without significance. But they know what was in the mind of Dr. Orchard—his longing for a reunited Christendom—and they respect his motives and pass on to other and weightier matters. After all, here is a man of rare spiritual power—a man who brings many souls to Christ, and is ready without fear of man to preach what he deems the counsel of Christ in every national crisis. In comparison with such doings what does it matter if six years ago he was willing to be ordained by "Bishop" Herford? Yet it looks as though for some of his critics all the positive and evangelical ministry of this preacher were of no interest compared to a question of "orders." It almost seems as though the believers in "orders" and the disbelievers show alike a lack of proportion. Most of us are thankful to grant our friend his own request: "And now may I be allowed to get on with my work, which is that of winning souls to Christ, making of them good Catholics in the sense which demands charity and recognition for all who love the Lord Jesus Christ, which somehow will have to include both Mr. Kensit and the next pope, whoever he may be."

Lord Grey

The emergence of Lord Grey has been the chief political fact of the week. There are evidences that we are near to a return of party warfare, but no one is very clear how the statesmen will arrange themselves. Mr. Winston Churchill not for the first time has attacked a Cecil; once it was Mr. Balfour, now it is Lord Robert Cecil. When a Churchill and a Cecil fight there is no lack of hard knocks. But whether there is likely to be a cooperation between Lord Grey and Lord Robert with the moderate members of the Labor party against a "National party" no one can tell with any confidence. Lord Grey has a position quite his own in the judgment of men who value disinterestedness in public life. They are the more ready to offer him power because they know he does not seek it. And when it is boldly asserted that there is no alternative to the present premier, the quiet and often-forgotten citizen, who has more weight than he is supposed to have, shakes his head and says "Grey." In such a time we cannot be wrong in desiring that when the sides are formed they shall at least be divided not by personal feeling or pique, but by serious principles. If Lord Grey and his friends have a principle of their own, and the others another and a counter-principle, then let them fight it out. But we do not want a fight between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee.

Captain Monckton on New Guinea and Missions

One of the most entertaining of writers, Captain Monckton, has published another volume, "Last Days in New Guinea." The missionary enthusiast will find little in Captain Monckton to encourage him; but he will forgive much for the sake of the entertaining and often most enlightening stories, and he will be specially grateful to find from an administrator so generous an estimate of the native character. When Captain Monckton recalls his contentions with governors and missionaries, it is only right to listen for the other side before pronouncing judgment; and there is another side. He describes the "diggers" and their attitude to missions; they will subscribe but they do not believe in the mission; and they declare that if prohibition came, missions would suffer, since no digger would subscribe unless he were drunk. The attitude of the digger in this matter may or may not be rightly described; and after reading Captain Monckton's description of them, we should be rather relieved to think that such men did not believe in missions. But Captain Monckton is a priceless teller of stories and we are sorry these are the last of his New Guinea yarns.

The Way of Teaching History

There has been a controversy between Professor Hearnshaw and Dr. Maxwell Garrett of the League of Nations Union, upon the right teaching of history. Dr. Garrett has maintained that the teaching of history in schools has a bias against the cause to which he has committed himself. Professor Hearnshaw has raised a strong protest against any attempt to make the history lesson a piece of propaganda. We shall never come to a better world, Mr. Wells has taught us, till the children of the world are taught the same history. Too often the history lesson has been used for narrowly patriotic ends; and there is a lamentable ignorance of the real facts. Who has not heard of the Englishman shown over Bunker's Hill who inquired innocently, "Most interesting, but—who was Bunker?" That is another story. We do not want propaganda in the history, either for or against the league of nations. Says a wise writer:

"There is no need for school histories to come to conclusions; all that should be asked of them is a sense of the relative importance of the facts of history. When that exists and the facts are chosen in accordance with it, the learner may be left to draw his own conclusions. It is a fact that both winners and losers in most wars would refuse to make war at all if they could foresee the ultimate results. But there are many histories which are apt to talk of victory in war as if it were victory in a game. Of that the League of Nations Union has a right to complain, since it is one of the most dangerous of human illusions."

From "Experience," a Methodist Journal of Fellowship

"If we look at ourselves or at one another and ask what we might expect from God, very likely we shall get no further than the prayer, 'Make me as one of thy hired servants.' But if we begin with God, the Father from whom every fatherhood in heaven and on earth is named, who says 'This my son was dead and is alive again,' it does not seem an incredible thing to say that we are sons, God finds means to let us know. This is St. Paul's argument. 'Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the spirit of his Son into your hearts crying, My Father, My Father.'"

CORRESPONDENCE

The Disciples New Creed

"In harmony with the teaching of the New Testament as understood by this board of managers, the United Christian Missionary Society is conducting its work everywhere on the principle of receiving into membership of the churches at home or abroad, by any of its missionaries, only those who are immersed, penitent believers in Christ.

"Furthermore, it is believed by the board of managers that all of the missionaries and ministers appointed and supported by this board are in sincere accord with this policy, and certainly it will not appoint, and, indeed it will not continue in its service, any one known by it to be not in such accord. It disclaims any right and disowns any desire to do otherwise."

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE UNITED CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

When is a Creed Not a Creed?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just read your editorial in the Christian Century of February 9, entitled, "The Gospel According to the Board of Managers." The board of managers can speak for itself as to this editorial, but as an officer of the United Society, I cannot allow your statements to go unchallenged. I wish to address myself to four points:

1. You say that the board of managers adopted a creed at its recent meeting. That statement is as far from the truth as any statement that any newspaper ever uttered. I attended the sessions of that meeting and there was no creed adopted and no one discussed the making of a creed. The board of managers did state a simple fact: "That the work was being conducted everywhere on the principle of receiving into the membership of the churches, immersed, penitent believers in Christ."

That statement is true today, was true five years ago, was true twenty-five years ago, and was true when our first missionaries went out. The board of managers simply made a statement of facts, and none of your readers, I dare say, will have any confidence whatever in your editorial when you say that such a statement is a creed.

2. You say: "They (the missionaries) have in many cases been practicing Christian unity, 'open membership' it has been called. This procedure has been carried on in China through the most elemental, Christian necessities of missionary cooperation and reciprocity."

That statement is absolutely untrue to the facts as you have been told repeatedly. One missionary in China did secretly correspond with you, making those assertions, but forty missionaries in China say that those statements are untrue. Twenty-seven of them in one meeting in Nanking told Walter Scott Priest, of Wichita, Kansas, that they had never advocated nor practiced open membership. Nearly a dozen missionaries home on furlough last year said the same thing. Six who are home on furlough now say the same thing. The executive committee of the Foreign Society last year, the present officers of the United Society, and the board of managers of the United Society, repudiate your statement.

The missionaries have, of course, given pastoral care and oversight, and encouragement, to all converts of other missions that have come within their stations. No one desires them to do otherwise and they will, of course, continue to do that. The same thing is done by all of our churches in America, but everybody knows that that is not "open membership."

3. You speak of the "peculiar type of conscience that is begotten in missionary society officials." Missionary society officials, as far as I have known them, do not have any peculiar propaganda to further, whether it be either on the ultra-radical or the ultra-conservative side of theological questions. As far as I have known them they have tried to attend to their own business, which is to collect and administer missionary and benevolent funds for the work committed to their hands. As far as I have known them they have always been able to recognize a plain statement of facts. I have never known one of them to deliberately utter a falsehood or to color any statement for the sake of propaganda. Of your editorial in question I cannot say as much. It seems to me that it would be well for you to write something on the "peculiar type of conscience begotten in the editors of Christian journals."

4. I cannot allow your statement to pass where you make the practice of Christian unity and the practice of open membership synonymous. Our people and the Baptists have practiced open membership—that is, free interchange of members—from the beginning, but the two bodies do not practice Christian unity. The Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, etc., have practiced open membership with each other, but they are no nearer to Christian union than are our people and the Baptists. Open membership is not a solution of the Christian union problem. The solution of the problem lies deeper than that.

The officials of the United Society, the executive committee, and the board of managers, are desirous of peace throughout the whole brotherhood. This peace and harmony might come if the church papers would cease their contention. Your editorial is calculated to stir up strife and dissension, rather than to bring peace and harmony. And you speak with such seeming conviction that the casual reader might think that you spoke as the very oracles of God.

I desire that you print this letter at the earliest possible date, that your readers may understand that there are two sides to the question. Most sincerely yours,

St. Louis, Mo. UNITED CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY,
Bert Wilson, Promotional Division.

[Secretary Wilson's reply on behalf of the United Society calls for only a few words in comment.

1. The board did more than "state a simple fact," it gave an interpretation of Scripture and issued a declaration of policy based upon its interpretation of Scripture. Its declaration of policy demands that the missionaries and ministers supported by the board shall be in "sincere accord" with this policy. This is the essence of a creed and an invasion of Christian liberty.

2. Mr. Wilson's statement that forty missionaries denied the statements made presumably by Rev. George B. Baird to the editor of the Christian Century is not true. Not a single statement of fact in Mr. Baird's correspondence has been disputed by the China missionaries. Some of them have insisted that the facts set forth by Mr. Baird do not constitute "open membership," but his statements of fact have not been called in question. Mr. Baird says the facts as he has described them do constitute essential open membership. The Christian Century has said and continues to say that they do constitute open membership.

3. Moreover, the facts set forth in the Baird correspondence are corroborated by the official correspondence between Rev. Frank

Garrett and the Foreign Missionary executive committee, as well as many statements made by other missionaries to headquarters. This correspondence shows that the practice was thoroughly discussed in the China mission convention and that the home board was asked to give it consideration "with the understanding that the step has the approval of the China mission."

4. That there is more to the Christian union problem than the mutual exchange of church members of course anybody knows. But the practice of receiving Christians for what they are, instead of subjecting them to rebaptism as a condition of fellowship, would be a long step in the practice of Christian unity by such denominations as the Disciples and Baptists. In the case of the Disciples it is doubtful if any more significant step toward union could be imagined than to definitely repudiate the false view of "the teaching of the New Testament as understood by the board of managers."

Mr. Wilson's statement about "peace and harmony" in the face of so flagrant a violation of fundamental principles as the imposition of the board of managers' own private creed upon the missionaries is just too naive for anything. The ironical truth is that in the matter now disturbing the society the "church papers," so far as they take any position at all, take essentially the same position. Neither "conservatives" nor "liberals," so called, can endure the spectacle of the United Christian Missionary Society continuing to assert what is not true and to deny what is true. The Disciples communion is now not so deeply disturbed over the theological question of open membership as it is over the question of the moral candor of its missionary administrators and the moral embarrassment in which a policy of disingenuousness involves its missionaries.—THE EDITOR.]

The Nub of the Issue—See Italics Below

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I note that the board of managers of the United Society has set forth an interpretation of the New Testament and made it binding on all missionaries in the employ of the board. Those who are not in accord with this authoritative interpretation are not to be employed, or are to resign if now employed.

This is a clear and manifest usurpation of congregational rights. Any congregation among the Disciples has a right to decide upon the question of the baptism of any person who applies for membership. Our congregations have in general insisted on immersion as a condition of membership, but they have never insisted on making a doctrine of immersion a part of the confession of faith.

The board apparently insists on this, missionaries must not only be immersed, but they must profess a belief concerning it. This carries the obvious implication that congregations and pastors which believe differently have deviated from the straight line of proper belief.

If a congregation presents a man as a candidate for the mission field, and the congregation receives unimmersed Christians, or believes that under some circumstances it should receive them, the board through its candidate judges the congregation and finds it wanting.

The board has no authority thus to judge a congregation. If this is not true, then we should be shown when, where and how the board acquired this authority.

The board should be as rigorous in the matter of money as it is in the matter of candidates. If it does not represent the Disciples as a whole, but only a part, it should make the matter very clear, and depend for its financial support on the part which it represents.

There are two great questions involved. One is the right of a minority to recognition on the basis of equality with the majority. The other is the matter of cooperation through the United Society in the building up of native churches in foreign lands, with American denominationalism left out.

As a Disciple by inheritance through five generations, I believe in the former; as an ex-missionary, I believe in the latter. I believe in them far more than I do in the interpretation of the board of managers.

Missionary Candidates and the New Creed

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your timely article on "The Gospel According to the Board of Managers" suggests to me the following. In addition to the evil effects which must follow on the foreign field, from this action of the board, there will be precipitated a situation at home that is equally grave and significant. From what character of youth will our future missionaries come? Can a conscientious pastor urge the young men and women of his congregation to dedicate their lives to a work which has been outlined by a company of men and women sitting in St. Louis, Mo., in the year 1922, when that work will probably be done in China, Japan, Africa, etc., in the years from 1923 to 1950? Can any minister who knows the Disciples plea for liberty and unity urge the young people of his church to pledge themselves to continue in sincere accord with the interpretation of Scripture according to the minds of the board of managers of the United Missionary Society? Shades of Thomas Campbell, Alexander Proctor, A. B. Jones, Thomas Haley and a host like them.

How paralyzing must have been the fear, or how strange the hypnotic spell which fell upon the minds of the board of managers when they persuaded themselves to believe that a people so intelligently free as are the Disciples, would submit in America to an ex-cathedra utterance so untimely and so foreign to the spirit which brought this communion into being. When this board declares that it will not employ at home or on the foreign field, nor continue in its employ any person who is not sincerely in harmony with its views on the question under discussion, it is eliminating from its future ranks a company whose name is "legion" and whose intelligence and Christian character would probably compare favorably with any other like number of men and women. Is it not a tragedy in this year of our Lord, when hunger, hate and misery are stalking through the world, for a group of Christian men and women to spend two whole days in conference, and then offer to the Christian world, as the fruit of their labors, a resolution that is calculated to wound missionaries who have given their lives in service, and to discourage young men and young women who would gladly dedicate their lives to service anywhere, if only they could be free to follow as the light leads them, and not have to wait until the board of managers announces that they have found them in "sincere accord" with the said board of managers' creed? We are not calling in question the sincerity of the board, but we do seriously question their right to attempt to make their judgment the standard for all other Disciples, on the penalty of accepting or being denied the privilege of representing the church at home or abroad. In my humble judgment, this action of the board of managers will neither silence that group which is constantly calling for the ex-communication of all who do not agree with them; nor will it diminish that ever increasing number among the Disciples who believe that anyone who is acceptable to Christ should be received into his church, and who are determined to find a way to express more fully the spirit of unity which prevails in the hearts and minds of a numberless multitude of Christians throughout the world.

This latter group has always supported the work of the missionary societies, but now that the board of managers has demanded "sincere accord" with itself in matters of Scripture interpretation, before one can participate fully in the work of the society, what course is left open to men and women who resent this impertinence as unscriptural, and unbrotherly, and who refuse to abdicate the throne of their own intelligence in favor of any company of fallible men and women?

A Reassuring Word

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your editorial, "Our Young Intellectuals: An Appendix," is interesting reading. Yet I see no cause for alarm. Observe that they are young intellectuals—exceedingly young—so young, in fact, that it is perfectly evident that it will be quite a while before they reach maturity. Also, is it not worthy of note the way they appropriate the word intellectuals? They admit it boldly. In grown people such an admission would be characterized as conceit; in young people—well, never mind. It's a misfortune anyway, and, besides, they might outgrow it.

Most of my friends, together with myself, are young, and we have for some years followed after the things of the mind. Several of us expect to continue in pursuit of knowledge throughout the remainder of our mortal lives. But in no sense do we find the spirit of those "Young Intellectuals" representative of our own. Indeed, were such an insinuation made it would awaken resentment in us.

When I think of that type of young intellectuals you describe I am reminded of the father who considered the foolishness of his son and wondered if it were a natural stage of the boy's development, or whether he was just a plain jackass.

Church Comity and Chicago

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I notice a paragraph in your inter-denominational department on "Church Comity in Chicago" which tends to convey an impression entirely out of harmony with the facts. First of all, it says that "comity of the churches in Chicago is in a sorry state of complexity." This cannot be said to be an accurate statement of the situation. I think I know the cities of this country fairly well. It has been my privilege to speak and hold conferences in more than twenty major cities, frequently dealing with city missionary matters; and I know no city in America where there is a finer spirit of cooperation and comity than in Chicago. If the gentleman who inspired your paragraph will name the city I will be glad to investigate.

Second: The paragraph makes it appear that denominations too small to have a city society cannot be included in the Cooperative Council. This is not correct. We have had denominations represented who had no city superintendent. Any denomination in Chicago can have representation in the Cooperative Council.

Third: You say the Chicago Federation includes thirteen different denominations. This is correct. But most of them chiefly count on the stationery of the federation. When the federation budget ran somewhere around $30,000.00, four denominations were apportioned $25,000.00 of that amount, as follows: Methodist Episcopal, $8,000; Presbyterian, $8,000; Congregational, $5,000; Baptist, $4,000. I think these figures are correct.

Now, I am a federationist. Have been a member of the federation almost from its beginning in Chicago; been on its boards and committees and held official position in it. But the federation has depended through all the years for its support and backing almost entirely on the above mentioned denominations. The Disciples are contributing now $1,000.00 or more, possibly $2,000.00, and some of the smaller denominations smaller amounts.

Fourth: You say "the denominations of congregational polity could not control their self supporting churches through the Cooperative Council." They are in no different position when they deal with the Church Federation, for when the matter of apportionment of budget came up in the meetings they affirmed they could not make an apportionment but only a request, that the independence of their separate churches was prohibitive of their apportioning. So it does not matter through which organization they function. The congregational independence always asserts itself.

Fifth: You say, "some of the worst cases of friction have arisen in this way.' I have been identified with the Cooperative Council almost from its beginning and I have not known any serious case of friction. That which most nearly approached a breach was between the Baptists and the Disciples, and the only denominations that have refused to yield to the judgment of the Cooperative Council have been the Baptists and Disciples in one or two instances. The council has worked through all the years with remarkable harmony. I have known of no meeting that has not been under the superintendence of the Spirit of Christ.

Sixth: You say that "the merging of the two organizations has been resisted by many of the city superintendents." I do not know of any city superintendent who has resisted this on his own responsibility, but I know of one of the denominations which has taken definite action against merging its interests in the comity commission, and the chief reason for that action was as follows:

The representatives in the Church Federation are a changing group. We scarcely have time to get acquainted with each other until the group changes. Whereas, in the Cooperative Council one meets the same group of strong laymen and representative ministers with but little change from year to year. These men have been meeting every month through the years studying the problems of the city, often with map before them, so that it would be difficult to find in any city in the land a similar group of men who know their city better. The council is divided into departments of investigation and there are men in those departments who have been working there for more than a decade. So that immediately a situation arises nearly every member of the council is conversant with that section of the city and its needs. This makes intelligent action possible. As the Church Federation is now organized and its representatives selected, the same kind of fully informed action would be impossible. The churches have too many important interests at stake to leave them to the haphazard judgment of men who only occasionally come in contact with these situations.

Seventh: You refer to undue overlapping. The Cooperative Council through the years has been preventing that in Chicago. Perhaps you do not know its method of procedure. Space will not permit me to give its history or the processes by which it reaches its decisions. In congested sections where the locality has been changing through the years, mergers have been perfected to prevent waste of men and means. Sometimes one denomination gives up and sometimes another. In new sections we prevent overlapping by canvassing the territory and ascertaining the denominational preference of the new settlers. Then we vote such denomination into the field as has the largest constituency at that particular time. The old days of overlapping are done in Chicago. The Cooperative Council has prevented that. It has functioned harmoniously in the life of the city. Any denomination can have representation in it. I know no organization in any city in the land that has rendered a finer service for the Kingdom and done more to promote fellowship and good will and prevent wastage in church work.

These brethren have been meeting together through the years. They have come to know and love and trust each other. This kind of continued fellowship is impossible in the federation. Neither can the expert information be utilized there with its changing constituency.

JOHN THOMPSON.

First Methodist Church,
Chicago.

[The Christian Century based its statement that comity in Chicago was in a sad state of complexity on the fact that the past year both the Chicago Church Federation and the Cooperative Council of City Missions have handled comity cases, and even now there is no sure rule as to which organization provides arbitration machinery in a given case. Both the representatives of the Federation and the Cooperative Council must be elected by their constituent denominational organizations once a year so that in the matter of continuity one organization need not have any advantage over the other. The Cooperative Council has approved new church organizations near Episcopal and Lutheran churches on the ground that the latter were not represented in the organization. While it has undoubtedly accomplished a great good for the city of Chicago, its scope is not yet as broad as the common protestantism or as the Chicago Church Federation. It is not without significance that church comity in no other great city of America is in such a double-headed condition as in the city of Chicago.—THE EDITORS.]

Church and Lodge: How Members are Secured

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Mr. Bradley in commenting on Dr. Douglas' "The Church's Self Respect" omitted a very important point, to my mind the most important. Bradley by his silence and Douglas by affirmation, lead us to believe that the manner of securing members in the church and in the lodge are entirely different. There is a supposition that no one is ever invited to unite with a lodge, indeed it may be that it is contrary to lodge rules to ask a neighbor to enter a secret society. But in practice quite the opposite prevails. Those interested in the growth of the lodge have a most persistent way of asking other men to come in. True, this invitation is apparently "unconcerned," but there is no mistake about its saying, "We would like very much to have you come in with us, and at any time convenient drop around and let me take your application." This has been my own experience, and I have known the same to be done towards others. My judgment is that almost every man in a lodge today has in some kind, telling, manner received an invitation. So far as my observation goes the lodge seeks persistently for new members. Certainly my experience and observation would not lead me to make the distinction made by Mr. Douglas between church and lodge as to the method of securing members.

The Long Pastorate Record

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue of January 26th attention was called to the fact that Dr. Charles Little had served the First Presbyterian Church of Wabash, Ind., for fifty-one years and that this probably exceeded the record of any American preacher of his generation. Permit me to bring to your attention the pastorate of Dr. G. U. Wenner of Christ Church (Lutheran) of East Nineteenth Street, New York City, who is now beginning his fifty-fifth year. This, in itself, is quite a distinction, but for the lower east side where so many churches have abandoned the field it is marvelous.

This church is not only self-supporting, but has a record for the past year that any church might well be proud of. The annual report says: "Local expenses amounted to $5,413.66. The contributions for benevolent causes amounted to $5,491.57, more for others than for ourselves."

Dr. Wenner was among the first to advocate weekday religious instruction for children and conducts such a school in his church. He believes that the teaching and training of child life is the most important work of the pastor. The record of his parish proves his point.

When The Christian Century publishes a series of articles on "Some Living Teachers of the Pulpit," as I hope it will, I wish to nominate for your consideration Rev. G. U. Wenner.

The Value of Jonah for Us *

RIGHT at the outset let us settle the whale story, for, unfortunately, the average citizen knows more about that whale than about the ethical teaching of the book. Let us, therefore, state it as our solemn conviction that one's eternal salvation has no relation to his acceptance or denial of the whale story. If it helps you to believe it, if it makes you feel that by accepting it you are placing the stamp of your approval upon God's power, if you simply revel in unnatural explanations of all miracles, if the task of differentiation hurts your mental processes, then—all right. But if, on the other hand, having been trained in modern high schools and colleges, you have come to see God's power expressed in scientific ways, if you are pleased to see the orderly, regular, steady progress of the world, if deep and strong ethical conceptions are the foundations of civilization in your estimation, if the great story of Jonah seems to you a parable, written and designed from the very first, not to teach literal history, but to point a needed moral, then believe that if you want to, no matter what anyone says. This is the land of the free and you have the privilege, among other things, of writing your own vital creed and so long as you love, honor and obey Jesus Christ with all your heart, your freedom in all other matters is almost unlimited.

Jonah is the great missionary book of the old testament. A Jew feels the call to go and preach to a foreign people. The first big lesson of the book is that it is dangerous and wrong to try to run away from God's call. I know a man who as a youth heard the call to preach; he hardened his heart against that call, he has made an indifferent success in business and he is wretched. I know another youth who has just responded to God's call to go as a foreign missionary—he is happy. God has a place and a design for every life, not a single cell in our bodies is misplaced and not a single life is thrust haphazard into society. Find your place, do the work God wants you to do and don't try to run away.

The second great lesson is that human beings, plain folks, are precious above everything else. Jonah was peeved when the people were not destroyed. He cared more for his creed than for folks. This still is true. Church folks have their favorite theories of just who is going to hell and they would be peeved if told that their pet theory would not work! A few years ago the crude theory was advanced that unbaptized babies, dying, would be lost—how inexpressibly horrible! Yet I have had mothers come to me insisting that their little babies should have the formula said over them to make them safe for heaven. When the Chinese coolies are about to start on a voyage they shoot off sacred firecrackers to frighten away the devils, so that the voyage may be safe. Frankly, I am not interested in a God who would condemn innocent little babies whose parents failed to have the formula said over them. Many other ideas of salvation are equally crude and superstitious. Christ loved the children. God loves children. The universe is friendly.

Jonah preached, "Yet three days and Nineveh will be destroyed," and then when the people repented and therefore was not destroyed Jonah was angry! What a humanitarian preacher this run-away was!

The third big lesson in this truly remarkable book is that God has mercy. Men have their little, broken systems, their petty, bigoted creeds, their exclusive and divisive fellowships; men may have a Protestantism with a hundred and fifty mutually exclusive sects in America, but God has mercy. God is touched by penitence, God will forgive. He is a great Father and all he wants is the right attitude and the right performance of his children. When your child does wrong and he comes to you and says, "I know I did wrong; I am sorry and I promise to try not to do it again," unless you are a brute you take advantage of that mood to forgive and improve your child. The one thing you want is for your boy to grow up to be a noble citizen or your girl to develop into a gracious woman. Character—Christian character—is what we are after and some glorious day we shall recognize character as the supreme thing and we will have a free and full interchange of church members based upon love of Jesus Christ and a quality of life. Jonah teaches that you cannot run away from God, that life is more than creed, and that the Infinite Father loves and forgives his children. Study Jonah.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Increases Attendance Ten Times

Federation did it. In Springfield, Mass., two churches had been competing in a certain neighborhood until finally one succumbed. The other was a small affair with a total attendance at all meetings of 250 people a week. When the two churches were merged into one, and a social program was inaugurated by the enterprising pastor, Rev. James Gordon Gilkey, the weekly attendance at the various meetings of the church rose to 2,500 per week. It has been necessary to erect a new church building, and the old building of the congregation that ceased to be is now turned into a community house. In this house children's lunches are served on school days. The care of the children at the noon hour finally led to the installation of a children's library. Clean motion pictures are shown in the community house and in one three month period lately 11,500 people saw motion pictures at the community house. The boys and girls of the church are organized in a variety of ways. Free music classes have been set up and these have a wide appeal to immigrant children. The electrical club interests the young men. The Christmas club carries thrift down to the children caring for smaller amounts than banks are willing to handle. The young people have a forum each Sunday evening of the month at which speakers interpreting various causes appear, their addresses being followed by discussion. Carefully chaperoned dances are put on in the community house. The mother organization fostering all this good work is South Congregational church.

Conservative Presbyterians Hound Their Board

Heckling the mission board is the favorite amusement of a little coterie of Disciples and it appears that there is a group of Presbyterians who have the same idea of what constitutes recreation. They have kept it up until the foreign board of the Presbyterian denomination issued a doctrinal statement. The latest criticism has been with regard to an alleged failure of the Presbyterian board to provide famine relief in China. The latter criticism has been amply met by the board.

Whole Nation Will Think of Religious Education

The most ambitious project in behalf of religious education ever undertaken is that being projected by the International Sunday School Association for the first week in May. This organization is convinced that there are thirteen million children in America that are not receiving any kind of religious training. It is proposed that these shall be reached. Whole communities will be called together to consider in an unsectarian way the right of the child to a complete education. Booths or tents will distribute literature in the various cities. House-to-house visitation will bring the facts together for the use of the local leaders. The plans of the committee also call for a parade of Sunday-schools in each city for the purpose of arousing interest in the community. Among the other suggestions are a song festival for the children and an institute for the parents and Sunday-school teachers to acquaint them with some of the latest findings of educational leaders who work in the religious field.

Seattle Federation Has a New Leader

Cooperation in some of the newer cities of the great west has halted because of the individualism of certain preachers of the reactionary type, and this has been the situation in Seattle. Nevertheless, the federation has become a settled fact in the city life, commanding more and more the loyalty of the churches. At a recent meeting of this federation, Henry R. King resigned as president and in his place, Rev. R. F. Thrapp was selected. Mr. Thrapp was an Illinoisan formerly, and spent six years in Los Angeles. He has been an able leader in strong churches during a ministry of thirty years.

People's Church Succeeds in College Town

The Michigan Agricultural College is located at West Lansing, Mich. Some years ago the people of this little city decided that they did not want competing denominational churches. The Congregational church of the town was broadened out in its policy until it became the People's church. The pastors of this church have been recruited from the Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational denominations. The church maintains a lively interest in rural welfare. A social program is maintained, one feature of which is a reading room.

Russian Preacher Will Search for His Family

The Russian Disciples church of New York has been served during the past year by Rev. S. P. Handzuck. He has had a very successful work during the year speaking to a total of audiences of 10,586 souls. Meanwhile his soul has been troubled over the fact that his family was in Russia, and he was not able to hear from them. He recently secured a leave of absence and will go to Russia in quest of his loved ones.

Big Churches the Present Tendency

The denominational statistics seem clear in one regard. There is a tendency in the American church either to grow to great size or die. Many communions in America have fewer small churches than formerly; most of them have more churches of a thousand members than ever before. The Episcopal church has recently concluded a survey which shows this generalization to hold in their fellowship. They now have 98 churches with more than a thousand members. Of these 98, four are to be found in the city of Washington, ten in Connecticut, nine in Massachusetts, six in Illinois, twelve in Pennsylvania, four in New Jersey and 26 in New York. The income of this church has grown remarkably in recent years. In 1919 the income was $21,000,000 while last year it was $35,000,000. This is an average of approximately $35 a member, though there are often a number of members in a single family.

Comments on the Appointment of Hays

The new venture of Will H. Hays, formerly postmaster general of the United States, is arousing considerable interest in church circles. For the most part the task Mr. Hays has set himself of making the movie business respectable has the approval of religious leaders over the country. Rev. William Melville Curry, D. D., of the Ninth Presbyterian church of Philadelphia, says: "If the moving-picture industry has called this good man to hide behind his moral qualities, it is foredoomed to failure. Let it disinfect itself and clean house. Let it keep its hands off sacred institutions. Let it recall its propagandists and corruptionists from legislatures. Let it cease commercializing sacred things. The moving-picture industry has become obnoxious. As a law-defying organization it takes rank with the late saloon."

Armenian Situation Has New Complication

The French have suddenly evacuated their territory in Armenia and the population of this section, fearing a new uprising on the part of the Turks, have left their homes and become refugees. The Armenians cannot be blamed for this in the light of the probabilities. But the work of Armenian relief is correspondingly increased and the American workers are quite in despair. The railroads of America are hauling grain for famine relief free during the month of February, and Illinois farmers are being asked to load surplus grain on the cars as their donation.

Non-Christian Religions in America Not Strong

The non-Christian cults of America are numerically insignificant. Recently issued statistics of the Federal Council show that the Social Brethren have 905 members. The Society of Ethical Culture which has branches in many large cities totals a membership of only 3,210. The spiritualists are hardly to be classified as a worshipping group, but most of them are outside the churches. They report a total of 105,837 members. The Theosophical society will surprise many with the announcement of 62,180, being a larger body than the Unitarians who, with a decline of 30,860 members during the past six years, now number only 51,635 members. Eastern Unitarian churches claim to be Christian churches but the western churches in many cases disclaim such classification. The Bahaist sect which is building a large temple in a Chicago suburb, has only 2,884 members in the United States. If all its members in all parts of the United States were assembled they could easily get into the Chicago temple and have room for visitors. These figures would indicate that up to the present time no religion which proselytes against Christianity has gotten much foothold in America.

Casting Out Devils in China

Rev. Clarence Horner, an Episcopal missionary in China, has written glowing accounts of the miracles being wrought in China by the Episcopal faith healer, James Hickson. The Chinese still believe in demon-possession, and the missionary is casting out devils in various parts of China, with the blessing of this missionary. The report of the missionary is some index of the standards of intelligence prevailing in that section of the world. He says: "It isn't quite orthodox to believe in demons and devils and all of that sort of thing. But lately I have been wondering. The Chinese thoroughly believe in this great host of undesirables and their lives are so shaped that they might live with them with the least possible interference from them. Mr. Hickson had quite a few of these cases of demon-possessed and he exorcised them.

The effect upon the possessed ones was the same as we read of in the New Testament times; some fell upon the ground as if dead while others foamed at the mouth but all went away sane and cured. The case of one of the lepers was the most interesting. The first day he was carried into the church, a thing loathsome and horrible. The second day we met him in the hospital. His body was covered with a new skin and he stretched out his arms and actually danced there in the ward, saying 'Look, this is the first time I have been able to do this for thirty years.' The third day he went away as a witness of what had been done for him."

Resent Water Regenerationist Resolution

If the Board of Managers of the United Christian Missionary Society thought their reactionary resolution on the matter of open membership on the mission field would bring peace in the denomination it now realizes the mistake of a visionless pronouncement. The attacks of the water regenerationist group continue while the best friends of the society are grieved and shocked. Rev. Finis Idleman of New York says in the Bulletin of Central Church of Disciples: "To retreat from our understanding with other religious bodies about the allotment of territory on the foreign field is a grievous sin in the face of the vast heathenism as yet unevangelized, but more especially does it seem to us a denial of the principle of private interpretation and of the liberty we proclaimed in Christ, to demand of our missionaries both at home and abroad, a subscription to the policy of receiving only the immersed or being recalled. Such a policy denies the liberty which as churches at home we have constantly enjoyed. It is a policy which will mean our defeat if not rescinded."

Chicago Russians Returning to Homeland

The Russian Disciples church of Chicago is a devoted band, composed mostly of men, since Russians have not begun to come to this country as families to any considerable extent. Of late a considerable number of these members have been going back to Poland and Russia to find their families. Owing to their devotion, many of them have become lay preachers in their native land and have written back to Rev. John Johnson of Chicago that hundreds of converts have been made. Chicago Russians hold to a mystical conception of Christianity as contrasted with the social interest of some other immigrant groups.

Mexicans Are Neglected Immigrant Group

Owing to the late unpleasantness with Mexico, the Mexican immigrant in the United States is not as popular as some others. This is an important racial group, however, as may be seen from the statistics of Texas. In the Lone Star state there are 650,000 people of Mexican blood, many of them already citizens of the United States, and most of them still using the Spanish language. A preacher who travels among them a great deal, addressing laboring groups at the noon hour asserts that only two per cent of them have ever seen a Bible. They are not difficult to win when the proper program is used. The Disciples of Texas have just one worker in this vast population. They are being urged by their leaders to extend this work into new sections.

Bishop of Alaska Is Touring the United States

It would be difficult to find a more heroic figure in the Protestant Episcopal church than Bishop Peter Trimble Rowe of Alaska. Bishop Rowe is touring America at this time and spoke in Boston on a recent Sunday. Many of his journeys in Alaska must be made with dogs or on snow-shoes. He knows how to build a circle of fire and then lie down in the middle and go to sleep when the thermometer is sixty below zero. Not long since Bishop Rowe and Dr. Grenfell met at the home of a mutual friend for dinner. Through the meal they were silent as two bashful school-boys until the boast of Bishop Rowe about his favorite dog started an argument that brought the host the information he wanted about the adventurous lives of these two great apostles to the frozen north.

Federation Rebukes the City Newspapers

The two morning newspapers of Chicago have been in a circulation war all winter. Earlier in the winter a thinly veiled lottery plan of drawing numbers was discontinued at the request of the federal government. Recently lucky name contests have been inaugurated which has come to the attention of the Chicago Church Federation. The Federation has given a vote of censure to the practice as tending to increase the gambling spirit in the city. The newspapers are asked to discontinue these circulation methods as being opposed to the welfare of the community.

General Convention Still Looking for a Location

The General Convention officials of the Disciples are out at sea in an open boat and nobody throws them a rope. The convention was offered to Denver earlier in the year, but the opposition of a leading pastor of Denver who is disaffected with regard to the organized work of the denomination changed that plan. More recently the pastors of Indianapolis were approached with regard to locating the convention in the Hoosier capital. The matter came up just following the action of the board of managers of the United Christian Missionary Society. The pastors of Indianapolis voted that they did not want the convention in view of the probability that this year would be one of harsh disputation, likely to weaken and shame the churches in any city where it goes, if not to disrupt them with its controversies. Two southern cities are making a bid, Oklahoma City and Hot Springs. There are important reasons why the convention ought to be held somewhere near the center of de-nominal strength at this time. Meanwhile a rumor is afloat that the officials of the convention will take the big meeting to Chicago, and manage it independently of the local forces in Chicago. As the convention is only six months off now, the choice of a location cannot much longer be deferred. The emergency that has arisen is without precedent.

California Church Rejoices in Freedom

The M. E. church of Carmel, Calif., is unique in its freedom and unconventionality. Recently the minister, Rev. Fred Sheldon, prepared a ballot for the use of the congregation which gave them opportunity to vote for the sermon topic they wanted. Many helpful themes have been given to the minister as a result of this experiment. The church is Methodist but it takes pleasure in circulating the great denominational newspapers other than the Methodist, and The Christian Century is prominent in the list of papers commended. The sermon themes discussed recently included "What Is Modernism?" "What Is Higher Criticism?" "How Many Comings of Jesus are There?"

How One Church Has Survived Social Changes

Many a city church has either moved out of the old neighborhood or has gone the way of all earthly things, when the neighborhood changed. An interesting exception to this rule is Woodland Avenue Presbyterian church of Cleveland. The minister, Rev. Joel B. Hayden, is alive to the finger tips and his church has a director of women's work and a director of religious education. One important feature of the church life is a Thursday night forum. At this forum John R. Voris has been giving recently a series of addresses on Russia. After the lecture he is plied with questions. One night he was taken to a tea house and entertained until midnight. The church is financed by many former members and is free from economic worry to do the work with its immediate neighborhood which is composed of Jews, Slavs and other immigrants.

Statistics Against Disciples Conservatism

The argument most used among Disciples against the practice of Christian union in the local churches and against the reception of all Christians on church letter without other test is that this practice has proven a failure in other communions. The Disciples of Christ and the "Christian Denomination" have similar origins, and a hundred years ago a large part of the latter organization united with the followers of Alexander Campbell to form the Disciples of Christ. Conservative Disciples have pointed to the "Christian Denomination" with its 97,084 members to prove that "open membership" fails. However, the Federal Council statistics show that during the past six years the Disciples gains have been only 16,005 for the entire period on a membership of 1,210,023 while the "Christian Denomination" has gained 21,653. If theological issues are to be settled by the census-taker, it looks as though the smaller communion were about to carry off the laurels.

Southern Baptists Show Results

Southern Baptists know what they believe and the very intensity of conviction among them has doubtless contributed something to the results reported for the past year. Of the seventy-five million dollars pledged in their national campaign two years ago, thirty million has been paid in. Of all the national funds of this sort being collected, the southern Baptist fund is reported to be in the best shape. The leaders also report over 250,000 baptisms. Two thousand young men have pledged themselves to study for the Christian ministry.

Dr. Inman Lectures at Northwestern University

Dr. Samuel Guy Inman lectured at Northwestern University during February 8-10. In less than three days he gave six lectures and conducted a number of quiz classes for different departments of the University. Mr. Inman has recently returned from a trip through South America where he has been engaged in investigations in behalf of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America of which he is secretary. He reports almost complete alienation of the intellectual classes in the southern republics from the dominant church, and a conviction that religion is the enemy of progress. In some cities, however, the evangelical churches are winning a large success. He told of a church in Rio de Janeiro which has 1,500 members, and which carries on fifteen outlying Sunday schools. Many statesmen of Latin America are reported to be favorable to evangelical work, particularly the Obregon government in Mexico.

Archbishop Not Discouraged

The Archbishop of Canterbury is not discouraged over the reception given to the Lambeth Appeal of the Episcopal bishops. He says in this connection: "I deliberately think that the rapid progress which some critics appear to have expected would have been harmful, perhaps fatal, to the realization of our hopes. This is a field in which there are no short cuts. Bit by bit the way must be won, won with prayer, deliberation and abundant counsel. Read the literature which has already appeared on either side. We shall have fuller records of it all ere long."

Tithing Extended in Methodist Circles

The practice of giving one-tenth of one's income to religious work has extended widely in evangelical circles in recent years. The Methodist Episcopal church reports that 300,000 tithers are to be found in that communion. Rev. Luther E. Lovejoy is secretary of the stewardship division of the Committee on Conservation and Advance. He has issued a call for a universal tithing week during Holy Week this year. It is believed that there will be a very wide response. Farmer women have written in that they will tithe the egg money, and the head of a great system of chain stores has promised to tithe his income that week as well.

Waldensians in Italy Come Into Political Prominence

From being a persecuted sect, the Waldensians of Italy have advanced in their status until they now furnish political leaders and office-holders. The mayor of Venice is a Waldensian. The city of Florence has chosen a Waldensian for vice mayor, and members of the sect are to be found high in favor in Rome. The Waldensian organization is now taking a more vigorous attitude with regard to the evangelization of Italy, and some American communions are doing their work in Italy through the Waldensian organization. Large areas of the population are rationalists, and it is among these people without a religion that the Waldensian missionaries do their largest work.

Address on Abraham Lincoln Is Broadcasted

Another Chicago minister has extended his parish by installing a radio outfit. Rev. Josiah Sibley, pastor of Second Presbyterian Church, broadcasted an address on "The Price Lincoln Paid" on the birthday of the great emancipator. The amateur stations in and around Chicago have increased so rapidly this winter that certain parts are hardly to be obtained any more, the demand outrunning the supply. Hence no one is able to say how large an audience Mr. Sibley had. On account of Lincoln's birthday falling on Sunday, an unusual number of ministers preached on the life of Lincoln on Feb. 12. It has been common for ministers this year to discuss the religion of Abraham Lincoln. Those who hold that there are no Christians outside the visible church would not speak of Lincoln as a Christian, but it is noticeable

Dr. Lyman Abbott of The Outlook says of Lloyd C. Douglas' Wanted—A Congregation

"Mr. Douglas's volume is not a story with a moral, but a moral in a story. A minister who is preaching to a small and eminently respectable congregation in a large church is invited to a birthday dinner with a college classmate; meets there three successful men—a manufacturer, a doctor, and an editor; is inspired with a new spirit of energy, enterprise and initiative, and goes home to put into his business the spirit which they put into theirs and to employ much the same sort of methods. It is a good book for ministers to read, because a spirit of energy, enterprise, and initiative is a good spirit for ministers to acquire. But to imitate the Rev. Dr. Preston Blue's methods and expect from the methods the Rev. Preston Blue's success would be a great mistake. Mere imitation rarely achieves a great success, and never in any form of industry which requires spiritual power. And methods which are employed by one minister in one community with good results may, when employed by a minister of a different temperament and in a different community, be fatal to results. I commend the book for inspiration but not for imitation."

Educational Leaders Exhort the Churches

The Council of Church Boards of Education in annual session at Chicago, January 9-10, 1922, sent the following communication to the protestant churches of America:

"The cause of Christian Education is fundamental to the maintenance and extension of the work of the Christian Church at home and abroad.

"When the man's got—all's got. Trained leaders are essential to the realization of the Christian program. Christian education is concerned with the training of the leaders and of all who cooperate in the work of the Kingdom. The success of home and foreign missions and of all other enterprises of the church admittedly depends upon the success of Christian education. While these truths are generally admitted by leaders of all the churches they have not yet come to the consciousness of the entire membership as is evidenced by the fact that, while gifts for education in general have been greatly multiplied, the increase in the gifts of the Church for education under the auspices of the Church has not kept pace with its increase of gifts for other philanthropic and benevolent enterprises. In view of the situation thus briefly outlined, the Council of Church Boards of Education urges the leaders of the churches so to increase the budgets allotted to educational interests as to enable them to meet their increasing opportunities and requirements. It also earnestly calls upon the members of all the churches to give themselves in prayer and devoted activity to a nation-wide effort for the purpose of endowing and supporting their educational institutions and agencies, to the end that a sufficient number of trained leaders may be provided for the building of the Kingdom of God."

Second Largest Religious Training School

In spite of the opposition of certain "Fundamentalists" of Minneapolis who asserted that heretical doctrines were taught, the Religious Training School in that city has already reached larger proportions than any other similar school in America save one. The school is held in Hennepin Avenue Methodist Church and Rev. L. L. Dunnington is dean. Courses with a modern outlook are being given by Rev. W. E. Woodbury, Dr. James Wallace, Dr. W. P. Lemon and others. It will be the goal next year to strike for a student body of six hundred.

Growth of the Christian Union Idea

While the managers of the Disciples Missionary Society were compelling their missionaries to close the doors of their Chinese churches against Presbyterians and Methodists who moved into Disciples territory with no church organization at hand, in the home field the local churches are taking matters into their own hands. East End Church of Pittsburgh has recently changed the terms of membership so as to make rebaptism unnecessary. The action has been taken after several years of discussion. There were just three dissenting votes in the congregation that considered the matter. Rev. Finis Idleman of Central Church, New York City, recently announced that any church employing him must take account of his views in favor of receiving unimmersed Christians. His elders approved his position, and the unimmersed are now being received.

German Missionaries Back in Fellowship

War hatreds still interfere with religious work in various ways, but one barrier was broken down at the recent meeting of the missionary leaders of America at Atlantic City. Henceforth German societies will participate on an equal basis with all others. An international committee has been formed which will furnish the statesmanship and the comity plans for most of the religious communions of the world, the Roman Catholic remaining aloof, of course. The missionary work of the world costs at the present time $55,000,000 per year of which $40,000,000 is contributed by the United States.

Baptists Now Lead Methodists in Numbers

According to the Federal Council of Churches, the Baptists now lead the Methodists in point of numbers in the United States. This is the first time that the Baptists have been able to report such a condition since the early days of American history. The various Baptist sects number 7,835,250, while the Methodists' figures are 7,797,991. The Lutheran bodies are third with 2,466,645 members and the Presbyterian group comes fourth with 2,384,683 members. The total church membership of the country made an exceptionally large gain last year, the growth totaling a million members. In the past six years the churches of the country have made a membership growth of 4,070,345, which ought to silence for a while the paragraphers in radical journals who are shouting continually that the American churches are dying. There are 233,104 churches and 200,090 ministers. The Federal Council statistician asserts that the increase in the number of ministers has been approximately fifty per cent greater than has been the increase of the churches. These figures bear eloquent testimony to the virility of the American churches, and indicate that they must be reckoned among the constructive forces that mould the life of the people.

Sunday School Leader Goes to Near East

W. C. Pearce, the veteran Sunday school leader of Chicago, now the associate general secretary of the World's Sunday School Association, recently returned from a trip to central Europe. This trip was so fruitful to the evangelical cause that he will leave before the month is out on a trip to the near East on the same good errand. He will visit Italy, Spain, Turkey, Greece, Palestine, Persia, Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines, India, Burma, China, Korea, and Japan. The missionary cause has advanced far enough in Asia that much may be done in the way of enlisting native forces in carrying on Sunday school work.

British Pastor Will Have Wide Itinerary in America

Dr. Frederick W. Norwood, pastor of the City Temple, London, will have a wide itinerary in America. The World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches has been assisting in booking him up for many important engagements. Dr. Norwood will speak at the Congregational conference of New York in May. In June he has engagements at First Congregational church of Washington, Central Methodist church of Detroit, and in July at Albion College. Dr. Norwood is an Australian who served in the world war, and who went to the City Temple as successor to Dr. Joseph Fort Newton. He has been preaching since he was seventeen years of age.

Home Missions Has Its Heroic Side

The home missionary sometimes faces privations, labors and inconveniences quite comparable to those of the foreign missionary. Rev. A. McEathron is a Disciples missionary in northern Wisconsin. During the month of January he was traveling continually, visiting school-houses and preaching nearly every evening in the month in spite of blizzards and temperatures which sometimes reached 40 below zero. During these travels he was frost-bitten; he fell through the ice on a stream once, and he was twice detained away from home by blizzards. Part of the labor of the month was cutting logs for a church building.

Church Publicity Movement Still Alive

Church publicity methods are still the object of study on the part of alert ministers all over the country. Not only large and wealthy churches but often the young and struggling churches adopt some kind of publicity program. Even in small towns, the enterprises and aims of the churches are often unknown. Rev. H. C. Shimer, pastor of a Presbyterian church in a town of a thousand people in West Virginia, recently attacked the problem in the new way. With no funds for publicity, he made placards with his own hands each week which neatly set forth the enterprises of the church. His audiences have increased to four or five times their original size which would seem to indicate that he really had something worth advertising.

Religious Literature in Your Church

IF YOU will make inquiry of the members of your congregation, you will find that the average member does not read more than two religious books during a year. Many of them do not read a single volume! And yet wonder is sometimes expressed at the low tide of spiritual life in the church today.

Why not put a hundred religious books into the homes of your congregation before Easter? Preach a special sermon, if you like, on "Religious Literature and Christian Living," or some similar topic. And have some of the best recent books on hand for your people to see and order. Send us list of books (see below) which we may send you for first use. Put them where people can see them, and ask some one person to look after orders received. We will give you 30 or 60 days to pay for this initial order.

Here is a list of religious books we recommend.
Order one or more copies of each by checking.

Two Constructive Books on Religion

JUST FROM THE PRESS

The Creative Christ:

By Edward S. Drown,
Professor in the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass.

That Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and to-day and forever means that he is the Man of the ages. And, if so, then he is the Man for every age. There is in him that which can appeal to and satisfy the thoughts and hopes and aspirations of every period of human experience. That Jesus Christ is always the same does not, therefore, mean that he can always be apprehended in the same way, or that his value and meaning for human life can always be understood and expressed in the same terms. His greatness eludes any complete human understanding. The best that any age can do is to make him real for that age, and then to hand on to new ages the ever recurring task of understanding him anew, as human life changes and as new problems call for solutions.

There are two false attitudes toward the thought of the past. One such is to regard that thought as a finality beyond which we cannot go. But that is to be untrue to the lesson which the past itself has to teach, the lesson taught us by men who were thinkers for their own time, and who dared to follow thought into untrodden fields.

And the other false attitude is to disregard the past, and to try to do our own thinking independently of what has been thought before. But that again is to lose the lesson that history has to teach, it is to fail to benefit by the experience of mankind. If we are to understand the present, we must know the past, know it as a living thing, and from its life we shall learn the lessons for our life today. We shall be true to the Christian thought of the past if we try to make Christ real for ourselves.

Such is the argument of this book. And further, the author says, our problem is the social problem, the ethical problem, and he asks and aids in answering such questions as these: How shall society be built on the foundation of righteousness, justice, and love? How shall the individual, every individual, find his own freedom in a right and just relation to his fellows, a relation that shall express and maintain the rights and freedom of all? How shall the State, the Nation, be so constituted as to maintain the rights and duties, political and industrial, of all its members?

Creative Christianity:

By Professor George Cross,
Of Rochester Theological Seminary.

The author terms this "A study of the genius of the Christian faith." "To everyone who seeks to hold this faith intelligently," he says, "and to communicate it to the minds and consciences of others this task of ours must present itself as permanently imperative, and the present juncture in human affairs makes the time particularly opportune. For the work of reconstituting the essential order of human life, now pressing so hard on the human power of initiative on a vast scale among many peoples, is bound to produce a profound effect on the religious life of men everywhere."

Periodically, he holds, the organizing genius of the Christian faith must manifest itself in the reshaping of the forms of conduct, of the political affairs, of the popular philosophy and of the spirit of reverence current among any people. That which seemed at one time indispensable to the religious life has to be set aside in the interest of that very life and other forms more truly representative of that people's later faith and more adequate to the fulfillment of its newer aims must take their place.

"Creative Christianity" is a contribution toward reshaping the inherited forms in which our Protestantism has expressed its inner life for us so that the coming generation nurtured under the changed spiritual tendencies current today may have a form of Christianity better fitted to its needs.

Social Rebuilders

By Charles R. Brown

THIS book by the dean of the Divinity School of Yale University contains the lectures delivered by him at DePauw University in 1921 upon the Mendenhall Foundation, and constitutes the seventh in that series of lectures. The five lectures are a study in reconstruction with certain ancient leaders of biblical history as the outstanding figures, and the present situation of the world, as an aftermath of the war, as the chief point of application. The book is distinctly a message for the day.

"The chief distinction of this little book is that it is a voice crying in the present wilderness of confusion and disorder showing the way out."—President Grose, DePauw University.

The Promise of His Coming

An Historical Interpretation
of the Idea of the Second Advent

□ □

By CHESTER McCOWN, Ph. D.

Professor of New Testament Religion, Pacific
School of Religion.

DR. McCOWN argues that we cannot continue to maintain a doctrine (as men do the buttons on their coat sleeves) because it was once useful. But he characterizes as dangerous presumption the confession of complete indifference to the Second Advent made by so many clergymen and laymen.

His deep respect for Scripture compelled him to believe that the Second Advent could never have played so important a role in the early church, and in the thought of Paul and Jesus, except for the presence of values that should be an indispensable part of Christian thinking and feeling in every age.

Not as a controversialist out for a partisan victory in the feud between pre- and post-millennialists, but as a reporter, he here sets down the rich discoveries that have rewarded his search for this overlooked treasure.

The Infinite Artist

By Frederick F. Shannon

Minister Central Church, Chicago

CENTRAL CHURCH is a Chicago institution. It has been more fortunate than most other similarly distinguished pulpits in great cities in securing, when a change has been required, a man who could succeed under the peculiar conditions of an independent church worshipping in a rented down-town auditorium. This volume takes title from the opening sermon. "An Abounding Personality" is Dr. Shannon's tribute to his predecessor, Frank W. Gunsaulus. Other sermons included are: The Infinite Artist; the Larger Freedom; Christ's Judgment of the Universe; The Iron Gate; The Supreme Originality; To Athens—and Beyond; Housekeeping and Soulkeeping; New and Old; The Dreamer.

The Bishop and the Social Workers

PERSONAL liberty is still the big word with Bishop Gailor, who is now acting presiding bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church. He still bewails the loss of the liberty of getting drunk in the United States, which, of course, implies the liberty of another man to get him drunk. Just why men should have the liberty of making their neighbors drunk, and yet have denial to them the liberty of running houses of prostitution or of selling morphine, the bishop does not inform us. His is one of the lone voices out of the past which helps to remind us how far we have traveled in this country in a single decade. Meanwhile the social workers of the country who were formerly divided in their counsels on the prohibition question have come out astonishingly in favor of the present laws of the United States. Some of the finest statements of the operation of prohibition in this country are those which are published by the Survey, a journal of scientific spirit devoted to the cause of social uplift. The Survey recently quoted the results secured by a canvas of the various chambers of commerce in the United States. One hundred and fifteen of these commercial organizations in the United States and Canada expressed themselves as favorable to the operation of the prohibition laws, 27 as unfavorable and 13 as non-committal. One can find in such old-time whiskey towns as Peoria, Ill., a complete change of front with regard to the operation of the new laws. Peoria was never so prosperous as now, and the citizens of that progressive city are rather glad to get away from the reputation of being the leading whiskey city of the whole world. Meanwhile we may safely turn the bishop over to those Episcopalians who have done such valiant service in the temperance cause. Bishops have never been known for their alacrity in adopting new views anyway. It is perhaps too early for us to expect Bishop Gailor to see the light.

The Challenge to Protestantism

THE election of a moderate, constructively conservative, and highly enlightened pope—crowned with imposing ceremonies as “The Rector of the World”—is the most daring challenge to Protestantism since the Reformation. Already more than twenty-five nations, including heretic France and Protestant England, are represented by ministers or ambassadors at the court of the vatican. The rapprochement between Italy and the papal see proceeds, which marks a new epoch in that lady land where estrangement has been so long the order of things. Without doubt a deliberate, intelligent and strategically aggressive effort will be made to commend the new papal administration to America, by every means at command, by a pontiff who seeks to embrace the world in his fatherhood. His message to the American people was most cordial, tactful and significant. Many facts in the present situation of the world will tend to further the purpose of a leader who does at least symbolize the unity of the world at a time when there seems so little to hold the world together. World history, said Lord Bryce, is becoming one history; and nothing can stand before that manifest destiny. Can a divided, bickering Protestantism—a mere huddle of sects, each clinging to its own dialect—meet this stupendous challenge of a united, intelligent, aggressive Catholicism? Manifestly not! Either we must learn to marshal our forces, organizing the religion of freedom as the Roman church has organized the religion of authority, or the future will be dark for the faith that has made the modern world.

The Church's Claim On Men of Good Will

A BRAHAM LINCOLN gave as his excuse for not joining a church the fact that no organization could be found which would accept him on the basis of a belief in the two major commands of Jesus Christ. Ben Franklin would have joined a church on the basis of a faith in God and a program of Christian ethical improvement, but he lived outside the church because no congregation was broad enough to receive him. But times have changed. Many of the evangelical communions have so modified their creedal basis that men of the Abraham Lincoln and Ben Franklin type can join. In the light of these facts the duty of the man of good-will who believes in God is very different from that of the two great men just named. The believer in God and the good life must recognize that everything in our world must be organized to be made effective. Even so simple a thing as selling hardware must have an organization and a journal. Far more must the worship of God and the cultivation of the ethical life be the object of effective organization. To remain outside the one organization which effectively teaches little children the ten commandments, which inspires young people with worthy views of life, which lifts the burdens from the backs of the middle aged and scatters the shadows for the aged is to commit a sin of omission. Men of good will ought to join the church. One need hold no exclusive notions of the church to insist that simple efficiency requires that those who live in the spirit of Jesus should make their ideals effective through organization. The church of today needs to give the world some simple effective talking about the duty of church membership quite divorced from the old-time revivalistic way of putting things. The duty of fellowship in service is a duty impressed upon men in every trade or calling and is obviously a duty in the moral and religious life.

Dr. Lyman Abbott's "Silhouettes"

DR. ABBOTT is much too modest in describing his memories of great men whom he has known as "Silhouettes of My Contemporaries," if by silhouette we mean a black-filled outline against a background of white. They are in fact portraits, drawn with fine artistic sense, presenting with singular vividness and human color sketches of nineteen men and one woman, nearly all Americans, whom he has known in his life of more than eighty years. A man who was twenty-four years old when Lincoln delivered his Cooper Union address, has lived through the most significant and amazing period of our history; and when he can write of what he has seen and the men he has known with the simplicity and lucidity of which Dr. Abbott is master, the record is both interesting and valuable. Barnum, Booth, Gough, Fiske, Hale, Whittier, Moody, Beecher, Brooks, Lincoln, Roosevelt are some of the figures that pass before us in this book of memory. They are not biographies but personal impressions and interpretations, and often we see a man in quite another light than that made visible in a formal history. The sketches of Beecher, Brooks and Moody are vivid and delightful indeed, written with almost as much glow and intimacy as that of his own father which closes the volume. What is history to younger people was a personal experience to a man like Dr. Abbott, and the record of his memories—set in an informal air of personal friendship and affection—is a real service, rendered with the desire and accepted by his public in the grateful hope that as little as possible may be lost of the precious treasure of mankind.

Undenominational Projects for Community Churches

THE big arguments of the secretaries or other denominational ecclesiastics against union churches is that the nerve of Christian benevolence is likely to be cut. It is true, of course, that the abandonment of a denominational status does free the local church of the burden of supporting a denominational machine, but does it not open up the opportunity for a kind of service not adequately done by denominational churches? Kenwood Evangelical Church of Chicago has long been an independent church. It pays a thousand dollars a year to Morristown Normal and Industrial School, of Morristown, N. J., and its total budget of missionary and benevolent work is a most worthy one. On the foreign field are many union schools which are begging for support. Denominational churches do not come forward readily to the aid of such institutions. This task alone would furnish the community churches of the land with a benevolent budget for years to come until the number of community churches is much greater than it now is. Certain phases of the work done even by denominational missionaries becomes so broad and humanitarian that church boards at home are not always sure that the churches will support some enterprises. The community church is not so much concerned with the teaching of dogma on the foreign mission field. Such a church will readily give to these great tasks. Meanwhile the institutions in this and other lands that have a right to appeal to community churches should secure the addresses of hundreds of undenominational churches and ministers who are waiting to be led in good works. Often the churches have no clear call of duty in benevolence, and the institution beyond the sea has no certain means of support. Once a connection is established the reproach of isolation and lack of missionary feeling will be taken away from the community church entirely.

"Painted Windows:" Dusting the Church

HAVING given us pictures of British politicians, warts and all, in "The Mirrors of Downing Street," and having shown the silliness of the English Smart Set in "The Glass of Fashion," the Man with a Duster now sets himself the task of brightening the "painted windows" of the church. His knack of picturesque paradox and vivid word-painting, his divination of the defects and qualities of highly colored temperaments, and his gift of epigram serve him well in his new undertaking. It is a study in religious personality, including Dean Inge, Bishop Gore, Canon Barnes, Father Knox, Dr. Orchard, Miss Royden and others, "to discover a reason for the present rather ignoble situation of the church in the affections of men." Dean Inge, he tells us, is not a pessimist, but a conservative modernist, and more mystic than modernist; and Bishop Gore is described as "a tragedy," a great spiritual leader destroyed by devotion to tradition. Miss Royden is said to be "at once a true woman and a great man, and the most effective preacher of personal religion in England." He reserves his contempt for Dr. Orchard, along with everything that smacks of ecclesiasticism—but some of us would like to know what Dr. Orchard thinks of the Man with a Duster. Orchard, he says, is a kind of "duodecimo Chesterton, a mock Gothic mind," and more of a sort similar. It is all very clever, very bright, very futile, as we learn when we turn to the last chapter and read the outline of what the religion of today should be. The end of his brilliant dissections and disquisitions is a lame and impotent conclusion, dull, vain, half hysterical, and hardly worth discussion. So easy it is to criticize, so difficult to construct. There is no longer any doubt that Mr. Harold Begbie is the author, and before he can qualify as a prophet of manners, morals and religion he must learn to sign his name to what he writes. His anonymous attack on the personal character of Mr. Balfour was an outrage for which there is no excuse in either morals or manners.

The Scolding Religionist

SUCCESSFUL propagandists of religion sound the positive note. The world is much more interested in what they believe than in what they disapprove in the religious systems of others. The Paulist Fathers, who are the most successful of any order of Catholic priests in winning recruits to Roman Catholicism, do not indulge in billingsgate against the Protestant religion. One may attend many Christian Science lectures without hearing unfavorable comment upon the orthodox churches. Though both Catholics and Christian Scientists often express the most unfavorable opinions of their religious neighbors by the family fireside, or in other informal circles, their leaders are too wise to create a public reputation as common scolds. The propaganda of the evangelical sects has all too often lacked this positive note. One remembers the story of the young theological student who preached from the text, "Where sin doth abound, grace doth the more abound." He spoke so much of the abounding nature of sin that the effect was to reverse the meaning of his text in the minds of his hearers. The minister who always abuses the mayor, the newspapers, the theaters and certain other pet objects of his wrath may for awhile have an applauding audience of people who enjoy that sort of diatribe, but the community will appreciate more a man with better discernment who can find things to praise in the community leaders. No kind of scolding is worse than the criticism of other religious sects. The ungodly love that kind of a session, for while the saints quarrel, the sinners run the town.

Fortunately the barrage of hostile sermons raised against the "false religions" of the world has somewhat lifted. It does not work. The world wants men of conviction. It is no longer very patient of the Unitarian who slams the orthodox or with the fulminations hurled from orthodox pulpits against those who are classed as liberal.

Cynic, Fatalist, and Christian!

WE read the two volumes of the Life of Lord Salisbury, by his daughter, with mingled feelings, wondering at the strange mixture in the man of cynicism, fatalism and sincere Christian faith. "He worshipped Christ—not the Christ type or the Christ ideal, or the divine revealed in the human—with all the direct simplicity of childhood," is the tribute of his daughter. Truly he may be called "a great Christian gentleman," as he himself described Gladstone. Though a practicing churchman, he was yet fearful "that Christianity, which had destroyed two great civilizations, was about to destroy a third." A leader of a democracy, he had no faith in the people, and did not believe that human nature can be improved; and, it need hardly be added, that democracy was to him nonsense. A statesman charged with great affairs, he "felt the burden of decision as little when he was writing a dispatch upon which peace or war might depend as when he was trying to make up his mind whether or not to put on an overcoat." Responsibility, he said, he did not understand. His duty was to act in the light of all the facts available, and he was wont to add, "with results I have nothing to do." It reminds one of the saying of Robert Whitaker: "I find I am more saved in some parts of me than in other parts; and I am more saved some parts of the day than at others." Lord Salisbury was as strange a compound as Dean Inge; but that is no more than is true, in one degree or another, of the rest of us.

Church and People: "The Widening Gap"

THE Methodist Recorder, of London—one of the ablest of English religious journals—reports the substance of a very plain speech by Lord Dawson to the Anglican church congress. His lordship discussed the present attitude of the churches in regard to the opinion and conduct of the time, emphasizing "the ever-widening gap between the formal teaching of the church and the actual belief of this generation, including many who by baptism and training belong to her fold." At no time in the history of the church, he said, has there been quite so serious a gap between the church and the people as there is today. The seriousness of the situation lies in the fact that most men are not radical unbelievers—only unbelievers in organized religion. When the church sets forth its creed, men are respectful but unconvinced; there is simply no response. They do not deny, they ignore. The eternal verities abide, but their ancient expression and interpretation do not satisfy. Something took place in the minds and hearts of men during the great war; there was a change, a giving up, a different vision. Lord Dawson does not say that the church is wrong and that the modern mind is right; he simply points out the obvious estrangement which makes understanding between them difficult, and makes plea for a reinterpretation of religious truth in terms of today, in full light of modern knowledge, with sympathetic insight into the needs, yearnings and bafflements of the mind of our time. It is no good going on repeating old phrases and formulas, like speaking in an unknown tongue intelligible to only a few who know its vocabulary.

"The Pilgrim"

SINCE Jonathan Brierley went away we have had no really great religious essayist. Boreham is bright, stimulating, suggestive even in his discursiveness, and his many popular gifts entitle him to the wide reading he has won. But there is no one among us like Brierley; no one near him. Too often the religious essay is only a puddle of words, mere pious pap without intellectual value or spiritual vitality. Brierley made it an instrument of inspiration and enlightenment, by virtue of his incredible knowledge, his quick creative insight, his intellectual sparkle and spiritual verve. He was a builder of bridges, as he modestly described himself, helping his readers to escape from narrow provincialisms into the great freedoms of the mind. "J. B.," as he came to be known, was ever a delight, a surprise and a tonic for the soul.

So is Dr. Glover, whose new book, "The Pilgrim. Essays on Religion," ought to have a universal reading. Canon Barnes, of Westminster Abbey, was right when he said that the popularity of the writings of Dr. Glover is one of the good omens of our time. He is so real, so forthright, so fertile of suggestions, uniting a deep evangelical experience of Christ with an intellect alert, daring, free, and wide-ranging; a vital mind laid against the truths of faith and the facts of life. His versatility is amazing, and he has the curious power of writing about old themes as if no one had ever discovered them before. It is this freshness of insight and approach that makes him so attractive, joined with a style simple, sinewy, flexible, vivid, with now a flash of crimson and now a gleam of gold. His studies of Jesus in History and Experience are memorable, and a new book from his pen is both a religious and a literary event.

The title essay reminds us of a fact which we so easily forget, or try to forget, in this fine world with its houses, lands, trades, honors, titles, and vanity fair—that we are pilgrims and must pass on, however wistfully we may look back. Busy himself as he may, seeking out many inventions, there are times when the solid earth is touched with eerie strangeness, and man knows that the earth is not his real city. The old homesickness of soul returns, and he pauses to look away into the heavens. Were it otherwise, the mountains would be as a garden wall and the stars as the twinkling lights of a cottage window. No, the Pilgrim is not gone; he is still treading our streets, clad in a garb of his own, with a strange speech on his lips, his gaze strained afar, yet curiously keen in seeing through what is near. Aye, though he seem as odd as Don Quixote, the pilgrim, the idealist, the far-seer is the only wise man; he alone is practical.

Such is the background of the book, against which we see, first, the lonely, heroic, tormented figure of Jeremiah, not simply the prophet but the man, a real person, human, arresting, haunting, made to live again by those exquisite brief touches of fact and phrase—unnoticed by the casual reader—of which the essayist is so perfect a master. Not less poignant is the study of the 137th Psalm, "An Ancient Hymn of Hate," and the suggestion that the singer had seen his own child hurled against the stone wall of the city by a brutal soldier. It is when Dr. Glover touches the life of Jesus that he is at his best; and we are tempted to say that the essay on "The Meaning of Christmas Day" is the finest religious essay of our generation. Written for the men of the British army, it was reprinted, we understand, for the American army. As a brief, vivid, direct, winning statement of Christian fact and faith, we doubt if there is another piece of writing to surpass it.

Other gospel studies have to do with "The Training at Nazareth," the parable of "The Talents," and an attempt to reconstruct the events of "The Last Evening" of Jesus with his disciples, showing the yearning, almost wistful craving of the Master for human fellowship while walking his lonely way. No doubt the essay on "The Holy Spirit" will provoke debate, but no one else, so far as we are aware, has ever traced its evolution—if we may use that word in these days of reaction—from early, dim foregleams in primitive faiths, to the sublime and all-transfiguring conception and experience of the New Testament. Another paper pertinent to the time is "A Lost Article of Faith," showing how, if there is a false other-worldliness born of a false idea of God, there is also a true Christian other-worldliness which we dare not forget. It makes one wish that Dr. Glover would expound for us the great poem of William Blake, "The Everlasting Gospel," with its rather blunt beginning:

The vision of Christ that thou dost see
Is my vision's greatest enemy . . .
Thine is the Friend of all mankind;
Mine speaks in parables to the blind.

No one ever went quite so far as Blake, who saw something in Jesus which very few of us have ever seen.

In his series of studies of living preachers in The Christian Century, Dr. Newton referred to a story which he heard Dr. Glover tell in the Westminster Chapel—a fiction made up of fact, all true but not true of any one man, entitled "The Good Shepherd." Happily that story is included in this volume of essays, and for sheer beauty and charm both of insight and expression Dr. Glover has never done anything better of its kind. It reproduces the very atmosphere in which the early church struggled, suffered and triumphed, its terrible persecutions, its intrepid faith, its all-conquering gentleness, as well as the crude beginnings of Christian art. This story, if retold in every church in the land, would stir the heart of youth and age alike with a sense of the reality and power and wonder of our Christian faith, and perhaps help us to recapture somewhat of its glow and fire and joy.

The Golden Rule Factory 'Under Fire'

DURING the past two years the interest of church folk and large bodies of other earnest people has been directed toward the remarkable development of the industrial enterprise of the A. Nash Company of Cincinnati. Mr. Nash, with a gift of eloquence far beyond that possessed by the average layman, has interpreted on the platform and through current magazines his religious ideals for industrial relationships. The golden rule was wrought into his business at its beginning, in 1919. With incredible swiftness the business has grown from practically nothing in less than three years to one of the largest and most profitable in the clothing industry. This growth Mr. Nash has credited to the operation of the golden rule which he and his organization have consistently sought to reckon with as a law as fundamental in human relationship where men work together across the wage line as gravitation is in the physical universe. Those who hold that the Christian gospel applies to social and industrial situations as well as to individual souls have felt that in no slight degree the Nash concern was carrying on an experiment in whose principles and outcome the church had a vital stake.

This Christian public will read with no surprise that the whole scheme has been undergoing the most minute and searching investigation from many angles of interest. Competitors have been sending representatives to study the Nash company's methods. They have been shown every courtesy and given every opportunity to check up on the facts which have been the subject matter of the prophetic eloquence of the head of the company. In his interpretation of the ethical ideals of Jesus as applied to human affairs, Mr. Nash has not in his public addresses been sufficiently explicit as to the non-union basis of his relation to his employees to prepare his sympathetic public for the slashing attack now being made upon his factory by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. This attack has created so much of a sensation that journals like the Survey and the New Republic have rushed special writers to Cincinnati to get special articles for their papers. The hostility of unionism to the non-union basis of the Nash enterprise is, of course, so intense that no stone will be left unturned to discredit the claims put forward by its eloquent owner and interpreter.

In the belief that the Christian stake in the experiment was substantial enough to warrant the gathering of the most authentic information an informal committee from the social service commission of the Federal Council of Churches is now engaged in making a thorough-going investigation. The facts are being made accessible to the members of this committee in a spirit of utter candor; the books and payrolls are in their possession and they are carrying their investigations down the line of workers from the foremen and superintendents to the humblest worker. We shall look forward to the full report of this committee, which is promised at an early date; but meanwhile it is desirable to meet certain specific charges which have gained wide currency through the official journal of the Amalgamated organization and an article under the sarcastic heading, "An Eight-Carat Golden Rule," in the last issue of the New Republic. The charges of the Amalgamated and the findings of the committee upon them so far as made up at the date of this writing may be summed up as follows:

1. Children under age are working without legal certificates.

Just one such has been found. It is easy to lie a year or two about your age.

2. The average pay for workmen is from $12 to $16 a week.

Found by an examination of the payroll to be 50 per cent higher.

3. Wages in general are from $4 to $8 per week less than union wages.

The union scale is one thing in Chicago, Indianapolis and Rochester, another in New York, and still another in Cincinnati. On weekly rate the Nash scale is lower; on a yearly average it is higher because there is little loss of time and no laying-off in the Nash factory.

4. There is no extra wage for overtime, therefore the far-heralded 40 hour week means nothing.

There is no penalizing increase for overtime. There has been no overtime since the adoption of the 40 hour week, which has given women their Saturdays for home, children and chores. Its test will come in the rush season. It is a serious fault in the system if extra pay is not given when overtime work is actually put in.

5. Week workers are forced to produce a certain amount or suffer discharge.

No sufficient evidence of this yet discovered. Discharges for any cause seem to be very few.

6. Pressers are forced to do double the stint daily that is required in a union shop.

Found nothing to justify use of the word forced. Whatever they do they seem to do with good cheer.

7. Cutters (a highly skilled task) are piece workers and have to do almost twice as much as union cutters on week wage pay to earn the same income.

These skilled men profess contentment and claim they earn a much higher average per week than the union weekly scale allows. There may be some difference on account of quality of suit made.

8. The workers are penalized with heavy fines for mistakes, being late to work, etc.

Emphatically denied by the management who ask for fullest investigation among the workers.

Throughout the criticisms there runs a subtle strain of cynical glee over the prospect of catching the champion of industrial idealism in the act of capitalizing his golden rule "bunk" for his own selfish ends. The committee, however, finds its faith in Mr. Nash's sincerity and in the validity of the golden rule idea confirmed rather than weakened by their investigations. They have found weaknesses in the system, the chief weaknesses being the lack of system, and the absence of an adequate technique to insure a democratic administration of the Nash program. The owner's religious and ethical principles are imperiled by the fact that these principles depend almost wholly upon his own personality and the contagion of his enthusiasm. In lieu of a democratic organization, the plan operates by spontaneous impulse and thus lies open to error, to suspicion and to just such charges by organized labor as it is now facing. It is understood that the committee will make definite recommendations to the company on this score.

Such advance information as to the committee's findings as may be given out at this time includes also an expression of the committee's conviction that the Amalgamated leaders and representatives are actuated by a quality of sincerity no less admirable than that which they believe is possessed by Mr. Nash. There are sufficient facts available to give countenance to the charges that have been formulated. Certain disgruntled workers were found who gave an angle of departure for a hostile judgment. No group of human beings are likely to be 100 per cent above the level of complaint with any situation which they share in common, and garment workers are no more saints than the rest of us. But critics of a great venture of faith and brotherly love such as Mr. Nash has made should be more sure of their facts than the present critics have seemed to be.

The social service committee are being afforded every facility to get at the facts. Books, pay-rolls, auditors' reports and workroom doors were opened to them, nothing being withheld. Charges that certain resolutions supposed to come from the workrooms had been really sent down from the office were run down and found to be unsubstantiated. The committee is convinced that the workers are contented and, to use a current vulgarity, that the golden rule idea has been "sold" to them.

We hold no brief for Mr. Nash. We could wish that certain things were otherwise. We would prefer that his practice were not accompanied by eloquence. His doing would be more credible if he would allow his achievement to speak for itself without so much argument and exhortation. But a man of business in whose soul the fires of eloquence burn naturally finds it next to impossible to resist the temptation to rush into public expression. After all we have to take men as God made them. Moreover there is an unavoidable skepticism with which a unique enterprise like this is regarded, due to a certain intuition that its success may lie in its uniqueness, rather than in its discovery of a universal law. How far its distinctiveness absolves it from the normal obligations which all industry owes to the union principle cannot be determined arbitrarily.

The Amalgamated Clothing Workers have rendered one of the greatest services ever accomplished in behalf of labor. They have lifted the most "sweated" of industries to the level of decent hours and wages and established contractual working relationships that reduce friction and the possibility of strikes to the minimum. In the Nash institution a new principle has come in, a principle of solidarity among owners and management and workers. Whether our social ethics should compel a vertical "union" such as this which takes the whole factory in, to make a place for the class conscious union whose fundamental principle is the opposition of interest between employer and employes, is a question that cannot be settled from a doctrinaire point of view. The golden rule idea must evolve its own method. Miracles should not be expected in two short years of a business that is growing by leaps and bounds. A great idea must evolve a great and adequate and appropriate technique to carry it out, and we have faith that Mr. Nash will make facile provision for such a development to take place.

The Ancient Mariner

A Parable of Safed the Sage

HERE once lived upon the shore of Casco Bay an Ancient Mariner, who sailed his sloop along the coast from the Grand Banks to Cape Hatteras, and from Boston Light to Barnegat. And he had never studied the science and the Mathematicks of Navigation. And believe me, that is no joke. For he had grown up largely in the Focsle, and had received his education before the Mast, which he called Mawst, and in his day the way to educate a boy at sea was to cuff him first and tell him what to do afterward, and to give no reason for either the cuff or the command. And so it came to pass that when he became Master of a Ship, he had had a Liberal Experience but very little of what was technically known as Navigation. Yet he crossed the Ocean many times, and made several trips to the Far East, and he battled with Typhoons in the Yellow Sea. And they do say that there were few finer fights or better worth seeing than he put up when he reefed the topsls and battened down the hatches, and went into the ring for a seventy-two hour bout with Neptune. And out of some of those encounters Neptune emerged with a badly bruised eye, and a list to starboard, which the old skipper did not call starboard, but stabbud. And yet he had never studied Navigation, and all the books of Mathematickal Tables he knew by reputation only.

And there were certain who inquired of him, saying, How is it that thou dost sail the Raging Main from Casco Bay to Far Cathay in thine old windjammer, and yet thou hast never studied Navigation?

And he answered, I know enough about Navigation to git aout of Boston Harbor, and then I kin go where I dum please.

Now this word I pass along to men who are younger than I, and I say unto them, There is no part of this Voyage of Life that is safe, else would it be much less interesting. Nevertheless, I counsel thee to have especial care not to run ashore while getting out of the Harbor. If thou wouldst make this trip upon the High Seas of Life and make it joyously and triumphantly, wreck not thy life by youthful follies. Keep a firm grip of the helm till thou art well over the bar, and out upon the Wide Sea, and then shake out the sails, and here is my good wish to thee for a safe and happy and Prosperous Voyage, and a good anchorage within God's land-locked Haven when the trip is done.

Wanted—A New Apocalyptic!

By S. Arthur Devan

THE most casual reader of the synoptic gospels is aware that they contain many sayings and discourses of a strongly eschatological character, attributed to Jesus. There are the predictions that the Son of Man—in itself, as we now know, a purely apocalyptic designation—that the Son of Man will come on the clouds of heaven, and all the holy angels with him; that his coming will mean the end of the present age; that it will be heralded by a period of woes and tribulations; that this period of trial is shortened for the elects' sake; that at its conclusion, when the Son of Man cometh, there will be a great judgment and separation of sheep from goats, of wheat from tares, after which the reprobate will go into outer darkness where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched, while the elect will come from the east and the west, from the north and the south, and sit down with Abraham and Isaac and the prophets at the great messianic feast; that this messianic banquet is itself symbolic of the blessedness of the new messianic kingdom which is to be the predominant characteristic of the new age so to be ushered in; that in this kingdom the twelve apostles will sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel; and finally, that all this development is not the distant possibility of some remote future period of history, but something imminent, right at hand, something definitely promised to take place in the lifetime of men standing around Jesus as he spoke; nay more, that the final denouement is so close that the persecuted will not have time to flee through all the cities of little Israel, ere the end will come; nay, the text of the gospels makes possible an even more immediate expectation of the end, and the prediction reads that even before the twelve have finished the mission on which Jesus sent them through the cities and villages crying, "the kingdom of God is at hand!"—even before they have finished their mission and passed through all the cities of Israel, the cataclysm will fall, the woes will begin like a black cloud preceding the dawn!

THE ESCHATOLOGICAL SAYINGS

These eschatological sayings have always been a touchstone of gospel interpretation. The millenarian gloats over them and fits them into whatever mechanical scheme he happens to favor. The pious Christian reader, with that practical eclecticism which characterizes true religious faith, simply overlooks them, or judges that they contain mysteries too great for simple Christians to concern themselves about. The theological liberal, not knowing what else to do with them, has been in the habit of dismissing them entirely, under the cool assumption that they do not represent the words of Jesus at all, but are a reflection of the vivid chiliasm of the early church, which the evangelical tradition has read back into Jesus' time and put into his lips without warrant.

But it is the increasing conviction of New Testament scholarship that none of these expedients for doing away with the vivid apocalyptic hopes expressed by Jesus is justified. The gospels are truer to history than the critics of the gospels. Not only are these passionate eschatological sayings authentic utterances of Jesus, but much else in his teaching and life that we have not been accustomed to interpret eschatologically at all—the beatitudes and the Lord's prayer, for example—has primarily an apocalyptic significance.

THE MESSIANIC KINGDOM

The rigid eschatological school, indeed, finds very little in the gospels that is not apocalyptic. John the Baptist had come to Israel at a time when the hearts of the people were seething with eschatological hopes of the kind which the book of Enoch and other extra-canonical writings that have survived, make familiar to us. John had flung out the announcement that the messianic kingdom was at hand. That meant only one thing to the Israelites of his day, not that a political human messiah was to come and set them free from the Roman yoke, as we have so often been told, but that the great supernatural events preceding the end and the coming of the Son of Man on the clouds of heaven, were about to begin. All Israelites who desired to share in the blessings of the coming messianic kingdom, and to survive the woes that would precede it, must repent and prepare themselves for these grand events. Soon after John came Jesus, with the same message, only more definite. The thought of Jesus added to the message of John a more positive ethical teaching, but this, according to this school of interpreters, was not world ethics. The sermon on the mount and the other ethical teaching of Jesus is no general system of righteousness of universal validity, but simply contains directions how men should act in view of the speedy end of the present age—an ethic for the interval between his time of speaking and the end of all things which was so soon to come. Further than this, the thought of Jesus added other specific data: first, that John the Baptist was himself the Elijah, who in popular apocalyptic expectation, was to come again to earth soon before the end, as prophesied in Malachi; second, that the woes preceding the end might be expected to come at once, within the very year of his ministry; and third, that Jesus himself was the Son of Man who was to come in glory.

As regards the first of these definite additions of Jesus to the general apocalyptic conceptions, the eschatologists say that Jesus regarded the identification of John with Elijah, frankly, as a matter difficult of acceptance. "If ye will receive it, this is Elijah which was to come." Such an identification had not occurred to anyone else, not even to John himself; it is believed that John had the question whether Jesus were not Elijah, not whether he were the messiah, in mind, when he sent the embassy asking, "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" As regards the second of these points, Jesus expected the new age to begin, or at least the preliminaries of it to begin, during the mission of the twelve: before they should have gone through all the cities of Israel, the "woes" would begin. In this expectation Jesus was disappointed. Hence he withdrew into the parts of Caesarea Philippi, though as popular as ever with the multitude. He saw then that Israel was not yet ready for the new age, still too sinful and unrepentant for the Son of Man to come; there must be further suffering by or on behalf of Israel before the kingdom could be brought down, as it were, from the skies. Hence he resolved to go to Jerusalem, and to die there as a ransom for his people. He would take upon himself the woes due to the nation before the kingdom could come—like Arnold von Winkelried at Sempach. He would fulfill the prophecy of the suffering servant of Jehovah in Isaiah 53. The result of that vicarious offering would be the immediate coming of the kingdom with power. In this expectation he went to his voluntary death at the hands of the Jerusalem authorities.

Even on the evening before the crucifixion, at the last supper, Jesus bespoke his confident expectation that his death would bring the kingdom at once. He said, "I will not henceforth drink of the fruit of the vine till I drink it new with you in the kingdom." As regards the third of the additions to the current apocalyptic hope, the fact that Jesus himself was to be the messiah, that was the greatest of all the "mysteries of the kingdom." No Jew would have dreamed for a minute that a human person like Jesus could be the messiah, miracles or no miracles. John the Baptist did not dream of it. It was a secret in the breast of Jesus himself till that fateful moment at Caesarea Philippi, when Peter stumbled on the truth and blurted it out. From then on it was a secret known to the apostles, never to the multitude. This fatal disclosure it was which the traitor, Judas, betrayed to the high priests, rather than the mere revealing of a convenient place for the apprehension of Jesus. The high priest once being aware of the claim, which indeed Jesus acknowledged publicly for the first time in answer to the high priest's question at the trial, no further witnesses were needed; Jesus was put to death without more ado; his life given a voluntary sacrifice to bring on the new age.

ATMOSPHERE OF APOCALYPTIC PASSION

Such in brief is the eschatological interpretation of the life of Jesus. There can be no question that it clears up many difficult passages in the gospels. Possibly it clears them up too completely, after the manner of Voltaire's writings, of which some one said, "Nothing could possibly be as clear as Voltaire makes it." It is easy to score points against the more extreme positions of the eschatological school, but in the main they have made out their case. Jesus can never again be regarded as the old nineteenth century liberal school regarded him, as a sort of cultivated Christian gentleman of humanitarian instincts. Jesus would never have made the impression on his own or subsequent times, had he been a mere teacher of humanitarian ethics and liberal theology like that. On the contrary he lived and thought and spoke in an atmosphere vibrant with apocalyptic passions. He handled the raw nerves of men's keenest desires. He addressed himself to those vast eschatological schemes that had seized the imaginations of men and excited their vibrant hopes. His speech was red-hot with expectation of the reign of the Son of Man, and it set men aflame. The new movement started with the burning conviction that these were the last times, and the day of the Lord was at hand.

We all know the part which the vivid hope of the parousia took in the early church; no one can read Acts or the Epistles or Revelation without being impressed by it. It is important to notice that the tremendous vigor which the primitive church displayed, and which was so intense that we of the present day can only survey it with astonishment, was due in large part to the apocalyptic motive by which primitive Christians were dominated. The great imaginative conception of the last times provided the motive power. Read Peter's speech at Pentecost, and you will quickly observe the connection between the apocalyptic ideas that underlie it and the tremendous flood of spiritual enthusiasm which it turned loose.

Now this apocalyptic, what is it but a transcendent portrayal of religious truths addressed to the imagination of men? What is it but a manner of dealing with spiritual realities under the dramatic guise of great supernatural pictures? What is it but the reign of God represented to the imagination of mankind, by a gigantic metaphor? The Jesus described by many "Lives of Christ," the amiable teacher who went about doing good, healing the sick, and teaching lofty ethics, would never have taken mankind by storm. An early church, cherishing a well-ordered theology, and appealing to the intellects of men, would never have swept the empire. But an apocalyptic Jesus, and a church shaken with passionate anticipation of the new age about to drop upon the world, startled mankind as with a clap of thunder.

OUR OWN TIME

Turn now from the world of the first century to the world today, and look at the place which apocalyptic ideas hold in Christian teaching of our time. We need not describe at length the recrudescence of pre-millenarianism which is spreading over the country, and troubling our churches. That is a revival of Judaistic apocalyptic. It is significant mainly as an exhibition of the enthusiasm which apocalyptic ideas—that is, religious ideas which appeal to the imagination on a large scale—can evoke among the masses. The modern liberal scoffs at this crude pre-millenarianism. But what, I ask, is there in his teaching that will so fill men with enthusiasm that they will chalk up "Jesus is Coming" or any other religious watchword, in every public place? Has liberal religion got anything like that to show in the way of effective religious leadership? Your liberal may reply that this kind of thing appeals only to those who fill the place of the ignorant and the unlearned. But should not true Christianity appeal to those very people most of all? Jesus did. The common people heard him gladly; but none of the rulers of this world, nor of the wise believed on him.

The fact that the contemptuous attitude which the ordinary liberal Christian leader displays by surveying this millenarianism, while it is, indeed, justified by the essential absurdity of the adventist ideas, is nevertheless rank folly when one considers that the higher spiritual view is allowed to be so deficient in leadership as to permit whole reservoirs of spiritual power to leak away, and the masses of the people to be misled as sheep not having a shepherd.

The truth is that much preaching of the gospel, by the best educated and clearest thinking expositors, is dull, stale, and unprofitable. It does not touch the hearer on the nerves.

MODERN APOCALYPTIC

The modern point of view does possess the material for an apocalyptic that can be made to appeal to the popular imagination. We, too, believe in a kingdom of God. To be sure, the kingdom of our thought is not entirely describable under the same categories as the messianic kingdom of the synoptic gospels, but it is an organic development out of that. Jesus said all that men in his time and of his environment could understand. St. Paul and the author of the fourth gospel developed the kingdom idea into one very close to that of which we think today. The kingdom which is not eating and drinking, but righteousness, peace, and joy in the spirit, which means the rule of God in men's hearts, and in all the institutions of human society on earth, and includes as well the spirits of all just men made perfect in heaven—that is a conception, the grandeur of which has but begun to dawn on human hearts. Some of us feel it a little, preach it a little. But the kingdom idea has never seized the imagination of the rank and file of Christendom. And the reason is that it has never been put in terms of the imagination. It has never been embodied in an apocalyptic. Here, then, is the need for that new apocalyptic. There is vast power, capable of sweeping the world for the kingdom, stored up in the subconscious self of Christendom, awaiting release, and only to be released when that master magician, the imagination, speaks the word. When the gospel of the kingdom, as we begin to apprehend it today, shall be finally clothed in the garb of dramatic splendor that will make of it an apocalyptic vision, then mankind will awake.

To do this will be the work of prophet and poet. We still misuse the word "prophet." Once we applied it to prognosticators of the future, and that was a misuse; now we apply it to anyone who denounces the injustices of present-day industrialism, which is also a misuse. The true prophet denounced sin, to be sure, but what made him a prophet was his vision of a redeemed future. We need the poet, too. We have no poetry of the kingdom, either in or out of the hymn-book. The old hymn-books indeed, had no kingdom hymns—look in the "Baptist Hymnal," and see what you can find there expressive of the hopes of the kingdom!—while the newer hymn-books try to remedy the defect by introducing the few kingdom hymns that exist; but the latter are mostly uninspired; I for one would rather sing "Jerusalem the Golden" or the "Dies Irae," than all hymns of social Christianity that have ever been written; there is more imagination in them. But prophets and poets can not be had to order; I suppose we shall have to wait for them to be born.

And yet there are some contributions which all Christian teachers can make toward the new apocalyptic. First of all, we can be positive, not negative. Apocalyptic always sees the glorious future about to break; but much of our modern social teaching about the kingdom is negative and pessimistic. Instead of inciting men by a stirring vision of a future so ideal that they will all yearn to contribute their lives to its achievement, we have made the gospel of the kingdom too much a negative fighting kind of business of which we cannot be sure of the outcome—fighting against alcohol, or war, or tuberculosis, or continental Sundays. That does not attract or inspire men. It does not even lead men to fight. It irritates them. But put before men's minds a glowing vision of a glorious future in which the absence of these evils is only part of the picture, and positive emphasis is laid on the good will and the brotherhood and the beauty and the splendor of that reign of God, and men will get up and throw their lives into the struggle.

Secondly, we can all use our own imaginations so far as we have any, to stir up the imaginations of others, to see the heavenly vision. When once men do see it, they will not be disobedient, for humanity is moved through the imagination. I sympathize with the person who goes to church for religious inspiration, and instead of a sermon hears an address on the child-labor problem, and goes home groaning, and attends another church next time. Problems and statistics and facts have their place in religious education, a place too long neglected, but there is no inspiration in problems and statistics and facts, and one listens to a sermon to get inspiration. The inspiration will come when the preacher throws the bright-colored hues of the imagination about the problems, the statistics and the facts. What chance has a sermon about industrial relations to hold the common man, as against a sermon about Armageddon and the Last Things? When he hears the former, unimaginatively dealt with, all that happens is further depression added to his week-end weariness; when he has heard the latter, he walks home with the feeling that he has been lifted to the supernal regions and heard that which it is not lawful for man to utter. Perhaps he has.

USE OF IMAGINATION

Finally, we have a starting point for the new apocalyptic in the conception of the New Jerusalem. Let us picture the future as it ought to be, and let that vision exalt men. Plato and Sir Thomas More and Edward Bellamy and Carlyle and Ruskin have influenced society more than almost any other secular writers that can be named. Why? Because they opened their eyes to see the invisible, and then wrote down that vision for the imagination of their duller-eyed fellow mortals. This, too, is the special function of the preacher. He is to make them lift their eyes and peer through the mist that sin and selfishness and blindness have created, until they discern, dimly though it may be, the fair and glorious outlines of that heavenly city, the New Jerusalem, descending from God out of heaven, a city settling ever more and more solidly on earthly foundations, a city into which no unclean thing shall enter, a city where is situate the throne of God and of the Lamb, and where his servants shall serve him, with his name upon their foreheads. When that radiant vision once becomes clear in the imagination of mankind, and warm with its passion, immense stores of spiritual energy will be released for its attainment, and again the world will be startled with the cry of Good News—"Repent ye, for the kingdom of God is at hand!"

On the Condition of Civil Liberty

By Albert de Silver

AMERICANS have always believed that their country was a land of political toleration. They have been accustomed to feel sure that civil and political liberty were firmly embedded in the frame-work of the fundamental law. Until a few years ago, the alien and sedition laws of 1798 were the only examples of interference by the civil government with important political liberties and we all remember how we were taught in school that those enactments were the classic examples of political blundering.

But, nevertheless, when the war came in 1917, it was not surprising that tolerance for minority opinions ceased. A national effort which called for the mobilization of the entire country for war purposes, was not solicitous for the liberties of those who disagreed with it. On the ground that all dissent must mean obstruction, we set about suppressing minority opinion. Newspapers and periodicals which voiced the views of the heretical few were barred from the mails, and before the armistice came, close to two thousand people had been prosecuted under the espionage act, in fact, if not in theory, for the utterances of unpopular words in speech or print.

Such a mass of prosecutions was of course wholly unheard of in this country. With the return of peace, the tide turned, and the wave of suppression commenced to recede. We are now more than three years away from the war and it may be worth while to consider how far we have returned toward normal, as well as the extent to which the theory and practise of suppression still remain.

POSTAL POWERS

So far as the federal government is concerned, most of the repressive legislation has either been repealed or suspended. The postmaster general, however, under a peacetime section of the criminal code and under an unrepealed section of the espionage law, still possesses the power to exclude from the mails matter which in his judgment tends to incite to certain forms of crime or which contains the advocacy of "treason, insurrection or the forcible resistance to a law of the United States." The danger in the existence of such a power lies, of course, not so much in what it purports to accomplish as in what it may be construed to accomplish. The clear case of a publication advocating forcible resistance to law in direct terms seldom, if ever, arises. In each case the question is whether some other words will be construed to amount to the prohibited advocacy. The postmaster must of necessity make a decision as to the tendency of language, and that it is dangerous to give such a power to an executive officer has been considered axiomatic ever since Jefferson wrote the famous preamble to the Virginia resolutions on religious toleration.

Moreover, the supreme court of the United States in the Milwaukee-Leader case has recently held that under the postal classification act of 1879, the postmaster general has the power to revoke a newspaper's second class mailing permit for future issue because of his belief that the paper has violated some federal statute in its past issues. That this rule of law makes a censorship possible can scarcely be doubted because no newspaper or periodical can circulate on a commercially possible basis unless it is allowed to circulate at second class rates. It is only fair to say, however, that the present postmaster general has adopted a calm and liberal attitude in the exercise of these powers. But the powers are there nevertheless, and it is questionable statesmanship to make the freedom of the press depend upon the liberal mindedness of a particular officer of government.

PLOTS AGAINST GOVERNMENT

During the first year after the armistice, when the daily press was filled with highly-colored reports of the progress of the Russian revolution, a great wave of excitement of a new sort swept across the country. All sorts of tiny and impotent radical organizations were thought to be contemplating the forcible overthrow of the government. And what was more surprising, the opinion seemed to prevail for awhile that there was sufficient chance of their succeeding to call for repressive legislation. The attorney general of the United States, who should have known better, gave considerable color to this view by repeated statements to the press, which gave the impression of the existence of a formidable plot to overthrow the government and of a need for energetic and vigorous measures to prevent it. It was not until the attorney general's statements of fact and law in this regard were successfully challenged before a congressional committee, and until certain illegal practices of his department in dealing with radicals had been made public by a committee of twelve distinguished members of the bar, that the campaign ceased.

By this time, however, congress had almost been led to adopt a sweeping sedition law, which, fortunately, has since been blocked, and thirty-three states had adopted statutes penalizing sedition or the advocacy of criminal syndicalism, criminal anarchy and the like. Most of these statutes purported to prohibit agitation for political or industrial change by force or violence, but many punished as well such vaguely defined offenses as the advocacy of "unlawful methods of terrorism," and some went so far as to prohibit the agitation of radical change without regard to the legality of the method suggested. Here also, we have statutes which punish persons for the tendency of the words they utter. Substantially never is the defendant accused of having directly advocated violent revolution. In practically every case it is a question of whether the tendency of some other words be construed as likely to incite some other person to unlawful acts. How widely reasonable human beings may differ as to the interpretation of language is a matter of common knowledge. Yet criminality is made to depend upon just such interpretation, and that without regard to whether any unlawful acts are in fact committed as a result of the language used or whether there was reasonable likelihood that they would be committed. Moreover such phrases as "unlawful methods of terrorism" are vague and necessarily call for a shifting judicial definition at variance with the axiom of the criminal law that crime must be set forth with definiteness and certainty so that everybody will know just what conduct must be avoided in order to keep out of trouble.

PUNISHED FOR MEMBERSHIP

Perhaps of all the questionable features of these statutes, the most objectionable is the clause which punishes mere membership in an organization formed to advocate the prohibited doctrines. For a hundred years and more, it has been fundamental to the criminal law that guilt is personal and shall not attach to anyone merely by association. This great principle, which has been said by Mr. Charles E. Hughes to be "indispensable to the institutions of liberty," is violated by the membership clauses which most of these statutes contain. The legality or illegality of a particular organization is determined by the most extreme statements contained in its literature or voiced by its most loose-tongued members, and thereafter any member is guilty under the law irrespective of any conduct on his part other than the act of joining and continuing a member.

The constitutionality of the statutes of this general nature has been upheld by the courts of last resort in Minnesota, New Jersey, Washington, Connecticut and California. The clauses penalizing mere membership have been specifically sustained in California and Washington, in which states most of the present prosecutions take place. The question has not yet been presented to the supreme court of the United States, but with the possible exception of the membership clauses, it seems likely that the constitutionality of these laws will be upheld. In New Mexico the sedition law of that state was held unconstitutional and a similar decision was reached as to one section of the New Jersey statute; in both of these cases, however, the law under consideration penalized the advocacy of fundamental change irrespective of the legality of the means suggested.

MEETINGS IN PUBLIC STREETS

Among the other legacies of the public excitement of the last five years are the restrictions which have been placed on the right to hold meetings on the public streets. Before the war such was, of course, a well-accepted right, subject to abridgement in case unlawful consequences followed. The example of Hyde Park was heeded and widely imitated. Latterly, however, many cities in all parts of the country have adopted local ordinances giving to the mayor or chief of police an unregulated discretion to grant or withhold permits for street meetings and forbidding such meetings unless a permit be issued. In practise, this, of course, means that permits are refused to those whose views are deemed dangerous by the chief of police, who has thus become, in fact, a sort of censor of speeches in public places. When his censorship is exercised, the right of peaceable assemblage is restricted to the right to hire a hall, and when those who are thus barred from the streets have no money or cannot secure a hall, the right of assemblage for them is non-existent. In Duquesne, Pa., for example, every hall is owned or controlled by the Carnegie Steel Company or its business associates. The mayor has consistently refused to issue a permit for the steel workers to hold union meetings upon the public streets. After their applications for a permit had been repeatedly ignored, they tried to hold a meeting anyway, and were arrested for their pains. Their conviction was sustained by the Pennsylvania supreme court and no union meetings have been held in that city nor can they be. The Connecticut supreme court, however, in a similar case involving the campaign speakers of the socialist party, reached the contrary result and declared such an ordinance unconstitutional. In New York, the court of appeals has followed the Pennsylvania rule.

Besides violation of the civil liberty under the authority of law, interferences also occur from time to time without any color of legality whatever. The police department in New York City some months ago broke up a meeting called by a committee of distinguished and socially prominent men and women to discuss the morality of birth control. The meeting was dispersed before a word had been said. In Gary, Ind., not long ago, the chief of police broke up a meeting held to raise funds for the Russian famine sufferers because he did not approve of the speakers. In Philadelphia, the police, without any authority in law, require a permit for any meeting in public places or on private property, exercise a censorship over the speakers and topics of discussion, and prevent the meeting if no permit is secured.

MOB ACTION

Unhappily from time to time there also occur instances where fundamental liberties are abridged by mob action. In January of this year two men were arrested and convicted of vagrancy in Shreveport, La. They were working in the oil fields at the time and sought to test the legality of their conviction by a writ of habeas corpus. A lawyer was secured and came to Shreveport to sue out the writ. Within two or three days he was forcibly ejected by a mob. Another lawyer came from Chicago. The evening before the case was to come up in court he was taken by a mob from the lobby of his hotel, carried out of town, whipped across the back, put on a train and sent over the state line. The authorities at Shreveport are regretful but express themselves as unable to locate any of those guilty.

Last but by no means least, the philosophy of suppression has been carried over into the field of industrial relations and during the last two or three years there has been rapid growth in the body of judicial decisions ruling adversely upon the legality of many of the usual activities of labor unions. In the words of Mr. Justice Minturn of the New Jersey supreme court:

"Within a few years we have gone to radical lengths in practically excising from the fundamental law some of the basic rights which English and American legal and political history have rendered sacred, for the purpose apparently of vindicating a conception of contractual relationship imbedded in the legal doctrine of master and servant."

What are some of these basic rights which have been practically eradicated from the fundamental law? In New Jersey, the right is denied to strikers peacefully to picket the plant where a strike is in progress, on the ground that any picketing is necessarily intimidating to the strike-breakers. And the supreme court of the United States in a decision handed down last December has adopted the same view, limiting the strikers to only one representative at each entrance to the plant. In some state courts and in the federal courts as well, the right to advise others to refrain from patronizing a firm deemed to be unfair to organized labor is held illegal, a view all the more surprising because of the employers' right, protected by the constitution, to refuse to hire and to blacklist members of a labor union. The supreme court of the United States, and its rule has been followed in many state courts, has held in effect that an employer can prevent the unionization of the men in his employ by an oral agreement as a part of the hiring to the effect that they will not join a union. Such an agreement, these courts hold, will be protected by injunction as well as the employers' rights to maintain a closed non-union shop. Moreover, the Sherman anti-trust law has been held by the supreme court to restrict the activities of labor unions still further and the supposed right of union men to refuse to work on goods made under non-union conditions has been held to be a conspiracy in restraint of trade and hence illegal.

AN INDUSTRIAL CODE

More disastrous of all, the supreme court in the recent decision of Truax vs. Corrigan, by a majority of one, has just seriously curtailed the power of a state legislature to establish a policy contrary to the policy outlined in the decisions referred to. The Arizona legislature had adopted a sort of industrial code which legalized peaceful picketing, boycotting and the like, and abolishing the remedy of injunction against them. This, the supreme court in effect holds, the legislature could not constitutionally do, and the Arizona statute is therefore null and void. Thus we find ourselves powerless to follow the example of England, for example, in her trade disputes act of 1906, or to adopt any proposed legislative solution of the industrial problem, in certain directions at least, without the danger of a veto from the supreme court which can only be reversed by constitutional amendment. How far it is wise to permit judicial control over important public policy is a question of increasing gravity. The extent of the control as it exists is all too little appreciated. Such cases as Truax vs. Corrigan throw it into sharp relief and make it the duty of all good citizens who are concerned with our political institutions to ask themselves with some earnestness whether it is altogether wise to permit its continued existence without modification.

In the foregoing paragraphs I have briefly touched upon what seem to me to be the outstanding abridgements of the principles of civil and political liberty. And I have perhaps indicated my own view that neither the actual condition of civil liberty nor the general stock of political toleration are as flourishing as they once were. Neither are they as well off as we are apt generally to suppose them to be—or as they should be. The old doctrine of guilt by association has been revived. We have again set ourselves up to punish words because of their supposed ill tendency and in doing so we have readopted the technique of the old English sedition prosecutions of more than a century ago. The power exists to set up a censorship over the press along certain lines and in many localities police officers exercise an actual censorship over public meetings. Furthermore, the courts have seriously restricted courses of conduct by labor unions which up to a few years ago they had supposed were the undoubted right of anyone. In all these respects the rights of the individual to function as a political being have been curtailed, and by that much the general level of our capacity for toleration has been lowered. To vindicate a conception of the protection of the state and of the inviolability of certain rights of private property, we have invaded civil liberty in a manner that few of us suspect. Yet political and civil liberty is the test of a healthy nation, and without it neither the political state nor the stability of ownership are worth a great deal. Perhaps it may be well for all of us to stop and to look around us a bit, and to ask whether this situation does not carry along with it a very real danger to some of our political values which are among our most indispensable national possessions.

My Study Desk

MY desk is like a vast plateau
Where I may go
When work is done
And with my pen or book may run
Across the world to Borneo
And thrust myself headlong abroad
Into the universe of God.

The piles of books like mountains rise
Above the level plain where lies
A drift of sheets whose whiteness glints
Like snow all tracked with fresh thought-prints.
And like mirages sometimes seen
By travelers, on the wall there hang Scenes such as make my soul serene:
An Alpine valley where once sang
A glacial torrent while we stood
And joined its thundering "God is good";
Or groups of children deep in play,
Assuring life's not all today.

A wireless on my desk receives
Quick spirit-flashes from afar:
"New nurse old China's pain relieves";
"Come, put in India's night, a star"!

My desk is like a vast plateau
Where I may go
When work is done
And with my pen or book may run
Across the world to Borneo
And thrust myself headlong abroad
Into the universe of God.

The Kingdom of God

By Frederick F. Shannon

"Thy Kingdom come."—St. Luke xi. 2.

WE are sometimes reminded that the petitions in the Lord's prayer are paralleled in the Talmud. Consequently, the former lacks originality. As a matter of fact, there is a striking resemblance in several of the petitions, if not of the entire seven. Nevertheless, the view that the Great Prayer is therefore on the same level with Talmudic and other writings is not well sustained. I have heard that the test of originality is not in saying a thing first, but in saying it best. A deeper expression of the truth, it seems to me, is not either saying a thing first or best, but in saying it with the accent of finality. The originality of Jesus, then, is not merely a matter of words or even of thoughts. His supremacy in these is unquestionable. Yet there is a backlying matter of profounder import. It is the Master's personality, his character, his being. What he was and is constitutes the uniqueness of our Lord. Therefore, whatever he touches takes unto itself a new distinction. It is because they are stamped with his own personality that these seven petitions have superlative worth. They may have been repeated a million times before; but the moment they were taken up into Christ's thought and voiced by his lips, a new epoch in the evolution and history of prayer was ushered in.

The petition which forms my text expresses one of the great and familiar ideas of Christianity. Men's thoughts have always centered in the kingdom of God. They have looked and prayed and worked for it the ages through; they will continue looking and praying and working for it until it comes in all its Christian reality. My purpose at present is to lay what I think is a needed emphasis upon the kingdom in its wholeness. When one considers the eternity and grandeur of the thought, what foolish words have I spoken! For "there is recognized," says a qualified student, "in Scripture—Old Testament and New Testament alike—a natural and universal kingdom or dominion of God, embracing all objects, persons, and events, all doings of individuals and nations, all operations and changes of nature and history, absolutely without exception, which is the basis on which a higher kind of kingdom—a moral and spiritual kingdom—is to be built." Is it because of its vastness that we are tempted to think so fragmentarily of the higher kingdom? It may be so. On the other hand, our fragmentariness in this matter may be due to the fact that we are developing fragmentary habits of thought and life.

ORIGIN OF GOD

Consider, first, the origin of the kingdom of God. It did not originate with history or even time itself. Undoubtedly the kingdom, or realm of God, has a history in time. Yet we sometimes forget, in our narrow and parochial outlooks, that the kingdom of God is older than history, older than the ages. We must date its beginning with God—and God never had a beginning! I am putting the matter in this way because most of us need the scourge of eternal whips. We hearken so much to the humming of the tiny temporal bees forever drumming their ditties at our ears that we need to hear the booming surge of billows rolling in from the deeps of infinite seas. Now one of these billows, surely, is in the origin of the kingdom of God. Before there was a universe, or a world, or a man, the everlasting kingdom was born in the mind and heart of Godhead. Yet do not most of us treat this imperial truth as if it were a kind of after-thought thrust into time and history?

Take the earth and the universe as an illustration of this larger concept of the kingdom. Our planet is quite old, authorities say many millions of years. Also, from certain viewpoints, the earth is very large. But in comparison with the universe the earth is neither old nor large. Speaking after the manner of men, there are worlds so much older and larger than ours that they are as a grayhead to an infant, as a mountain to a midget. In other words, the universe did not begin to be with the birth of our world out of the firemist. Nor did the kingdom of God begin with time, or history, or the Bible. It is as much older and greater than these as the universe is older and greater than the comparatively youthful planet on which we live. For the kingdom of God is primarily of the heavens and the eternities. No seer first foresaw it; no prophet first foretold it; no poet first visualized it. It began first in the heart of God; it is the irruption of Godhead into humanity and history.

PRACTICAL AND SPIRITUAL

Now, why dwell upon this highly speculative truth in our emphatically practical day? For two reasons. First, the only way to be truly practical is to be truly spiritual. We know that men are spirits; but men see so much of each other in their bodily forms that they are tempted to think overmuch of the physical rather than the spiritual nature of human beings. Yet, in the last analysis, we manifest our wisest and deepest concerns for the physical environment of humankind in so far as we truly appreciate their spiritual backgrounds. Why are we so tremendously interested in the physical well-being of our brothers today? Just because we are growing a profounder conception of brotherhood. But brotherhood is essentially spiritual; and the spiritual is not measured in terms of centuries or nations or communities; it is not old or young or little or large; it is godlike—"the breath of God in timeless things." Human brotherhood, a spiritual reality, is bottomed upon the fatherhood of God, and the realm of God is rooted in his fatherhood. Does not this send us straight to the origin of the kingdom? And are not the coastal regions of our human frontiers so much in review that a glimpse of our spiritual hinterlands proves bracing and wholesome?

A second reason for dwelling upon the origin of the kingdom is this: The big, creative souls are jealous lest their circumference should split off from and lose contact with their center. I find this definite centrality in prophets and seers, ancient and modern. "Thine, O Lord," says David, "is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty: for all that is in the heavens and in the earth is thine; thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as head above all." Not less loftily does Isaiah speak: "Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath; for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment; and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner; but my salvation shall be forever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished." Here are minds that have crossed the near frontiers of being to dwell in the far yet real hinterlands. And why? Because, to keep the circumference of their being true, they were compelled to keep their centrality deep.

Turning from the ancients to the moderns, we hear Immanuel Kant saying: "Man is a member of a kingdom of ends." Yet a kingdom of ends is included in the kingdom of God, which Hort defines as "the world of invisible laws by which God is ruling and blessing his creatures." These invisible laws are a world within a world, "a cosmos within a cosmos; they come direct from heaven or from God." Witness, also, the words of Josiah Royce: "Dogmatically, then, I state what, indeed, if there were time, I ought to expound and defend on purely rational grounds. God and his world are one. And this unity is not a dead, natural fact. It is the unity of a conscious life, in which, in the course of infinite time, a divine plan, an endlessly complex and yet definitely spiritual idea, gets expressed in the lives of countless finite beings and yet with the unity of a single universal life." I have quoted, as you see, from these prophets and seers almost at random; but remember that there is nothing random or aimless in the course of their thought. It flows, as Lotze might say, with "the unity of an onward marching melody," because it trickles down from fountains high up among the Everlasting Hills.

CONTINUITY OF THE KINGDOM

Originating in heaven or with God, the kingdom has a history. Just here the sublime Genesis hymn of creation is of first importance. Very noble indeed is this high and august major music which has been too often rendered to the mechanical accompaniment of literalistic minors. Genesis was not written to give us a science, but to give us a God. And in that far-off beginning we see the faint outlines of the kingdom in its unfolding historic continuity. It begins with the creation of the earth, comprising its various orders and epochs until the birth of man. Think of the countless cycles God had to toil in making the earth before it could be inhabited by man! Then, after man's coming, something went wrong. Account for it as we may, explain it scientifically, psychologically, philosophically, or theologically, the fact is something went wrong! All through the centuries men have described that wrongness by one tremendously big little ugly word—sin. Try as we may, the word, or more important still, the fact behind the word, will not rub out. It has stained the soul of humanity even as the bloody drops stained the hands of Lady Macbeth. Even Dr. James Martineau, liberal though he was, is profoundly orthodox on this point. "For myself," he says, "I can never sit at the feet of Jesus, and yield up a reverential heart to his great lessons, without casting myself on the persuasion that God and evil are everlasting foes; that never and for no end did he create it; that his will is utterly against it, nor ever touches it but with annihilating force. Any other view appears to be injurious to the characteristic sentiments, and at variance with the distinguishing genius of Christian morality."

MAN'S MISCHOICE

Yet, notwithstanding man's tragic mischoice, the kingdom of God comes on apace. "The Giant With the Wounded Heel" goes limping down the years. But as he limps along he listens and hears the promise of ultimate victory: "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: he shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." Thus, through the passing ages, we see the developing purpose of God handed steadily forward. On it goes through patriarchal, Mosaic, priestly, kingly, and prophetic stages. Like a subterranean river, it flows through Seth to Shem, through Shem to Terah's family, narrowing at last to a single member of that family in the person of Abraham; then through Abraham to the Mosaic theocracy; then on to the judges and the monarch. With the failure of the monarchy and the education gained through the exile, the truth begins to dawn upon certain souls that God has his own king. "By divine revelation," says Riehm, "ideas were planted in the minds of the people of Israel, so lofty, and rich, and deep, that in the existing religious condition they could never see their perfect realization; ideas which, with every step in the development of the religious life and knowledge, only more fully disclosed their own depth and fullness, and to look to the future for their fulfillment." Gradually the world-deep lesson is learned that the God of Israel is also the God of all peoples. Indeed, there are few more instructive chapters in history than God's use of the particular and the universal. He is, in a special sense, the God of Israel; but he is the God of Israel only that he may better teach that, in a universal sense, he is the God of the whole earth. And while this special education of Israel is going on, God is being sought and found of men everywhere; for "God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is acceptable to him."

With the advent of Jesus the Christ, there begins, of course, a new epoch in the realization of the kingdom of God. "The one fact which stands out clear," says one of our accredited modern authorities, "is that in the time of our Lord neither pharisee, nor sadducee, nor essene, had any hold of a conception of the kingdom which answered to the deep, spiritual, vital import of the idea in the Old Testament." So Jesus not only recovered the high aim of God from misunderstanding and falsehood; there is in him a distinct advance, historically speaking, over any conception which had preceded him. Since the incarnation have not men, however imperfectly, been trying to grasp our Lord's sublime vision of the kingdom? But in our time Christians, I verily believe, are in the throes of this eternal dynamic as never before in history. Therefore, ask this question: Do we not require a proper emphasis and focus of the kingdom in its wholeness? Thinking of the eccentricity of gifted human beings, a wise man said, with a note of despair, of what use is genius if its focus be a little too short or a little too long? Synthetic thinking upon this great subject will assuredly help to relieve us of the antinomies, antitheses, and even antipathies so often connected with it. Suppose we attempt, however inadequately, to grasp the two aspects of the one truth with our spiritual and mental fingers.

1. The kingdom of God is individual and social. It is not individual alone nor is it social alone; it is both at once and the same time. It seems very difficult for many to give a just balance to the two facts. We either divorce them altogether, becoming frankly individualistic or emphatically socialistic; or else we join them with such thin, insufficient thought-mortar that they refuse to make a solid wall in the building of God. Today we are convinced, for example, that the over-emphasis of individualism in the past was a serious mistake. Its error is manifest in religion, in philosophy, in education, in commerce, and in politics. Now, by way of contrast, the present is socialistic; that is the social forces of mankind are operating on a scale unequaled in the past. What, then, is the danger of the present as set over against the past? Just this: That we have swung to the other extreme and insist upon the social without a due appreciation of the individual. "I am sure," to quote Royce again, "that whatever is vital in Christianity concerns in fact the relation of the real individual human person to the real God." In the nature of the case, vast mass movements tend to obscure this truth.

INDIVIDUAL AND SOCIAL

Nevertheless, the kingdom of God is individual and social. In the order of its development, it comes into the individual before it comes into the community. "We cannot attempt to achieve the kingdom of heaven politically," says A. Clutton Brock, "until it is, to each one of us, a fact of our own experience, the pattern which we see and according to which we would exercise the common will." Paradoxical as it may seem, Christianity is a wholesale business proceeding upon the retail fashion. Though a part of the society of all souls, every soul must prove God for itself. All men are rooted in God, as Plato thought, yet each man turns on the faucet which supplies the particular sap flowing into and making his own individual roots vigorous, healthful, and a strong support to the social tree. Yet why should there be a false emphasis at all? The universe, the world, and civilization are every moment illustrating the individual and social phases of being itself. Why then, these unnecessary contrariants of thought and action in dealing with the kingdom of God? Consider two simple and human illustrations.

In northern New York I saw a French Canadian boy, who is a victim of infantile paralysis. Born and brought up in a cabin, he drags his crippled body about, while his companions run the hilarious ways of a happy childhood.

But a Christian man took the boy in hand and began pouring upon him showers of loving care. He was placed in school and taught to operate a typewriter. Not yet can his twisted fingers grasp pen or pencil; nevertheless I have a poem composed and typewritten by that sorely handicapped lad; for already his soul is bursting into spiritual bloom. Once another lad ran away from his palace into the city slums. He was a prince, dressed in a velvet suit. Approaching a ragged boy near his own age, he began talking with him. "Why do you wear such dirty clothes?" he asked. "Doesn't your nurse buy you new stockings when you get a hole at the knee? If you're hungry, why don't you eat your dinner instead of munching that crust?" "We are poor," the ragged child answered simply. It was the first time the child of the palace knew that there were children of poverty. When he was found and taken back home, the prince said to his father: "When I grow up, I am going to help the poor children of Belgium to become more prosperous." And he kept his word. For that runaway prince became Albert, king of the Belgians.

PRESENT AND FUTURE

"But," you ask, "what have these two boys to do with the kingdom of God?" Much—very much indeed! In the case of the French Canadian boy, the kingdom of God is individual; it is in the heart of the Christian man rescuing the child as well as in the child himself. In the case of Albert, the kingdom of God is social; it is symbolized in the head of a modern state, as well as in the soul of that heroic people, struggling for the liberties of the world. Wherever righteousness is enthroned—industrially, politically, morally—the kingdom of God is individual and social. To think of either without the other is to think misleadingly.

2. The kingdom of God is present and future. Here, again, there is demand for spiritual perspective. "The kingdom of God is within you, or in your midst," said Jesus. Present and humanized within the soul, wherever the king is, there the kingdom is also. But in the Master's thought the kingdom has a future as well as a present tense. "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the angels with him, then shall he sit on the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all the nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as the shepherd separateth the sheep from the goats; and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left."

Why not, therefore, in the interests of truth—which is more important than even the most diversified emphasis of truth—give these ideas their legitimate setting and articulation in our thinking and doing? For wherever the human heart is in tune with the desire of God, the kingdom is present. "I was made a red-hot salvationist by an infidel lecturer," confessed William Booth. "That lecturer said, 'If I believed what some of you Christians believe, I would never rest day nor night telling men about it.'" Where are the red-hot souls today? Well, wherever they are the fires of the kingdom are burning. Would that there were more of them, radiating their purifying heats into the church, business, and society. Are not kindled souls among God's best methods of starting the fires of righteousness that burn up the chaff in politics and nations? "John Wesley's place in history," says Woodrow Wilson, "is the place of the evangelist who is also a master of affairs. The evangelization of the world will always be the road to fame and power, but only to those who take it seeking, not these things, but the kingdom of God; and if the evangelist be what John Wesley was, a man poised in spirit, deeply conversant with the natures of his fellow-men, studious of the truth, sober to think, prompt and yet not rash to act, apt to speak without excitement and yet with a keen power of conviction, he can do for another age what John Wesley did for the eighteenth century. His age was singular in its need, as he was singular in his gifts and power. The eighteenth century cried out for deliverance and light, and God had prepared this man to show again the might, and the blessing of his salvation."

Present in the Christianized personality, the kingdom is also future. It has come, it is coming, it will keep on coming until "the kingdoms of the world are become the kingdom of our Lord, and his Christ." Little by little, nations are being compelled to acknowledge the wisdom and necessity of Christ's way. We are learning that there is a law above all man-made laws. Speaking of slavery, Seward said: "Congress has no power to inhibit any duty commanded by God on Mount Sinai or by his Son on the Mount of Olives." Another statesman, with a world-vision and a passion for justice among all peoples, appeals to the future of the ever-coming kingdom as he huris himself into the present battle for individual and social righteousness. "Trust your guides," he says, "imperfect as they are, and some day, when we are all dead, men will come and point at the distant upland with a great shout of joy and triumph and thank God that there were men who undertook to lead in the struggle. What difference does it make if we ourselves do not reach the uplands? We have given our lives to the enterprise. The world is made happier and humankind better because we have lived."

VISIBLE AND INVISIBLE

3. The kingdom of God is visible and invisible. In a special sense is it visible in the organized and universal church. With all of its shortcomings, the Christian church has stood for the nearest approach to the Master's ideal of any institution in history. Indeed, was it not founded for this very purpose? And all through the ages the blood of the martyrs has not only been the seed of the church, but that crimson rain has watered the quickened roots of civilization itself. Visible in the church, yet the kingdom is as invisible as thought. "The kingdom of God is not eating and drinking," says Paul, "but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit." Were nobler words ever inspired by a more seemingly commonplace, if not ignoble, situation? The little Christian community in Rome was perturbed over a question of diet. Was it right to eat meat or forego it? To observe certain days rather than others? Then, as now, there was a kind of conspiracy to overload the soul with "emphatic trifles." Paul hangs the subject out on the golden line of Christian privilege and lets the airs of heaven blow through it. Yes, he says, it is one's privilege to eat meat if he wants to. But, he argues, the kingdom of God introduces the soul to higher rights than mere personal privileges. A man has the right not to do anything that will injure a human being. Men are not greatly Christian by everlasting clamoring for their rights. Men have the right not to take their rights. Possessed by the spirit of Christ, these have made the great venture from outward advantage to inward renunciation, wherein life, properly speaking, according to the seer, can only be said to begin. Thus, while the realm of God is rendered visible by every church building, every school house, and every institution fostering the liberties of mankind, it is at the same time gloriously invisible—as intangible as thought, as universal as air, as still and deep as the everliving purpose of God.

Here, then, are a few implications of that lofty petition, "Thy kingdom come." Originating with the Father of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, the kingdom has invaded the highways and byways of history. It has come—it is coming—it will come! Let this be our watchword as we face the tasks of the new time. Let us cultivate a large perspective rather than a limited outlook. Let us keep the Christian focus, laboring to set every stone of truth in the rising temple of universal righteousness. As it took a golden reed to measure the holy city, so it takes a golden mind to evaluate the kingdom of God. More beautiful than all precious stones, its walls are higher than all heavens and deeper than all seas; its gates are not twelve pearls, but ten thousand times ten thousand vitalities, pulsing eastward and northward and southward and westward; it has the symmetry of a living cube, for "the length and the breadth and the height thereof are equal."

The Lion in His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

THREE little books were lying on the bed beside the Lion. One was The Reasonableness of the Christian Faith, by Professor D. S. Cairns of Aberdeen. The second was The Divine Initiative, by Professor H. R. Mackintosh of Edinburgh. The third was The Universality of Christ, by Bishop William Temple of Manchester. There was a curiously contented look upon the Lion's face. "I've been having a perfectly good time," he said. "These are not very large books. But they are wonderfully fruitful. They are wonderfully alike. And they are very unlike. They are full of the endeavor to re-approach Christianity in the light of all the vicissitudes of mind and body and heart through which we have passed. They are alive to the finger tips with the knowledge of contemporary thought and even of contemporary moods. And each has something else. Each gives you a sense of the actual presence of the light never seen on sea or land."

I looked at my friend as he lay quietly thinking. The marks of years of pain were upon his face. But there was something more. I was willing to have him talk to me about the light never seen on sea or land.

At the moment he was holding Professor Cairns' book in his hand.

"It has the most wonderful flashes of insight," he said. "Listen to this: 'I believe that Christ's unbounded love for men sprang out of this that they were the likeliest beings to his Father that he found in all the world.' Can't you see the lonely eager spirit of Jesus swept by the consciousness of the perfect loving personality of God, caring for human persons because they had a spark which somehow suggested the divine?"

While he talked my friend was turning the pages of the book. Now his face brightened, as he read aloud:

"'It has truly been said by a great scholar of the science of religion that the best definition of a saint is that he is one who makes it easier for other men and women to believe in God.' Professor Cairns quoted that because it expresses his own spirit," the Lion went on. "The book is rich in that sense of the human values of the divine which transforms the very genius of religion. It is full of great argument conducted at a lofty level. It is written in a style which once and again bursts into flame. And it makes religion speak in the very terms of the life of today."

By this time I had picked up The Divine Initiative and was peering along the paths of its pages. The Lion had marked the book in his individual way. Soon following his markings I was reading these words:

"'The inspiration of the Bible means in practice that we can feed our religious life year in and year out on its contents and yet find no end to the treasure; and in practice the divinity of Christ means at least this—that throughout a lifetime we find him to be for us the illimitable source of the life of God.'"

And a little later these sentences had caught my eye.

"'No man can indulge in apathy toward the working of God in ages behind us without succumbing also to apathy regarding the world around us. If our religion neglects history it will neglect society as well.'"

The Lion listened while I read aloud.

"Those are good bits," he said. "But it is the whole that counts the most. As you read the book you feel more and more deeply that there are two ways of regarding religion. You can regard it as man's quest for God. Or you can regard it as God's quest for man. In the most triumphant and glowing fashion he makes you feel that religion is God's eager and chivalrous pursuit of man. That is what he means by the divine initiative."

Then my friend turned to Bishop Temple's book.

"Here is a harder bit of reading," he said. "The dialectic is a little more in evidence. The resources of erudition are a little more visible. The style has less play of sunlight. But it is a most arousing book. There are penetrating observations which set one going on fruitful paths. Take this: 'There is one God; and if Jesus is the express image of the person of the Father, so he is the perfect portrait of the Holy Ghost and when we want to know who is this Holy Spirit that prompts us in our own souls, we shall read the Gospels just as we do when we seek to find out who is the world's creator.' On another level of philosophical thinking take this: 'It is worth while to point out that we cannot choose at all unless we can with practical certainty count on the consequences of our action. It is the normal fixity of natural law which makes possible any valuable freedom of choice!'"

"They tell the gospel of a Christ-like God," he declared. "They insist in interpreting the lower from the standpoint of the higher and not the higher from the standpoint of the lower. And they glow with the certainty that when you know God as you see him in the face of Christ you have the secret of the universe. It is the secret of a new personality. And it is the secret of a new society. But then you will have to read the books for yourself."

And so I carried the three volumes off under my arm.

VERSE

Faith

MEN buy and sell by faith; the forges burn,
The drays are laden, countless mill-wheels turn,
Great ships are chartered, trains run to and fro;
Though Faith directs them all, they scarcely know
This spirit of the life of every day.
Will she desert them when they seek to pray?

A day—a single day—if faith were dead,
No field were sown, no oven fired for bread.
Faith is the hand-maid in a toiler's guise
Of all the world of workers. To tired eyes
With solace she appears at close of day
To lift their burdens when they seek to pray.

LAURA BELL EVERETT.

Dear Hands of Jesus

DEAR hands of Jesus,
We seek shelter in them as frightened birds fluttering from the storms;
Hands of the Carpenter's Son,
With what did they play in that unknown childhood?
Hands of the Christ-conscious fresh from the desert and from the haunts of wild beasts, taking the Book from the hands of the Temple attendant;
Hands of the busy Friend of Sinners, driving the moneychangers and the cattle from the house of prayer, caressing the heads of little children, stilling the tempest, mixing earth and spittle for the blind man's eyes, touching the soldier's ear to health again, washing the feet of the disciples;
Healing hands of the Great Physician, touching the fevered sick to cool comfort again, what did we give them for gratitude but a reed of mockery!
Forgiving hands of Jesus nailed to the Cross by the misunderstanding mob they had befriended; Faithful hands wounded for doubting hands to find faith through—
But what is the story of your hands and mine?

CYPRUS R. MITCHELL.

"A Job for the Clergy"

A DETROIT paper recently carried an editorial under the above caption in which it noted the fact that Dr. S. S. Marquis, until recently the social welfare man for Henry Ford, had returned to the pulpit with a declaration against the ministry mixing in industrial and social work. It quotes Dr. Marquis as saying:

"Behind the industrial crisis, or the social crisis, is the spiritual crisis. You can't create the spiritual life in the man who is totally devoid of it. If he has a little of it, you can develop it, and bring it to some kind of fruition. I have seen employes demanding double time for half the work they could do and ought to do, and I have seen employers closing their factories in order to starve their workmen into a submissive frame of mind. The function of the Christian church is to instil into the hearts and souls of men the spirit of Christlike justice and righteousness. No other institution on top of earth can do that. If that is done nobody need fear an industrial crisis or any other kind of crisis. That is the real job of the Christian clergy."

The editorial then follows with this comment: "This is joyful news. It is always more ennobling to hear from the pulpit the simplest discourse on the spirit of Christ than the most eloquent of stump speeches on the mistakes of employment managers. When a church gets religion it has something more interesting to offer the industrial heathen than economics, which the industrial heathen frequently understands much better than the church. Certainly, church programs for the reorganization of industry have not brought the church very far, and they have been almost a total loss in mollifying differences between employer and employe."

"It is not so long ago, for instance, that some prominent churchmen were recommending the sermon on the mount for immediate application to industrial and social reconstruction, as if the sermon on the mount could be used as a law for all men, or a majority of men, when so few men knew anything about it or wanted it. It may be different after the church has followed Dr. Marquis' advice for some time to come. The first place to put the sermon on the mount to work is in the hearts of men. It was never meant for a poultice."

* * *

Is Preaching the Sermon on the Mount Enough?

The sermon on the mount has been preached ever since the beginning of the Christian era. You can find sermons on it in the early fathers, some of them as fine as any delivered in these latter days. It was preached eloquently when slavery was the status of labor and when human relationships were all fixed on the autocratic principle. It was preached with power by men who defended slavery in America and made their defense from Scripture texts. In a little rural church convention in Missouri once, a preacher whose church never made missionary offerings derided himself as a missionary preacher and quoted the great texts he used. A quiet young minister arose in the audience with the remark that when he preached missions he also took a missionary collection.

We would not take much of a missionary collection if we did not preach the missionary sermons, but we do not accomplish much with the sermon if we do not make it articulate with a collection, and a missionary organization to administer it. This is quite as true of preaching the sermon on the mount; if it is not made articulate in human relationships the eloquence fails to function in service. I agree with all Dr. Marquis is quoted as saying in regard to the "spiritual crisis," though I would prefer to put it that the social and industrial problems beget a spiritual crisis and that there is no solution unless there is a spiritual solution. But I also contend that men who devoutly believed in the sermon on the mount held slaves with all good conscience, distilled liquor with all good conscience, and gave of the profits to churches, and that such men today are found among advocates of war as the only appeal of justice and national aspiration. It was when the timeless principles of that sermon were made to speaking concretely in regard to slavery, liquor selling and war that Christianity began to have something to say in regard to them.

* * *

What is Christian?

So long as the question of what is Christian was confined to personal matters the slave-holder, the brewer and the military leader could all rest undisturbed in their good consciences. The writer's ancestors down in Kentucky did all these things and they were just as good Christian men as any of us, but we now think the things they did were not Christian. They lived up to the gospel of personal relationships, and were kind to their slaves, never got intoxicated, were courageous in times of war and did their full duty as churchmen. It was only when the pulpit began to apply the principles of the sermon on the mount to the social issues of slavery, temperance and war that there was any change in the social situation.

A few days ago a liberal minded Christian manufacturer wrote me that one thing must be accepted as final in current discussion of industrial relations, and that was that the wage-system is the final basis in the evolution of industrial relationships. He then deplored the interjection of all preachments that dealt with the problems of employer and employe and said the men who make them are the chief hindrances to a settlement of the problems. Another churchman said, "Labor organization should be prohibited." When asked what he would have labor do, he replied that they should trust it all to their employers who "know best and will always do the right thing." A labor leader declared to me a few days ago that the very use of the term "golden rule in industry" by any employer was hypocrisy, simply because no capitalist could use it and remain a capitalist.

These are extreme statements, perhaps, from both sides, but they argue that even to churchmen the term must seek definition and the gospel concrete application in social as well as personal terms. If the gospel is to help solve social and industrial problems it must crystallize in the programs of Christian people into some more or less definite determination regarding what a Christian social and industrial system really is.

* * *

What Can The Ministry Do?

We may agree with what Dr. Marquis is quoted as saying in regard to the function of the Christian church in the matter and yet fail utterly to agree as to how that function is to be discharged. Until it does "instill into the hearts and souls of men the spirit of Christlike justice and righteousness" little else can be done. But we cannot agree that "if that [only] is done nobody need fear an industrial or any other kind of crisis."

Individual men can live up to that conception personally under any kind of a social situation and yet leave the social system so utterly inequitable that all who live under it outside the control of those persons suffer the most hideous wrongs. Early Christians did not expose their children, but millions did so until the cruel system was abolished. Our slave holding ancestors were the most benign of men—their very paternalistic relation to their slaves often made them such—but the traffic in human flesh was a hideous thing. The wage system may or may not be final as a means of organizing industry, but there are grave inequities practiced under it and they have all come into being through an industrial revolution that has taken place under a Christian civilization. There was never a time in the history of the world in which there was so powerful a church nor such a competent ministry as during the two hundred years in which our present industrial revolution has taken place, nor has the church been so Christian in the past seventeen centuries as it is now. Yet we have a larger measure of industrial strife than at anytime in that two hundred year period. We have it simply because the industrial system has grown up on non-Christian principles, while Christian men have confined their spiritual living to personal things.

There may be some other great step forward for the industrial system; there is no more reason for believing the wage-system, as organized today, is final than to have believed that serfdom or monarchy was final. What the next step may be can only be told by time; we distrust all doctrinaire proposals. But it will be taken only when we definitely pronounce certain flaws in the present system as inequitable and not Christian, and then seek by trial and error to discover a more Christian way of conducting industry. Certainly nothing could be farther from the truth than some of the editorial comment quoted above. No wrong ever asked anything more than that the church should "preach the gospel" and keep hands off. We read many such homilies every time the church promoted a great social forward step. "Church programs for the reorganization of industry" have done great good and will do much greater. It has only to stick to the task in firmness and good temper to bring into industrial relationships a better day than that in which we are living.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

British Table Talk

London, January 31, 1922.

FTER reviewing the world situation, and finding much in it to occasion anxiety for the future of the race, Mr.

Frederic Harrison reaches the conclusion that the only cure for social and international disorders is "moral and spiritual regeneration." He asks: "Can anyone say that the old Adam of national vainglory, of race rivalry, of thirst for new dominions, is purged out of Britain or out of the United States or France or Germany or Italy, Greece or Russia? Do Americans thirst for nothing more, fear nothing more, in the far east? Has Japan gone home contented, with a new heart, honestly willing to give up the future she has fought for, worked for, schemed for, all these thirty years? Are Britons willing to surrender control of the Bosphorus, of Egypt, of Palestine, of Mesopotamia, to say nothing of founding real Home Rule for Hindus and Mussulmans? Is France willing to give up her dreams of vast indemnities from a crushed Germany, her pride in a predominant army and a great African empire? Is Germany yet cured of its dream of military restitution and a worldwide industrial supremacy? Are Italy, Turkey, Greece, the Balkan States, the Baltic States, Poland and Russia willing to submit their racial and historic pretensions to an impartial tribunal? Will any nationalist bow down his claims to any kind of moral law?"

All these questions Mr. Harrison answers in the negative. We want, he urges, not a league of nations but a league of humanity, and "nothing can help us, nothing can save us, but a higher moral sense, a national creed of loyalty, discipline, unselfish devotion to duty—in a word, a more efficient religion." But he does not say where this religion is to be found.

For many years Mr. Harrison, who, at the age of 90, continues to take keen interest in life and affairs, has been the foremost apostle of Positivism, but he makes no mention of it in his eloquent plea. It has been pointed out to him that the weakness of the "religion of humanity" as of all other non-supernatural religions, is that "it confines love and duty to the petty sphere of the inhabitants of this insignificant planet, thus isolating man from the rest of reality, and leaving him face to face with a vast, cold, pitiless, non-moral universe which can neither help nor inspire," and that the only really "efficient religion" is that which teaches that love is "creation's final law"—Christianity. "The 'Gentleman with a Duster' in his new book, 'Painted Windows': a Study in Religious Personality," asks, "What is the good news of Christianity if it is not that the spiritual alone is real?" Bishop Temple says that during the last few years there has been in all parts of the Christian church a growing tendency towards evangelism, while Miss Royden, after traveling about the country, brings word that England is trembling on the verge of a great spiritual revival. Truly we are animated by a great hope, a hope that springs from a deepening and spreading sense, outside as well as inside organized religion, of the unique potency—the "efficiency"—of the gospel of Jesus.

Socialist Sunday Schools

The need for clear thinking and definite action in the matter of the application of Christian principles to social affairs is accentuated by the systematic propaganda among the young carried on by means of socialist, communist and proletarian Sunday-schools. There is a considerable and growing number of these institutions in England and Scotland and their teaching at its best is that regeneration must come from without, from improved material conditions and a higher social life instead of from within, as Christianity insists. The following precepts are issued by the National Council of British Socialist Sunday Schools Union:

1. Love your schoolfellows, who will be your fellow-workmen in life.
2. Love learning, which is the food of the mind; be as grateful to your teacher as to your parents.
3. Make every day holy by good and useful deeds and kindly actions.
4. Honor good men, be courteous to all men, bow down to none.
5. Do not hate or speak evil of anyone. Do not be revengeful, but stand up for your rights and resist oppression.
6. Do not be cowardly. Be a friend to the weak and love justice.
6. Remember that all the good things of the earth are produced by labor. Whoever enjoys them without working for them is stealing the bread of the workers.
8. Observe and think in order to discover the truth. Do not believe what is contrary to reason, and never deceive yourself or others.
9. Do not think that those who love their own country must hate and despise other nations, or wish for war, which is a remnant of barbarism.
10. Look forward to the day when all men and women will be free citizens of one fatherland and live together as brothers and sisters in peace and righteousness.

As will be seen there is nothing in these precepts (which are accompanied by a catechism that definitely inculcates economic socialism) that is not contained in the teaching of Jesus, but they lack the dynamic, provided by Christianity, for their realization. The well-known socialist vicar of St. John's, Hurst, Rev. R. W. Cummings, has painted on the walls of his day-school, "Socialism the Hope of the World." Objectors have appealed to the educational authorities as to the legality of this inscription but they are slow to give a ruling. The teaching of the proletarian Sunday-schools, which represent a secession from the British Socialist Sunday Schools Union, is extreme and revolutionary. Their object is "to teach the children of the working class the absolute necessity for the abolition of the present political state and the inauguration of an industrial republic, the teaching being based on the ten proletarian maxims."

Dr. Orchard's Triple Ordination

It has only now become publicly known and the disclosure has astonished many people, that as far back as 1916 Dr. Orchard of the King's Weigh House (Congregational) church, was ordained by the Rev. Vernon Herford, who claims to be "a bishop of the Syro-Chaldean church." Mr. Herford has had a curious ecclesiastical career. A graduate of Oxford, he became a Unitarian, then joined the church of England, then reverted to Unitarianism, and when in India in 1902 became, all in ten days, deacon, priest, and bishop of the church of his choice and afterwards was appointed bishop of Mercia and Middlesex, England, "with full jurisdiction in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in all matters ecclesiastical and spiritual over all Christians who shall acknowledge that the creed set forth by the Council of Nicaea in the year 325 A. D. is a sufficient doctrinal basis of church communion."

The Lambeth Conference refused to regard as valid orders conferred by "Bishop" Herford, but according to the theory of the Roman Catholic church, though regarded by that communion as heretic and schismatic, his orders are technically valid. He represents himself as being a connecting link between the Roman, the Greek and the Nonconformist churches. Dr. Orchard explains that, earnestly desiring the reunion of Christendom, and holding that each Christian soul should endeavor to absorb as far as it can, and by its own method of approach, the faith and practice of the whole church, he believes that the complete ordination which anyone who desires to be reckoned a minister of the church of Christ should seek is one that embraces the three historic types—Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Congregational. "I believe all these to be necessary," he says, "but ordinarily one can only secure one of them. I have submitted to them all, and am willing to submit to as many others as may be necessary to the reunion of the church, as long as they do not conflict with any principle or demand that I cut myself off from any ministry or any church; for I regard all ministries as valid for what they actually profess to do."

Dr. Orchard says he is unaware that he has done anything that really conflicts with Congregational principles, but Dr. Horton says the vast majority of Congregationalism deplore the fact that he has been ordained by a traveling bishop. If Dr. Orchard's first orders were valid, what need of more? He adds: "If I accepted what Dr. Orchard appears to believe, I should have felt it incumbent upon me to sacrifice everything and have joined the Roman church. That, as I conceive it, is the only logical action for anyone in that position." Dr. Horton has been appointed by the Congregational Union to a committee to confer with Dr. Orchard and "try to reason the whole thing out with him." Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, president of the Society of Free Catholics, of which Dr. Orchard is a leading member, says he does not take Bishop Herford seriously, and the movement he represents will not be captured by "any of these somewhat bizarre side-shows of the ecclesiastical world." Two of Dr. Orchard's assistants, Rev. Douglas Muir and Rev. Stanley B. James, have also been "ordained" by Bishop Herford. As Dr. Horton says, Dr. Orchard is a man of gifts and faith, and is reaching people who are not touched by ordinary ministries; he is a very lovable man and like a schoolboy in the exuberance of high spirits and in his sincerity. But it is rather despite than because of his theological and ecclesiastical vagaries that people are drawn to him and benefit by his preaching.

ALBERT DAWSON.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Giving Indulgence a Blast*

AMOS is a man after my own heart. What a moral hero that farmer was! He looked after his flocks and his orchards in the south country, but he was unselfish; money and gain could not absorb his attention and interests. When he saw a caravan approaching he left off trimming the trees and feeding the cattle and went down to the road. He hailed the passing men and asked about affairs in the cities of the north. Always one story: untold prosperity, luxury gone mad, revelings and drunkenness, rank injustice to the poor, formal worship, elegant but lifeless temple service, oppression of the poor, forgetfulness of the Ten Commandments (although these fundamental words may not at that time have been definitely set down in order as we have them, for the book of Amos is perhaps the oldest book of the Bible.)

The "inspired farmer" went back to his toil, but he went through the motions mechanically, his heart was in Samaria, his soul blazed like a forge. Finally the call came, God's voice was heard in the sighing of the sycamores and the shepherd who feared neither lion nor man appeared in the capital of the north. He was the original John the Baptist—the rough man of the desert. Alone with God he had formulated his rigid ethical scheme. We cannot forget that Moses, Elijah, and probably Paul gained in the wild, waste places this hold on God. Even Jesus had his days in the desert. The silly conventions of superficial society never looked so foolish to me as when I returned from a summer among the giant peaks of the Rockies in Colorado. Coming from his wind-swept desert home into the midst of the soft Samaritan life all of his anger broke forth into a mighty blast at the indulgence. He saw ivory couches on which reclined the soft and dainty revelers; idle songs filled the air, feasts were spread, wine was taken not from delicate glasses in little sips but guzzled from bowls! Slowly his indignation grows and then finally he lets loose his terrible anger. The preacher is one Amaziah, a miserable fawning creature, a perfect picture of the priest who lives in lazy ease and takes his orders from those in authority, who trims his moral message to suit the gale. Amaziah, brave and courteous soul that he is, sends a message to the king accusing the prophet of treason and seeking to have him destroyed as a disturber of the peace. But Amos, who had struggled with the lions that sought to destroy his flocks, flinched not before the cowardly methods of the simpering priest; he redoubled his force and put more punch into his blows. "Ye kine of Bashan," was one of his gentlest epithets. He saw beneath the polished surface the evidences of rottenness. "You are like a basket of summer fruit," he would say, "Fair and fragrant today, hideous and decayed tomorrow." But it was against their oppression and injustice that he raved most violently. Money was needed to maintain this life of the idle rich and this money was obtained by oppressing the poor.

Amos was a social gospeller; he preached no message of individual salvation; many of our present day evangelists have not caught up with this eighth century (before Christ) preacher. Many a pastor finds his great social messages in the book written by the farmer of Tekoa. Do we want to preach against lazy case? Where can we find a better text than in Amos? Do we want to arraign present-day drinking among the idle rich? Where can we find a better inspiration than in Amos? Do we wish to blaze out against modern profiteering? Again Amos gives us what we need. Strange how these desert men struck the social note, and yet not strange, for when they came from their simple ways of living into the vast complexes of urban communities they were amazed and fired by the soft indulgences, the open indecencies, the frightful selfishness, the empty formalism of the city populations. When John the Baptist went into Jerusalem the contrasts smote him in the face. When Moses went into Egypt the social wrongs turned his heart into a volcano! When Paul came back from Arabia the man-made gospels and the rigid forms disgusted him; he would preach his own heaven-sent gospel without regard to the endorsement of the Jerusalem elders. Dean Brown of Yale is my idea of a modern Amos, fearless, honest, untamed by the conventions of polite society, interpreting the sermon on the mount with the freshness of Galilee. Would to God we had a thousand like him, flaming torches of true religion in the pulpits of America.

CORRESPONDENCE

The I. W. W.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: A recent number of your paper presents two dissimilar attitudes towards the International Workers of the World. One writer speaks of them with sincere respect after personal contact with them. The other with sanctimonious complacency arrays twenty-one missionaries "opposed by fifty 'red' propagandists in the pay of the I. W. W." the latter organization mentioned as spending for propaganda in one city over fifty thousand dollars.

When a group of men will band together unmindful of social ostracism and spare no cost to advance their cause, nor flinch under prison sentence, does it not signify an underlying principle of real merit? We do not think of men going to this extent except to gain or preserve something dearer than life. Should we not give them free expression that their motives may be understood and accorded due consideration?

Personally, I would appreciate some reliable information regarding these heretics "who preach secularism and revolution." Your editorial on "Political Prisoners" awakens our interest but tells nothing specific. Would it be too much to ask your columns to give an authentic resume of the theories and principles of this organization by someone who can speak from first-hand unbiased knowledge, or say where such facts may be obtained?

Evangelism and the Church's "Self Respect"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: That was an admirable article in your issue of January 12, by Mr. Douglas on "The Galilean Psychology." Admirable also was the sequel January 26th, "The Church's Self-respect," and yet it was, to some extent, disappointing, for he turned his aim to one side and missed the real point. Unite with the church? What reason can anyone have for wishing to do so? Why, this one and only and sufficient reason, that he has become a follower of Jesus Christ. The primary purpose of the church, then, so far as people of the world are concerned, is to win them to Christ. That is evangelism. If that is accomplished, if people become his disciples, uniting with the church will follow as a matter of course. They will want to join the people of God; that is the natural thing to do.

It was my favored lot to grow up in the old Second Baptist Church of Chicago during the pastorates of a princely line of men, beginning with E. J. Goodspeed, of blessed memory. During all those thirty-five years the two outstanding aims in that church were, to develop Christian character in its members and to win others to Christ. I never in all that time heard of such a thing as an effort to get people to join the church. What was going on all the time was an effort to persuade people to give their hearts to Jesus. In consequence there was a continuous growth in membership, sometimes more rapid, sometimes less, but constant, and the church became a power for untold good in every wholesome Christian activity.

It is a mistake, and a very serious one, to set forth church membership as a desirable and helpful thing (although of course it is both these things and more) and make that a basis of appeal. It is to Christ that we must invite men, to the Christian life that we must make the call. We need to call men to repentance, as did Jesus and the apostles, and to invite them to dedicate themselves and their possessions to his service. The church is not a mere social organization, a religious club; it is a company of people loving Jesus, united by confessing their faith in him, and striving to live his life and do his work in the world. Vitally important as it is, its essential structure is the simplest in the world. "On this rock," said Jesus, "will I build my church"—on voluntary confession of him as Lord and voluntary union because of a common devotion to him.

It is just here that baptism has its place and its meaning. To the person who has found life in him baptism is not something devised by the church as a requirement for membership. It is an ordinance of the divine Lord to whom he has already committed himself. In it he gladly professes before men the change that has taken place in his life and the new purpose that life now has. "They then that gladly received his word were baptized." "Buried with him through baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life." Well do I recall the reply of a young man who was relating before the church (not before the deacons only) his Christian experience as a candidate for baptism and consequent membership. When asked, "Why do you want to be baptized?" he replied: "Because I want to have my old life drowned away from me."

In all our consideration of the church, the obligations upon it, the opportunities before it, the multifarious form of activity expected of it, we need constantly to keep in mind that it is a spiritual body, the very essence of whose existence is personal, individual love of Jesus Christ and union because of that common love. Forms and methods without number there may be, but if they are spiritually legitimate, they are all the outgrowth of this simple fact.

Come: Surely Shakespeare Didn't Write all the Psalms!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: One of your correspondents has recently given some of the arguments that could be used by any person wishing to prove that Shakespeare translated the Forty-sixth Psalm. The list may be enlarged. Why did the dramatist choose this psalm for his cryptogram? He was born in 1564. The Sixty-fourth Psalm did not lend itself so easily to his purpose, and the reversal of the last two figures of that date added somewhat to the puzzle. This was the more appropriate, since Shakespeare's age was probably still forty-six when the King James Version was published in 1611, or at least when the manuscript was sent to the press.

One thing more: The name Will Shakespeare has fourteen letters. Notice that the fourteenth word of the psalm is "will." Some one may be enabled to give a reason why the tenth verse (besides the fact of ten letters in "Shakespeare") was thought an appropriate place for the remaining letters of the full name "William."

All this goes to show how easy it is to find plausible arguments for almost any theory.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Catholics Strong for Catholic Dailies

The quarantine against modernism on the part of the Catholic church has been chiefly concerned with education in the past. The leaders are beginning to become aware, however, of the insidious influence of the American daily. Through this means modern science and history filters down to people who otherwise never know the truth. A writer in America tells of the achievements and present plans in this field. He says: "Hence, if consistent, we will establish our own daily press just as we build our own schools. We have done this to some extent in publishing Catholic weeklies, reviews and magazines; but we stopped at the most popular form of the press, the daily newspaper. Here we left the field to indifference, which sometimes is more dangerous—because enervating and insinuating—than open hostility to Christian principles. However, a beginning has been made in tilling this field. With the approval of several Bishops and Archbishops and of the Apostolic Delegate, the Daily American Tribune of Dubuque has been published for more than a year as the first Catholic daily in the English language in our country. In Cincinnati Dr. Thomas P. Hart and his associates are preparing to imitate this venture by developing the Catholic Telegraph into a daily. Archbishop Moeller is pushing the enterprise by giving it powerful moral support. In Detroit Bishop Gallagher has publicly declared for a Catholic daily newspaper. In St. Louis the transfer of the Catholic daily, Amerika, into non-Catholic hands has given rise to a movement in Catholic societies for an English daily under Catholic management."

Bishop Brent Joins Fight on Narcotics

The abuse of narcotics in this country is a serious evil and it is now being combatted by the Narcotic Drug Control League. At a meeting of this organization recently, Bishop Brent said: "When we take up the abuse of narcotics we approach a symptom rather than the disease itself. The disease is the chief disease of human nature—lack of self control, speaking negatively, or self indulgence, speaking positively. Whatever we may do in the way of restriction and legislative enactment to combat this evil, its elimination and cure is to be found only in the creation of character. We can minimize the temptation for the weak. We can protect children and the ignorant, we can treat the addict. This is the limit of our possibilities. But it is worth doing. In short it is our solemn duty to do it."

Universalist Laymen Will Build in Washington

The Order of Universalist Comrades, an organization of religious laymen of recent origin has taken upon itself a dual task, that of providing a building for Perincate Hall in Japan and also the erection of a memorial church for the denomination in Washington. It is proposed that two hundred thousand dollars should be invested in the Washington structure. The general chairman for the raising of the funds will be Mr. Louis Annin Ames of New York City. The drive started on February 19, which was designated Laymen's Sunday. The constituency of the denomination has been divided into eight zones, and over each is a leader. The Universalists are taking on the big money-raising methods of the evangelicals and hope to show their faith by their works.

Missionary Layman Settles in Akron

R. A. Doan, who for many years served as a missionary secretary for the Disciples of Christ at his own charges resigned recently. He has settled in Akron, O., and in this city he will be a worker in behalf of the Disciples churches. He holds the title of Director of Men's Work. In earlier days he was a brick manufacturer, and became known for his large men's Bible class. He is devoted in his loyalty to the cause of foreign missions.

Catholic Political Parties Win

The political organization of the Roman Catholic church in Europe is winning many victories for that communion. The Catholic party of Germany holds the balance of power and is able to secure in large measure what it wants. The new constitution of the republic of Poland establishes the Roman Catholic religion, and makes provision for conference with Rome on religious matters. Recent elections in Belgium have turned the socialists out of leadership and put the Catholics in. The increase of the Catholic vote in Belgium was 125,000. These successes do not fill the empty churches nor convince the millions of unbelievers, but they do help to perpetuate the institution.

Goucher College Controversy

Many colleges supported by endowments have at one time or another been regarded as denominational institutions. Fifty years ago they began breaking away. Harvard University is in no way connected with the Unitarians, and even the Divinity school of Yale University is no longer Congregational. As this movement spreads to denominations that are closer organized, there is naturally difficulty when a college breaks with its moorings. The case that is now in the public prints is that of Goucher college, usually regarded as a Methodist institution for the education of women. The trustees are petitioning the legislature of Maryland for a change of charter which will free the institution from the requirement that eleven of the trustees must be members of the Methodist Episcopal church from neighboring conferences. The matter is now before a committee of the senate of the Maryland legislature, and hearings are being held. Dr. John Goucher and the secretary of the Methodist board of education, A. W. Harris, appeared before the committee recently to protest against the change.

Protestant Churches Protest Riots in Ulster

The highest authorities of the Episcopal, Presbyterian and Wesleyan churches in Ulster on January 15 published a statement calling for an end to "outbursts of crime which are a disgrace to any civilized community." These authorities insist that the Protestants were not the original aggressors, but nevertheless the principles of the Christian gospel must be carried out. There are many who affect to find in political principles the cause of the unrest of Ireland, but this and many other events prove quite the contrary. Ireland finds its trouble in the intolerant religious attitude of its people. Thomas and Alexander Campbell more than a century ago aroused the suspicion of the Ulsterites by preaching peace between Catholics and Protestants. Modern peace-makers have not fared any better.

Rabbis Will Not Shelter Bootlegging

The rabbis of the orthodox Jewish organization in America have recently considered the question of the use of wine in their ritual, and have decided that this wine may be unfermented. This takes away the cloak from many bootleggers who have not hesitated to use their religion for commercial purposes. Two other religious organizations still require alcoholic wine in their ritual, the Roman Catholic and the Episcopal. These might allow the use of sand instead of water in baptism in case of necessity as in ancient times, but have not yet seen fit to acknowledge that grape juice minus the alcohol might serve the needs of devotion at the altar.

Ministers Discuss the Religious Use of Humor

A long face is no longer the infallible trade mark of a minister. There seems to be a new kind abroad with smiling countenance, and a sense of humor. At Houston, Texas, recently Rev. W. D. Ryan read a carefully prepared paper on "Humor in the Life and Message of the Minister." The perils and the possibilities in the use of humor on various occasions were studied. Meanwhile it is said that even this thoughtful paper was not in itself devoid of the kind of humor which it recommended to the ministers assembled.

Church Gives High School Board a Deed

The Disciples church at Clinton, Mo., changed location some time since, erecting a new house of worship. The church was offered a handsome price for the old lot, but the spot was so hallowed by the memories of the past years that many of the members hesitated to turn the property over to commercial use. After much deliberation it was voted to give the property to the high school board of the city without any charge. The deal was consummated recently, and at a formal Sunday evening service of the congregation the presentation was made on the part of the trustees of the church, and acknowledgment made by the trustees of the local high school.

Presbyterians Make Room for the Disciples

First Christian church of Brooklyn has moved in with the Presbyterians in their Duryea church. The Disciples church is accumulating funds for a new building, and while this is going on will carry on their activities in the Presbyterian building. The preaching services are held in common with the two ministers alternating in the pulpit. The church calendar of First Christian church compares the arrangement to that of two lodges meeting in the same lodge hall, but it is really a little more intimate than that. The organization and standards of the two churches have not been modified in any way.

Chinese Will Discuss Local Leadership in Religion

The demand in various mission lands for greater participation in the government of the mission churches by the native peoples is being met graciously in many lands. In China the native Christians will have a prominent part in the Chinese National Christian Conference which will be held at Shanghai May 2-11 of this year. While the English and American missionaries will be present, at least half of the delegates will be native Christians of China. The report on "The Development of Leadership in the Work of the Church" will be a report presented by Dr. David S. T. Yui, general secretary of the Chinese Y. M. C. A. Dr. John R. Mott will be present at the conference.

Churches Confused on Russian Relief

The good cause of Russian relief is being confused these days by a multitude of appeals, and behind some of these is political propaganda. A large church of New York City recently put on a canvass for funds for Russia only to find that the organization asking for the money was a communist organization. It has been to meet the need of a non-political agency for the churches that the Federal Council of Churches has agreed to handle funds for Russia. Part of the money is spent through the Friends organization in Russia and part of it through Mr. Hoover's commission, which is an arm of the American government. During the past few weeks $80,000 has been sent to the Federal Council offices for Russia, but this is a mere pittance, of course, in view of the vast need. Mr. Hoover says: "Russia is in great need. Every church in America is a soliciting agency to save her from starvation. These religious organizations are American. They are efficient. The Quakers, Jews, Catholics, Lutherans, Mennonites, Southern Baptists and all the other Protestant churches comprised in the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America are diligently working in the field, doing heroic work to prevent great suffering. They offer ample opportunity for giving. They all coordinate with our government distribution agencies. They should be supported by every one who has satisfied his obligations to the home charities."

Ministers Going to Europe Can Serve

The minister who goes to Europe this coming summer can serve the good cause of international good-will while he goes about his travels. The Federal Council of Churches is securing the names of all these men and will act as a booking agency by which they may make addresses in significant meetings in Europe. The European churches act in the same way for their ministers, and thus the exchange of messages between Europe and America may further the cause of international understanding.

Unitarian Ministers Will Go to Oxford

Unitarian ministers are invited to go this summer to the summer school of theology at Oxford University which is to be held from August 23 to September 2. The invitation evoked a response at once. The laymen's committee through which the ministers of this communion were brought together two years ago at Harvard, and last year at Chicago will now make a great effort to secure passage for a considerable number of ministers to go to Oxford this summer. The committee on registration and arrangements includes Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association. The various parishes are urged to raise special funds which will defray at least the passage for the parish minister. Only in a few instances will the Unitarian ministers be able to go at their own charges. The Oxford curriculum will concern itself generally with the application of Christian principles to present-day problems and will deal especially with the relations of religion and democracy. The lecturers will address themselves to the consideration of the place and leadership of the churches in an age of transition. It is only in recent years that Oxford has been conducting a summer school, but it is already an outstanding feature of English university life.

Denominations Agree on Doctrine of God

Those who feel that the churches are hopelessly separated in matters of dogma will do well to ponder a recent happening. When the Unitarian Laymen's League wanted a good tract on the doctrine of God they went to the Baptist president of Brown University, Dr. William P. Faunce, to get it. He wrote "My Idea of God and Why I Believe in Such is a book by Russ Webb, a westerner with a new line of thought that analyzes our banking system with a new vision. It strips our banks of their cloak of mysticism and their air of dominance and lays bare their inner workings so that Mr. Average Man can see right through and beyond them. It discards timeworn conventionalism and places the banker in his proper place among us. It reveals the bank's privileges and duties toward the community and the individual, and then it shows why the goods are not—cannot be delivered. It outlines a systematic change in our monetary machine and directs how, step by step, it may be brought about. It points the individual to his own opportunities and responsibilities and then presents him with a manual of procedure. It is economic theory, plus practical business, told in the light of actual observation. Every progressive man or woman will read it. Single copy, postpaid, $1.00. a God." The statement proved so acceptable that the Congregationalists wanted the privilege of using it in their foreign mission stations. Dr. James L. Barton, secretary of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, has sent copies of the tract to the Transvaal, Natal, South Rhodesia, Bulgaria, Turkey, India, Ceylon, China, Japan and other parts of the world. It is understood that the mission presses will publish the tract in translation, and it will probably be one of the history-making documents of this generation.

Working at the Task of Organization

The district superintendents at work in Missouri under the auspices of the Missouri Christian Missionary Society among Disciples churches tend more and more to concern themselves with the building up of regular church methods, rather than spasmodic revivalistic experiments. Seventy-one pastors were located among the Missouri churches last year by these superintendents. Formerly almost all such arrangements were made by pastor and church without aid. The conferences held during the year were 168. These dealt in considerable measure with missionary methods. Among the matters on which the superintendents and the evangelists of the society report is the number of young men recruited for the ministry, and the number of students who are secured for Disciples colleges. The saving of many Missouri churches depends upon the introduction of continuous religious work in place of spasmodic revivalistic efforts on which the churches have lived in the past.

Disciples Convention Will Go Back to Winona Lake

After months spent in hunting for a location, the special committee of the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ has decided that the convention shall go back to Winona Lake. It was estimated that seven thousand people attended the convention there last year and the place seems to be neutral ground for the various theological factions who are at odds these days. Though Winona Lake has all the limitations belonging to a summer resort place, it has a large auditorium and plenty of shade for summer meetings. The date set for the convention is Aug. 28 to Sept. 4.

Baptists Will Hold Convention in Indianapolis

The Northern Baptist churches, after having tentatively adopted a plan of going to the Pacific coast with the next convention, have decided to go to Indianapolis. The date set for their convention is June 14-20. The Fundamentalists have been holding a congress each year in advance of the convention for several years past. They have been politely invited by some of the convention leaders to discontinue this practice, but it is not known yet what plans will be made for the Fundamentalist meeting this year. With both the Disciples and the Baptist conventions in Indiana this summer, the Hoosiers ought to be well educated in theology before the season is over.

Fired for Acknowledging Abraham Lincoln as Christian

Joseph Myers, a young newspaper man of Indianapolis, has been supply preacher in a village church in Indiana for a few weeks, and when Lincoln's birthday came around the preacher brought forth the proofs that in his latter days Lincoln was a Christian. This admission of Lincoln into the church without immersion seemed to the village elders something dangerously like "open membership" so they met and fired the minister. Mr. Myers is connected with the Indianapolis News, having been formerly with the Kansas City Post. He has a theological education but sees in journalism a field for realizing religious ideals.

Political Candidate Gives Lecture on the Bible

The men's Bible class of the Disciples church at Danville, Ind., recently brought ex-senator Beveridge to town to deliver his well-known lecture on the Bible. The Hon. Mr. Beveridge said: "It is, I believe, the consensus of the competent that the ablest practical counsel on human affairs to be found in all literature, is that contained in Solomon's amazing summary of common sense called the Book of Proverbs. Even those who deny the sacred character of the scriptures, frankly concede the super-excellence of the advice which is packed in this compendium of wisdom. When reading the Proverbs we must bear in mind that they deal not only with individual problems, the solution of which there presented grew out of generations of personal experience, but also that the Proverbs have to do with principles of statesmanship as established by the long course of Jewish history. Solomon is almost as accurate a teacher of statescraft as of individual conduct."

Secretary Decries Labor Fights in Various Cities

Dr. Worth M. Tippy went back to Indianapolis recently, the city where he was once the popular pastor of Broadway M. E. church. He spoke with regard to the industrial situation over the country. "Do you think it is a good thing for Indianapolis to have what it has now, one of the bitterest fights over the open shop in this country?" he asked his hearers today. "With the situation as it is here, I don't believe it would be possible for the church at this moment to get into the matter in any helpful way. The feeling is acute. In Dallas, Tex., I talked to about 500 strikers in the packing industry, whose strike is practically lost. It was a very impressive occasion. They were bitter toward employers generally. I think there is still a strong remnant of the feeling, even among church people, that the church has no business in such situations. But I think the solution of these difficulties lies in the carrying of the spirit of Christ to the men of both sides. I think often of what a friend, an attorney, said to me not long ago, with regard to a factional fight in which the industrial situation was at the bottom. He said: 'Believe all that the opposing faction says about the other, but don't at all believe all that each one says of itself.'"

Call the Roll of the Board of Managers

The Christian Standard, a conservative journal of the Disciples of Christ, has sent a registered letter to each member of the board of managers which recently adopted the creedal statement with regard to missionary policy in China. Each board member is asked to declare him- or herself individually. This inquiry is keenly resented by some of the board members. Others speak defiantly and declare themselves out of sympathy with the action taken by the 58 members present and voting when the memorable action was taken. The total board has 120 members scattered all over the nation. Rev. W. F. Rothenberger of Springfield, Ill., declares: "I did not support the resolution as passed by a majority vote of the board of managers because I could not impose upon my missionary brethren in the heart of heathendom a yoke which I, and perhaps thousands of my brother ministers, would refuse to wear at home." Rev. Finis S. Idleman, pastor of Central Disciples church of New York, says: "I voted against the resolution because it makes of the Disciples one more of the too many kinds of Baptists. Baptism is not the plea of the Disciples. If it is, there was no need of the movement, because the Baptists had made that emphasis for three centuries previously."

Fun After the Mid-week Prayermeeting

St. Mark's Methodist church of Detroit is in the midst of a new experiment to restore popularity to the commonly neglected mid-week meeting. Supper is served at the church previous to prayermeeting, and following the prayer service there is a recreational period. Among the recreational events in recent weeks one notes a telephone musical program, Plumstead the impersonator, a stereopticon lecture on Yellowstone park, a gymnastic exhibition and a safety first movie by the Detroit city police department. The pastor, Rev. W. L. Stidger, has attracted so much attention by his dramatic book sermons that a volume of these sermons will be issued in the near future by Doran. Recently a book prayermeeting was held at which a number of books were given to fortunate people in the audience, with the proviso that they must report on these volumes at prayermeeting one month hence.

Minister Attacks the Public School Dances

Churches are puzzled as to their attitude to the public school dance which is becoming a feature all over the nation. In many communities the ministers welcome the innovation as a method of avoiding embarrassing questions around the church. They take the point of view

The Belief in God and Immortality

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology in Bryn Mawr College; author of "A Psychological Study of Religion."

This book consists of three parts. The first is a scholarly investigation of the origins of the idea of immortality. It embodies an important contribution to our knowledge of that subject. Parts II and III are those of chief interest to the general public. Part II consists of statistics of belief in personal immortality and in a God with whom one may hold personal relations. For the first time we are in possession of reliable statistics valid for large groups of influential persons. The figures are in many respects startling, in particular those revealing that, in all the groups investigated, the proportions of believers are much smaller among the more distinguished than among the less distinguished members. The author seems justified in his opinion that the cause of the present religious crisis cannot be remedied by the devices usually put forward, for it has a much deeper cause than those usually discussed. Part III treats of the Present Utility of the Belief in God and in Immortality.

"A book which every clergyman, as well as every one interested in the psychology of religion and in the future of religion, should read and ponder. For Professor Leuba has made a contribution to our knowledge of religious belief that is of very considerable significance."—Prof. James B. Pratt, in the American Journal of Theology.

Public Opinion and the Steel Strike

By the Commission of Inquiry of the Interchurch World Movement

Of no other book published in the troubled days since the war can one more truly say, "Here is something every American citizen should read." No matter what he thinks of industrial relations, no matter what his politics, his social position or his creed, every American, in simple duty to his country and himself, ought to read "Public Opinion and the Steel Strike."

Though limited in scope, the report is of more importance to Americans generally than the first and more comprehensive book was. It strikes deeper. It goes beyond the steel strike, in implications if not in facts. It studies, in the light of the western Pennsylvania phases of a single industrial conflict, sets of circumstances which are neither local nor temporary.

Propaganda is the theme. Presuming that public opinion often is the decisive factor in industrial war, what feeds public opinion? When an army of workmen walked out of steel mills throughout the country, stopping a great basic industry, how accurately was the interested public informed?

Public opinion was misdirected systematically, according to the commission of inquiry. Pulpit and press, unions and companies, public officials and welfare organizations—all failed, for one reason or another, to provide the public with accurate information.

Trained students of social phenomena, indorsed by a commission of which Bishop Francis J. McConnell is chairman, here present detailed evidence in support of their contention that public opinion was scientifically poisoned and American law was brazenly betrayed by press, church and government in order that strikers might be beaten—all with the implication that the same thing may be expected elsewhere in America tomorrow.

Prof. Alva W. Taylor commends this new book as one of the most challenging published in many years.

Price of the book $1.50, plus 10 cents postage.

that the schoolhouse is the place to dance. Rev. L. N. D. Wells, pastor of High Street Christian church of Akron, O., has recently denounced the public school dances of his city as hurtful to the young people. He said: "Dancing in the schools cannot be defended as promoting any of the functions of the schools. It cannot be defended as a high form of physical exercise. Dancing in the open air might be exercise but that is not where dancing is done. It cannot be defended as an exceedingly high form of social intercourse and therefore find a place in the schools. It cannot be defended as a school of manners, which might give it a place. On the other hand the moral tendency of dancing is bad for the boys and girls at the period of adolescence when they have not found themselves and when their feelings are difficult to control. The dance will unduly stir feeling which is already under insufficient control and therefore helps to destroy the balance of character. It dissipates restraints which are our safeguards and it releases lower tendencies which should be held in check by restraints and reserve.

Seminary Inaugurates a Service for the Ministry

The agricultural college issues bulletins for the farmer. Why should not the theological seminary render a similar service for the churches and the ministers? Chicago Theological Seminary has seen the opportunity and has already begun in a modest way to meet that need. A multigraphed letter of a thousand words carries live suggestions about the pulpit interests for February and the organization of the young people of the parish in helpful recreation. Citations are made of successful work in religious education. The religious day school at Elk Mound, Wis., is particularly commended. Four books are named as worthy the perusal of the minister at this particular season. Should the new service meet with appreciation, the seminary bulletin will be extended to take in a greater number of themes.

Organized Christian Endeavor Has Advantages

While the prayermeeting feature of Christian Endeavor meetings is no longer popular among the young people in some cities, nevertheless this organization of young people still has a number of advantages over the loosely organized young people's clubs which are to be found in the churches all over the country. The leaders of this movement present a definite program of religious work which is often missing from the educational and recreational programs of the clubs. In addition Christian Endeavor societies have a way of pooling their experiences which is very helpful. For instance, Egg Harbor Congregational Society in New Jersey recently started a public library of 25 volumes which has grown to 300 volumes. The societies of San Diego, Cal., are organized to sing for the sailors that make port there. The intermediates of Berkeley, Cal., had a Thanksgiving out-door service last fall. Each young person brought an egg to contribute to the scrambled meal that was served immediately after. This plan was carried out without catastrophe.

Methodists Show Leadership in Manila

It is not many years since Dewey steamed into Manila bay, but in that time a strong Protestant movement has been inaugurated. It is significant of the way the tide is running that the pastors of the Methodist churches in Manila had 2,500 weddings last year while the priests of the Roman church had only 500. Probably in no part of the world has there been in this generation such a rapid shift in the direction of the Protestant religion as in the Philippine Islands.

Noted Baptist Minister Speaks in Boston

Rev. Len G. Broughton is one of the veteran ministers of the Baptist denomination. He has been speaking recently in Tremont Temple of Boston to large audiences. Dr. Broughton won his spurs in the ministry in the development of a large institutional church at Atlanta, Ga., and later was called to England. He often speaks at the Northfield conference and on many other American platforms. He is now pastor of First Baptist church of Richmond, Va.

Religious Literature in Your Church

IF YOU will make inquiry of the members of your congregation, you will find that the average member does not read more than two religious books during a year. Many of them do not read a single volume! And yet wonder is sometimes expressed at the low tide of spiritual life in the church today.

Why not put a hundred religious books into the homes of your congregation before Easter? Preach a special sermon, if you like, on "Religious Literature and Christian Living," or some similar topic. And have some of the best recent books on hand for your people to see and order. Send us list of books (see below) which we may send you for first use. Put them where people can see them, and ask some one person to look after orders received. We will give you 30 or 60 days to pay for this initial order.

Here is a list of religious books we recommend.

FOUR NEW BOOKS

The Approach to the New Testament

By PROF. JAMES MOFFATT,
Author of "The New Testament:
A New Translation," Etc.

"There are factors in the intellectual, religious and social world which involve a new estimate of the New Testament. Advances have been made in literary and historical criticism and methods of research. We are learning how to approach this great literature from the proper angle and thus to see it in its true perspective. My instructions were, not to offer any results of research such as might appeal only to experts, but to lay before the educated public an outline of the present position of the New Testament in the light of modern criticism—some brief statement of the general situation created by historical criticism which should also bring out the positive value of the New Testament literature for the world of today as a source of guidance in social reconstruction, so that readers might be enabled to recover or retain a sense of its lasting significance for personal faith and social ideals."—The Author.

Price $3.00, plus 12 cents postage.

The Universality of Christ

By WILLIAM TEMPLE,
Bishop of Manchester.

"Dr. Temple is not only a theologian and a philosopher who already ranks, but also an explosive personality afire with love of the church and the people. He escapes all classification. If he is a theorist, he has also proved that he has an amazing capacity for affairs. His latest book, a small one of great significance, consists of four lectures delivered to the recent Christian Student Conference. The notes of the book are simplicity and a certain originality in presentment. It is written with lucidity and force. It may be commended as an excellent and very sincere piece of apologetic, which minds, young minds especially, perplexed and harassed in regard to fundamentals, may peruse with great benefit."—The Guardian.

"These lectures were framed with a view to suggesting answers to problems specially prominent in the minds of Christian students at this time."—The Author.

Price $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

The Divine Initiative

By PROFESSOR H. R. MACKINTOSH,
Author of "Immortality and the Future."

The lectures in this book when delivered in London made so deep an impression that the Student Christian Movement published them in book form that they might have a wider hearing. Dr. Mackintosh has here set forth the reasons for Christian faith in a fresh and trenchant way. His book is a notable addition to present-day apologetics. It will rekindle hope in many an address and sermon which its reading will inspire.

Price $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

The Nature and Purpose of a Christian Society

By T. R. GLOVER, { Author of "The Jesus of History," "Jesus in the Experience of Men," "The Pilgrim," Etc.

Through some strange oversight this remarkable contribution to the discussion of the character and nature of the Christian church has not heretofore been published in America. It is in its third edition in England and should find a large audience in the United States, where the author's "The Jesus of History" and "Jesus in the Experience of Men" have been so widely read.

Price $1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

Two Constructive Books on Religion

JUST FROM THE PRESS

The Creative Christ:

By Edward S. Drown,
Professor in the Episcopal Theological
School, Cambridge, Mass.

That Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and today and forever means that he is the Man of the ages. And, if so, then he is the Man for every age. There is in him that which can appeal to and satisfy the thoughts and hopes and aspirations of every period of human experience. That Jesus Christ is always the same does not, therefore, mean that he can always be apprehended in the same way, or that his value and meaning for human life can always be understood and expressed in the same terms. His greatness eludes any complete human understanding. The best that any age can do is to make him real for that age, and then to hand on to new ages the ever recurring task of understanding him anew, as human life changes and as new problems call for solutions.

There are two false attitudes toward the thought of the past. One such is to regard that thought as a finality beyond which we cannot go. But that is to be untrue to the lesson which the past itself has to teach, the lesson taught us by men who were thinkers for their own time, and who dared to follow thought into untrodden fields.

And the other false attitude is to disregard the past, and to try to do our own thinking independently of what has been thought before. But that again is to lose the lesson that history has to teach, it is to fail to benefit by the experience of mankind. If we are to understand the present, we must know the past, know it as a living thing, and from its life we shall learn the lessons for our life today. We shall be true to the Christian thought of the past if we try to make Christ real for ourselves.

Such is the argument of this book. And further, the author says, our problem is the social problem, the ethical problem, and he asks and aids in answering such questions as these: How shall society be built on the foundation of righteousness, justice, and love? How shall the individual, every individual, find his own freedom in a right and just relation to his fellows, a relation that shall express and maintain the rights and freedom of all? How shall the State, the Nation, be so constituted as to maintain the rights and duties, political and industrial, of all its members?

Creative Christianity:

By Professor George Cross,
Of Rochester Theological Seminary.

The author terms this "A study of the genius of the Christian faith." "To everyone who seeks to hold this faith intelligently," he says, "and to communicate it to the minds and consciences of others this task of ours must present itself as permanently imperative, and the present juncture in human affairs makes the time particularly opportune. For the work of reconstituting the essential order of human life, now pressing so hard on the human power of initiative on a vast scale among many peoples, is bound to produce a profound effect on the religious life of men everywhere."

Periodically, he holds, the organizing genius of the Christian faith must manifest itself in the reshaping of the forms of conduct, of the political affairs, of the popular philosophy and of the spirit of reverence current among any people. That which seemed at one time indispensable to the religious life has to be set aside in the interest of that very life and other forms more truly representative of that people's later faith and more adequate to the fulfillment of its newer aims must take their place.

"Creative Christianity" is a contribution toward reshaping the inherited forms in which our Protestantism has expressed its inner life for us so that the coming generation nurtured under the changed spiritual tendencies current today may have a form of Christianity better fitted to its needs.

In Forbidden Tibet

The first English woman to travel from India to the town of Gyantze through bleak Himalayan passes and across desolate Tibetan plains, was Muriel Percy Brown, who made the mysterious trip with her husband, sent by the British Government to study the art of closed Tibet!

The Lama priest, keeping always to the left to stay on the Holy Way, the terrible solitude of the land, the huge stuffed dogs hanging from dimly lit passageways in the Tibetan monastery, the barbaric splendor of the costumes of the Tibetan servants, who courteously extend their tongues at full length as they serve at table, the aristocratic delicacy and pallor and charm of the hostess herself, a lady from Lhasa,—tell in fascinating revelations that adventure and strange exploration are today more entertaining than ever before.

The American MAGAZINE of the Orient

More than 50 Illustrations.

"Stepping-Stones Across the Pacific," a Special Set of Unusual Photographs.

The American Fish and the World Net By William Hard

The titles assumed by Edmund Roberts, one of our earliest diplomatic representatives to Annam—when he found titles were essential there—were "Edmund Roberts of Portsmouth, Nashua, Concord, and all other New Hampshire towns, and also of Merrimack, Ammonoosuc, Androscoggin and all other New Hampshire rivers, and also of Monadnock and Winnepossaukee and all other New Hampshire mountains and lakes."

The Annamese acclaimed him one of the most titled noblemen that had ever visited them. Edmund Roberts thought this scheme out himself. But President Tyler later officially nominated Caleb Cushing as "Count Caleb Cushing" when accrediting him to the Emperor of China.

Are we following the spirit of George Washington today by avoiding our international duties in Asia and Europe? William Hard says we are not, but that if "in accordance with the precepts of George Washington we follow our noses simply and only in the direction of our own interests, we shall finally arrive via the way-stations set up for us in the Orient by Roberts and Cushing and Commodore Perry, at a vital and active concern with the policies in Europe of Lloyd George and of Poincare and of Lenin."

A Fortnight on a Cargo-Boat By William L. Hall

In the good junk Wings of Peace, rechristened Becky Jane, a missionary doctor and his wife set out for Suining, their future home in the interior of China. The story of their adventures along the way, begin in the March number. Dr. Hall writes with vividness and dry humor of the boat and its primitive equipment, of the crew, of the military escort, of the turbaned river-pirates who plot to secure his bales and boxes, when . . . But finish this tale yourself and read "A Fortnight on a Cargo-Boat," by William L. Hall.

Conversations with a Kemalist By Demetra Vaka

Very soon the Near East may be occupying much the same prominence in the daily papers that the Far East has lately been given. For there are two governments in Turkey, one of which, the unofficial one, led by Mustapha Kemal Pasha, is showing surprising ability to keep going.

Demetra Vaka (Mrs. Kenneth Brown) talked with Kemalists in Constantinople under the nose of the Sultan's government, to which they are opposed, and in her writing in ASIA gives a vivid picture of Nationalist aims. Read Demetra Vaka's articles in order to know about the Near East long in advance of its appearance on the front pages of the newspapers.

Stepping-Stones Across the Pacific

An art insert of eight pages of handsome photographs on tinted paper gives glimpses of the coconut-crowned, romantic islands of the Pacific. These little islands, celebrated in reams of "South Sea stuff," have a strategic importance out of all proportion to their size; for they are stepping-stones across the great ocean, hemisphere-wide, that separates Asia and America. Much of the discussion at the Washington Conference has centered about them, and in the "Four-Power treaty" the great nations have pledged "hands off" one another's island possessions.

King and Caliph in Southern India

Scenes of the Moplah uprising in Malabar, one of the trouble spots in Great Britain's colonial possessions. These are the first authentic pictures to reach the Western World.

Cannibalism Breaks Out in Russia

EATING a four-year-old child as a last measure against famine is one of the terrible stories coming to us recently from reliable American sources in Russia. Cannibalism is usually one of the terrible concomitants of a famine situation. Meanwhile the famine funds in the hands of the various organizations are still short of meeting the need, several million people being doomed to perish under present conditions. While human beings eat one another to live, it is particularly shocking to have a political discussion arise in the ranks of the relief workers. Mr. Hoover has performed a great service for the world in this and in other relief enterprises, but, in our judgment, he slipped the other day in putting the ban on the American Committee for Russian Famine Relief. Certain newspapers took the cue at once, and confusing this organization with the American Federated Russian Famine Relief Committee wrote stories with scare headlines which have wrought confusion to the whole task of Russian relief. Meanwhile it is charged that Mr. Hoover had previously interfered in the work of the Friends, though his own organization is confessedly unable adequately to meet the needs in Russia. The good Samaritan in Russia will not ask any man whether he was formerly of the bourgeois or of the proletariat. Neither present political creed nor religious creed should hinder him in doing just what his prototype in the Master's parable would have done. Some are contributing through Mr. Hoover's organization, which in turn works in cooperation with the soviet government and secures part of its funds from that government. The Quakers are on the ground and have their relief committees at work. The American Committee for Russian Famine Relief will work through the Russian Red Cross, which is now a recognized member of the Red Cross family of organizations throughout the world. Any one of these organizations can use money effectively and expeditiously to save starving people. Let us have an end of political propaganda until the dying men and women of Russia are fed. We may then sit down and discuss Karl Marx—if we are in the mood.

Disciples Want No Creed for Missionaries

EVENTS are proving day by day that not all Disciples have apostatized from the position of their fathers in the matter of creeds. Alexander Campbell and his followers were unable to continue in the fellowship of the Presbyterian church because of the Westminster creed. They united with the Baptist church by special privilege without signing a creed and left when their doctrinal liberty was found to clash with Baptist interpretation. That the spiritual grandchildren of these men should solemnly set forth a statement in interpretation of the New Testament teaching as understood by the board of managers of a missionary society and make this authoritative upon the missionaries is a clear departure from historic precedent. Rev. W. F. Rothenburger, pastor of First church, Springfield, Ill., a member of the board of managers, voted against the creedal resolution and gave as his reason that he was unwilling to bind a yoke upon the missionaries which he was unwilling to wear himself. Dr. Finis Idleman of Central church, New York City, also a board member, has written a vigorous letter to headquarters raising the question as to whether his church can conscientiously send its offerings to support a creed-bound missionary enterprise. The ministerial association of Indianapolis gave an entire session to the study and discussion of the issue that has arisen and by a vote of 24 to 1 repudiated the action of the board of managers and asked for a reconsideration.

Even Dr. A. B. Philputt, dean of Indianapolis Disciples ministers, who as a board member voted for the creedal statement, reconsidered his position and voted for its rescinding. Christendom has a sorry history with its creeds. Nearly every creed has meant a fresh division in the church. The very moment that the Disciples join the ranks of the creed-makers their present danger of division will be greatly increased. Like all congregational bodies they are not held together by any firm bonds of ecclesiastical authority. The only possible way for a loose confederation of churches like that of the Disciples of Christ to conserve what fellowship they have is through the practice of tolerance and Christian forbearance. The board of managers probably mistook a clamor in one corner of the denomination for the voice of the denomination. The letters and resolutions from various sections of the country reveal how keenly the friends of the society have been disappointed in their leaders.

University President Defends His Faith

FOR fifteen years various lesser lights of the ministry have been attacking certain university presidents and intellectual leaders, particularly in the state universities. When William Jennings Bryan made his attack on the president of the University of Wisconsin, Dr. Birge, he probably expected the college president to remain silent as in the past. Dr. Birge has thought it his duty to break the silence of fifteen years. He writes a letter to his pastor, Dr. E. S. Worcester, of the First Congregational church of Madison. In this letter he expresses his wonder that anyone could find a religious view of the world incompatible with strict scientific method in the laboratory. Reviewing the history of the various conflicts of theologians and scientists, he asks, "Was the cause of religion advanced when men were told that the only way to hold their faith in God was to unite their faith with the belief that the earth is flat and that the sun and stars revolve about it?" The university president penetrates to the very heart of our modern theological situation with this observation: "While these critics are deeply concerned to have people believe that there was a direct relation between God and nature in the remote past, they never seem to think that such a relation exists today." Jesus asserted that his Father was still working, and he worked, but some would have us think of a completed divine task and of a God who sleeps or loafs until the judgment day calls him to renewed activity once more. Once the threat against free research in the scientific field was dangerous. Now it is only funny, except when one thinks that Mr. Bryan and some of his misguided allies will probably drive some university boys into infidelity.

Revival of Interest In Religion

ONE publishing firm in America announces that it will issue during the opening months of 1922 seventy new volumes on religion and theology. This firm would not be offering these wares to a public which had no interest in religious discussion. Even our economic problems are hardly as interesting as our religious problems, if we are to judge by the offerings of the American publishers. In England the same tendency is quite discernible. The London Times literary supplement of January 5 makes an analysis of the books published in the United Kingdom during 1921 and says: "Religion has recovered from its relapse of 1920." Next to fiction with 967 new titles comes religion with 563 new titles. Thus in England, in spite of the most urgent problems of reconstruction, the people are buying books dealing with the religious problem in greater numbers than books treating any other life interest. These times are revealing to us some new writers of authority. Rev. John A. Hutton has come into rapid favor among American readers during the past year. Dr. Fosdick has shown us that it is even possible for religious books to run into large editions. The times in which we live are full of questions about God, the real teachings of Jesus, the nature of the Bible and the life after death. Many books appear that deal with methods of church work to meet the needs of a time when old church methods are passing away and new ones are taking their places. The man who still has on his shelves scientific books that are twenty-five years old is either working on the history of science, or he is a fossil. The same thing is true of the minister. Religion is being restated. Men have dugged around the roots of the ancient tree and instead of the tree falling it is putting forth new shoots and branches.

The Hanging of a Dead Man

HANGING a dead man to increase the sanctity of human life in the community was the irrational sensation in Chicago legal procedure last week. Harvey Church, a man who has all the marks of a victim of dementia precox, had killed two men under circumstances and through impulses of unspeakable barbarity. After the crime he was nonchalant and showed no emotion of moral awareness in the face of his terrible deeds. For a month previous to his hanging he had been a bundle of flesh without mentality, though owing to some peculiarities of legal procedure he was not declared insane. His execution under these circumstances has brought a sense of horror into the minds of thinking people. It reveals the essential futility of capital punishment. It is coldly argued by some lawyers that society does well to protect itself against such persons as Church by hanging them even if they are insane. Were it impossible to confine such people for life in a colony by themselves, such an argument might have some force. Society must preserve itself, and does so sometimes at a terrible price. But there is no evidence to show that capital punishment is at all superior as a method of handling such criminals. It is cheaper, but it breaks down the very thing that the community wants to build up, the sense of sanctity of human life. The legal machinery took hold of Harvey Church too late. Such men should be detected as boys while going through the public schools. It would not require a great deal of specialized training for teachers to pick out suspects and turn them over to specialists for examination. All those who are victims of dementia precox and certain other mental disorders should be confined in a colony long before they reach the criminal stage of their development. They would not propagate their kind and after awhile the race would be delivered. At present society makes it more likely that subnormal people will propagate their species than university graduates.

Dartmouth Will Take No Creedal Orders

DR. J. C. MASSEE, Baptist Fundamentalist leader, recently sent a letter to President Hopkins of Dartmouth College in which certain characteristic demands were made. Dr. Massee asserted in his letter: "No teacher should be permitted to continue in any of our schools without the clearest expression of his faith in the acceptance of the Baptist fundamentals." President Hopkins in his vigorous reply calls attention to the fact that Dartmouth College was founded by royal charter as an undenominational school, and is not subject to denominational control. The following excerpt from the letter of President Hopkins states the case well from the college viewpoint: "The point of view of the letter seems to me to afford the most definite illustration that I have ever seen as to the pernicious influences of denominational control, or an attempted denominational influence in educational institutions. The minute that education becomes something besides a sincere and open-minded search for the truth it has become a pernicious and demoralizing influence rather than an aid to society and an improver of civilization. Educational institutions are more or less familiar with the attempts of economic groups and the efforts of political groups to define what truth shall be taught within the colleges and to temper and to modify the curriculum so that it shall support 'orthodox' beliefs rather than to stimulate the progressive search for truth and the weighing of what we accept as truth to show whether it is true or not." In some denominations an effort is now being made to make college boards responsible to the conference or to a board of education supported by the denomination. The very moment a college becomes a propagandist institution committed to the defense of a dogma, instead of a truth-seeking institution following the light, the day of the church college is over. The Baptists face this problem more acutely at this moment than any other communion, but it will sooner or later be an issue in most communions. Strength to the arm of President Hopkins and all such undaunted souls, for they fight the battles of academic freedom for us all.

The Prevention of Divorce

MUCH talk may be heard in church circles concerning the evils of divorce and of the desirability of stricter laws and stricter law enforcement. Is the church equally concerned in preventing the real cause of divorce, the estrangement of human hearts? A minister was in a lodge meeting not long since when the fraternal society was about to expel a member. This member was accused of unfaithfulness to his wife, and the home was about to break up. The minister was ready to vote for the expulsion. But over on the other side of the hall a big, awkward man got up and asked for delay on the ground that he still had hope that the home of two little children might in spite of everything be preserved. He accepted service on a committee which brought together the wronged wife and the offending husband. No one knows just how it was done, but a reconciliation took place, and there seems to be a favorable prospect that this home will be saved. Provided this home is saved, was not this a more effective piece of work than to have invoked a legal technicality against a divorce over in the court? The court of domestic relations of Chicago, where so many divorces are granted, also effects many reconciliations. The latter are not good newspaper stories, and few people know about this side of the activity of the court. Yet it is far more important than the legalizing of separations.

The Protestant Ku Klux

IN regions where the Ku Klux Klan is still active, intimations multiply that certain Protestant ministers are in its confidence, and would seem on occasions to be directing its activities. Its zeal to "support the church" has been displayed by numerous signs. Citizens remark upon ministers' uncanny knowledge of details of what the Klan has done or is proposing to do. Scarcely a Sunday passes without the publication of the news that a Klan has visited a church in a body, simply to signify approval, or to remain decorously through the service. One issue of a newspaper circulating through a wide territory recently printed news items of three such visitations. Latterly it has been the custom, on the occasion of these visits, for the leader of the Klan to present the minister with a "donation," as in the case of each of the three calls mentioned. This is assumed to be a mark of the favor which the particular minister enjoys with the Klan, or of the favor which the Klan seeks from him or his congregation. It is noted that the congregation breaks into applause on some of these occasions. The banners carried in public parades of the Klan give further intimations to the same effect. They support the introduction of the Bible into the public schools, while accompanying legends indicate that the Roman Church does not enjoy the favor accorded Protestant bodies. The chief hindrance to the permanent and universal installation of the Bible as a text-book in the schools is assumed to be the Roman Church. Some of the legends are interpreted as siding with Masonic orders in their assumed controversy with Romanism. All of which reminds one that the restorer and head of the Klan is said to be a Mason and was in earlier years a minister of one of the Protestant denominations. In developing the ritual and ideals of the Klan he is alleged to have drawn upon his acquaintance with Masonry and the church usages. Here is a field where accurate knowledge cannot be gained. By shrouding its operations and principles in secrecy the Klan is subjecting itself to all manner of malignant charges which it cannot refute by evidence satisfactory to the public, and may be suffering an injustice which it has itself invited. Its partiality for certain Protestant ministers and their churches must prove an embarrassment also to those enjoying its favor. Such ministers and churches may well devoutly pray to be delivered from the tender mercies of their friends. The accumulating suspicions and antipathies which prompt high-minded citizens to think what a Texas judge asserted in his court the other day, that the Klan is "the most dangerous organization that has ever been organized in this country," must reflect upon ministers who graciously accept its donations and other favors, and upon congregations who applaud its presence and its "benevolence." To be the passive recipient of such flattering attentions is embarrassing enough, but to be the inspiration and directing mind in the activities of such an agency, as ministers are believed to have become, can lead only to defeat and undoing for those allowing themselves to be deluded into such "zeal for righteousness." The minister who resorts to such devices must have some cause to "put over," or must desire to "get across" with some purpose, not consonant with the aims and ends of the gospel of Christ.

A Mirror of the Soul

A Lenten Message

ABOVE the bed of King David, so tradition tells us, there hung a harp. At midnight, as the wind rippled over its strings, it made such music that the king must needs rise and search his soul for words worthy to fit the melody of his harp. Thus, out of the beautiful, broken dreams of a man of the people which were of old came a little book of music of the human heart when swept by the winds of God. How wonderful is that tiny book linked with the name of the poet-king who, from following his herds on the hillside came to the throne of his people, bringing his shepherd flute! He lived in rough, cruel days, an antique king in a barbaric age, but such a poet was he that after three thousand years his words are still paths whereby the soul climbs to God.

A psalm is a poem, and something more; a poem born of those deep moods which come unbidden out of the mists of the mind—an hour of joy or of sorrow—when the soul melts in love and prayer, touched by that homesickness of the heart we call religion; a mood spontaneous and rapturous when the heart pours itself out, knowing no ambition, no self-seeking, in penitence or thanksgiving, at the feet of God. A psalm is not made; it grows. It is a gift, not a trophy; an uprush of the heart at the touch of him whose coming is as the wind moving to and fro in mystery. It is thus that the echo of an hour of prayer among the hills of Judea touches us like a hand long fallen into dust, and its words have upon them the dew of an eternal morning.

Look at the human scene in the psalms. There the rapture of faith is so lended with the misery and woe of life that it is often hard to know whether the reigning note is deep joy or a bitter sadness. Ever recurs the sense of oppression, the memory of oppression, the fear of oppression, and songs of divine consolation alternate with cries of revenge—as was natural in the hymns of a land so often ravaged by war, tossed to and fro between rival empires, and left desolate. Naturally, too, the question which distressed the psalmists was the question which throws a long shadow over literature and life—the question of undeserved suffering. Those ancient singers longed to believe that right-doing secured prosperity and protection, and when it seemed to do so they were happy. But the facts were often sadly the other way, and their faith was sorely tried. Always the prosperity of the wicked and proud filled them with dismay, and their music sometimes ebbs and flows between defiance and despair.

While "the deep sighing of the poor" is heard in the psalms, it is not pity for the poor that we hear, but a demand for justice as against the arrogant and powerful oppressor. The typical bad man in the psalms is the tyrant, whether he rule by cunning or by cruelty. What terrible indictments are here against the murderer of the innocent, whose eyes are "set against the poor." The deceitful tyrant is drawn with equal indignation. He is the usurper who spreads his net with flattering words and catches the weak to dispoil them by robbery. Nevertheless, the psalmist does not lose heart. In spite of the contradictions of life, he is confident that "the patient abiding of the meek shall not perish forever." By the same token, the prop of society and the pillar of stability, in the mind of the psalmist, is the just man, the righteous judge, moderate, gentle, wise. Aye, he is like unto God, who heareth the cry of the weak and healeth the broken of heart.

Above the human scene—so troubled and full of peril, where traps are set by day and arrows fly by night—hovers the divine order, and it is there that we must look for the ruling ideas of the psalms. Yet the very sense of that Eternal Order, so quick and vivid, induced in those long dead sinners a poignant sense of the fleetingness of mortal life and the vanishing of all things human. Sometimes, as in the ninetieth psalm—that majestic funeral hymn of the human race, with its swift death of morning flowers, and its human myriads swept away by the flood of years—this mood becomes terrifying, and the hope of man becomes as frail as the bird-song in the death march of Chopin. How helpless is man, pursued by Time, overtaken by Death—his life a span, a valor that melts in the void, a tale told in the night; here today and tomorrow gone. What a shadow he is, what shadows he pursues! Herein the psalmists were wise, in that, instead of being crushed by the brevity of life, they accepted it as the divine plan. Until we make our peace with the fact that we are pilgrims and strangers in the earth, life is a riddle and a tragedy. Once we face that fact, the wise man will take refuge from the evanescence of things mortal in the sanctuary of the eternal.

Therefore the psalmists turn to God—just God, no dogmas about him, but the reality of his being and the mystery of his mercy; God who is from everlasting to everlasting, the home of the soul. Nowhere else—outside the little Book of Eternal Life which tells the story of Jesus—can be found such a profound and vivid sense of the hallowing presence of God in the world. The clouds are his chariots, the thunder his voice, and his foot-steps bow the heavens. They celebrate the power of God, his wisdom, his justice, his fidelity and mercy with every variation of melody, but most of all his pity. What fills these singers with abiding wonder is that God considers man, and visits him with salvation. Other hope they have none. They rest in the integrity of the Eternal, and his loving-kindness is more than life. There is in these songs a mingled agitation and peace—a deep and grateful peace in God, joined with an eager, passionate hunger for more of God. When God seems far away, their music falls to a lower octave and life loses its rhythm, its radiance, and its soul of loveliness. When he is near, the sun is up, the dew is on the grass, the trees clap their hands, and flowing waters glisten with his beauty.

Hence the solemn, overwhelming sense of sin in the psalms. How refreshing it is to escape from the clamor of self-assertive egoism today into the sweet and liberating humility of the psalms, with their clear vision of the horror of sin in the light of the holiness of God! Sin has its social aspects, but the words of the psalmist tell the other truth with awful clarity: "Against thee, and thee only, have I sinned"—words bowed low with a sense of the solitary, unshared guilt of each soul. It is not the guilt of those who tempt us—they have theirs—but the sin of each lonely soul bearing its own burden, that the psalmist sings. No other singers so search us for secret, unconfessed sins. To listen to their pleadings for inward purity, their longings to be made white as snow, is to feel what awful souls dwell in mortal clay. Uniting so vivid a sense of God with so keen a vision of sin, the logic would seem to be despair. But the glory of the psalms is their note of hope. Underneath the sweet-toned pathos of the psalms is the grand truth that God is equal to the horror of sin, not only pure but purifying.

Have we among us today a religious life equal to that which sings in the psalms? One doubts it. Join with this a further question—how was it that in a rude and dark age the religious affections attained to such full flower? No writer since that time, not even Augustine, has equalled the psalmist in deep and lofty religious utterance. How was it possible at such a time and amid such scenery? It must be that in olden times the soul was alone with God as it has never been alone with him since. Life was simpler then than now, less cluttered, and as it has become more intricate and engrossing, it has also become more distracting. Our modern world, with its noble and fruitful intellectual agitations, its research into nature, its co-operation in social enterprise, absorbs men; so much so that the invisible world which in other ages drew to itself the thought and yearning of men, seems dim and far away. The human struggle mars fellowship with God. Hence a restlessness of mind, a pathetic loneliness of soul, felt everywhere in our age. Never were there so many men running hither and yon hunting for they know not what. Blindly, gropingly they seek the touch magnetic, the one lost chord, the sense of God needed to give unity, meaning and interpretation to the multitudinous, teeming life of this brilliant and tormented time.

Can we of today have the great and simple faith of the singers of the psalms? Assuredly; and this is the secret of all those gentle and wise souls who have learned that, however complex life may be, at heart it may remain simple; for "He keepeth those in perfect peace whose minds are fixed on him." If the world seems a confusion worse confounded, it is because the inner life is a malady; because we are imprisoned in the external present, and know not the escape of the spirit and the great freedoms of the mind in God. The psalmist knew how to pray, but he also knew how to be still, and listen, and know that God rides the storm of human events and rules the restless human heart. On a steamer, loaded with troops, as we entered the war zone, where lightning lurked in the waves, we were forbidden to sleep. So we lay on our cot reading the book of the psalms till dawn—thinking betimes of the peril of the singer of old. How different the scene from that in which David lived; and yet, though all the world has changed, and man has sought him out many inventions, our need of God and our relation to him were just what David felt ages ago. Aye, he was with us in the night, our God, the healer of our sorrows, the cleanser of our sin by the same incredible mercy with which he cleansed the soul of the poet-king in days far gone. Only the outward conditions of life had changed; the way of prayer remained, and the great and simple words of the psalmist became a shining ladder of the soul. For the sea is his, and he made it, and he walketh upon the deep!

If we except the Shepherd psalm and the Lord's Prayer, no other bit of writing has done more for the heart-life of the race than the fifty-first psalm. Multitudes have gone from earth to meet the destiny of man breathing the words of that great confessional hymn. Its first words in the old vulgate version—Miserere, "have mercy"—have been the last words of many of the sweetest souls of the race. Just before his death, with his hand mutilated by torture, Savonarola wrote a commentary on this psalm. Roland Taylor shouted it amid the flames of martyrdom, and was struck in the mouth for not saying it in Latin. The northermost grave on earth, so it is said, is one made for a member of the expedition of Sir George Nares to the Arctic Sea. It is near Cape Brechy, on the brow of a hill covered with eternal snow, overlooking fields of ice stretching away into the northern night, where, like a lamp hung over the door of eternity, shines the polar star. A large stone covers the sleeper, and on a copper plate at the head, the words are engraved: "Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." Never did the pathos of those words find a more perfect setting—only, the mercy of God is whiter than snow!

Athanasius asked his friends to repeat the fifty-first psalm as they lay awake in the stillness of the night. Try it, and if there is any vanity left in you it will flee away before those great words uttered softly in the dark—when one hears nothing but the beating of one's own heart. When you have finished you will know why that psalm has lived so long, and why it will still be alive and flashing when the last man lifts his trembling heart to God on a dying earth. Here is a little Book of Prayer and Praise, white with the religion of ages yet a-glitter with the dew of each new morning, tested and tried by centuries of sorrowful and victorious experience—take it to heart, love it, live with it in the still hour, and learn the deepest truth that man may know—that we live in God, and that the wisdom of life is to let him live in us vividly, abundantly, triumphantly!

One of a Kind

NATURE uses no molds. She does not make duplicates. No two leaves on the trees are exactly alike, and, in the exceeding complex of the human individual, no two combinations of temperamental and intellectual endowments ever are identical. Twins may be so similar in appearance as to confuse friends, teachers, and even parents, but neither is ever in doubt about his own identity.

Human society has showed itself grossly remiss in learning this elementary lesson. The principle is implicit in the very nature of things moral and spiritual. Yet our educational programs and the institutional make-up of our society violate the principle wholesale, and, it would almost seem, with malice prepense. We are busy everywhere forcing uniformities, making molds and jamming human mind and soul-stuffs into them. As a result malignant envies and jealousies are generated until they prevail among the chief woes of social existence and take rank among the chief causes of social disaster. Duplicating and competing institutions convert our most advanced civilizations into bedlams, and condemn us for turning into hells the fabrics out of which science and religion combine in asserting it was intended to produce the kingdom of heaven on earth. Nature never mistakes two of a kind. On the contrary, we are so distraught with our feverish zeal to produce multitudes of a kind that we search the world over for the intellectual and spiritual Henry Fords who will automatize and standardize and duplicatize the whole process of social existence. Let none cast slight upon Henry Ford as a fabricator of automobiles and iron plow-horses. He is an all-but-incomparable benefactor of his age. But his processes are mechanical and not vital. Social values lie in the realm of life, and social institutions should be devised to operate efficiently in that domain.

The indictment against our sectarian or denominational order in religion is that it demands slavish conformities, represses wholesome differences, obliterates precious individualities, and generates malignant rivalries. The divisions of the church are rightly deplored, but those who desire or conceive of the deadly uniformity which would result from the merging of all denominations into one "denomination" are indulging in a mind-wrecking asylologism as well as projecting absolute social disaster. Such a thing can never be, first, because such a thing cannot be conceived.

A high-school girl, on being engaged in conversation relative to vocational choice, declared that what she is trying to find is something which she can do better than anybody else in the world. There is no jealousy of her fellows in that; that attitude and conception of vocation are finally the only cure for the carking envies and enmities which are now eating the heart out of society. If we had an educational system which would make that its fixed aim, to help oncoming generations to discover, each individual for himself, what contribution to the common good he can make, superior to that of any other individual within his social group, the end of education would be realized and a healthy social order would be insured. There would then be no room for jealousy, nor for the kind of competition which is now rendering many a social situation hopeless.

The same principle universally applied would spare us from more than one grocery store of the same kind in a defined trade area, more than one dry-goods store, more than one school, more than one church, more than one anything which gains its prestige and livelihood from preying off of the well-being of a vival in the same area of service. If we can ever get our institutional scheme ordered on the basis of function, if we can bring ourselves to see that the test of value for each and all of our institutions is their service, this program will not seem so impossible of attainment. So far we have not even convinced ourselves that this is desirable.

When Mr. Hoover's committee of engineers appointed to enquire into the high cost of living submitted their report, they found that what is acting seriously to keep up prices is the needless duplication of stores. When a town of twelve hundred people supports thirteen grocery stores it is doing itself, and every man, woman and child within its trade area, a terrible disservice. The town is doing it, of course. It is paying the penalty and it is perpetrating the crime. The tender-hearted outsider need waste no tears upon the poor dupe, except in bemoaning its willingness to be its own dupe. There can be no two best grocers in that town. Twelve of them are misled into prostituting powers intended for a different purpose into a manifest disservice to their particular society. Their community is not only carrying them as a burden in the department where they do not belong, but it is impoverished in those fields where their endowments qualify them for their highest service, and where they are not now at work. Thus doubly weakened, it is not surprising that countless communities fall and lie prostrate.

This other town of eight hundred inhabitants maintaining eight churches is not practicing a religious liberty which means anything intelligible, or of which any American community has the slightest reason to be proud. It is difficult not to identify such a condition with idiocy, and appeal for the interposition of the state department of asylums and correction in the interests of the entire population. The implication that there are eight sets of religious views in that population is far wide of the mark. If the population is intelligent enough to enjoy the rights and rewards of a full and free democracy, there are eight hundred, not merely eight, sets of religious views. If churches are properly maintained to segregate and furnish mold for distinct types of religious tenets, then there are not enough churches in that town, not nearly enough.

If we can ever get the idea fixed in our minds that a church is a social institution, that its aims and right to be are properly defined in the terms of function, and shall proceed intelligently to order them, together with all other institutions, on that basis, we shall eventually get out of the hopeless tangle in which we are now enmeshed. Wanting a given thing done, appraising the persons and the means most capable of doing that thing, and setting them freely and untrammelledly at work, we are in a fair way of getting it done. But so long as we conceive a community as an arena in which thirteen individuals, twelve of whom have been deluded into believing themselves grocers, strive with each other for the gains of the public service which the one individual is alone properly qualified to render, we shall remain floundering in the slough where high prices and wasteful business methods and commercial bitterness overwhelm us. Not less manifestly, when we conceive of institutionalized religion in the terms of service or function, we shall not be building churches to force uniformities of doctrine and to scare or bludgeon people into reverence for arbitrarily defined tenets, but we shall seek out the persons and methods designed most efficiently to render the desired service. This will cure our religious jealousies and enmities by removing their causes. So long as our denominations were thoroughly intolerant of each other, were firmly convinced each that the members of its communion were certainly going to heaven and that those of other communions were as certainly going to hell, they had a kind of warrant for their existence as denominations. Each was rendering a service which at least its own adherents recognized to be essential, unique and altogether indispensable. But when the fatal charity was admitted, which inspires the minister of one denomination to acknowledge that those holding to other communions are as sure of coming beatitude and are as capable social agents now and here, as are those within his own communion, and which inspires him, in the same breath, as many ministers do, to admit and deplore the loss of spiritual values and Christian goodwill and social efficiency through our duplicating churchly programs in a given community, he and the ministry he discharges are condemned out of his own mouth. This is happily no surprise to countless sincere and devoted ministers in every range of the land, who are "only doing the best they know how" under conditions which they find themselves unable to control. They know the present conception and program of the denominational order are impossible. The system is radically inconsistent with itself. These ministers, like hosts of laymen, would like very well to know what they might do next.

It will help us all to find out that "next," if we shall appreciate the fundamentally unnatural program we are seeking to operate in the whole social field. Instead of ordering our service agencies, and training individuals, ourselves and all the rest, for that thing which each can do better than any other in the world, or better at least than any other within the social unit to be served, we are aping one another, snatching from a rival the gains of his endeavor, building needless grocery stores to destroy the usefulness of those already developing, making our churches more like each other every day, and insuring that none of them shall fulfil its social function or embody the spirit and purpose of him whose name all bear. General enlightenment will give us better grocery stores and churches, and show the way through many another perplexity.

Comparative Sizes

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I SAT with men in the place where men gather in a Pullman car, and they spake every man of the size of his City, and of the rapidity of its growth. And I reproved them not, for I like not always to be preaching, but I was thinking.

And one of them spake unto me, and said, What is the size of the city wherein thou dwellest?

And I said, It is larger than Athens was in the day of its power, and I would it were doing as much for the world as Athens did; and it is several times as large as Bethlehem, and larger than Nazareth ever can hope to be.

And they were silent. And I said,

In this country of ours, cities have grown and other material things have grown, and all so rapidly that we shall do well to consider lest we think too much of hugeness and not enough of those qualities which make a city or a country really worth while. For the real question is not how many noses of fools the census-man may count, but how fine is the publick spirit, and how safe and prosperous and intelligent and righteous be the folk.

And I said,

A thing is not necessarily great because it is big, nor big because it is near.

And I considered Keturah, how the top of her head cometh only to the shoulder of her husband, and all her sons tower above her, and say, Little Mother, haste thee, and grow; for thou art the littlest one in the family; and how even her daughter is more tall than her mother.

But I could not love Keturah more if she weighed three hundred pounds.

With Gratitude for "Leaves of Grass"

I F I could sail far out upon some sea,
Or in some fronded island dwell alone,
I'd bid farewell to all anxiety,
And let one day for twenty years atone.
I'd cast across the world this heart of stone!
But since within these walls I must be pent,
I take Old Walt, and read, and am content.

Kings

T HE kings of might shall fail and die,
However brave and strong,
But age on age the world shall serve
The mighty kings of song.

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

Putting Christianity Into Industry

By Sherwood Eddy

AT THE request of an employer who wrote regarding my previous article on "The Church at the Cross Roads," asking what a Christian business man could do to solve the problem, I replied by stating the six principles which I believed underlay Christ's teaching as applied to business. These social principles were Personality, or the infinite worth of every individual man, Brotherhood, Service, Liberty, and Justice, fulfilled in the all-embracing principle of Love, the full sharing of life. I endeavored to expand these principles and apply them to modern business conditions. The editor now requests an article applying these principles more in the concrete and in detail to actual business conditions. I will take seven typical plans of industrial organization, no one of which is a panacea, but in all of which there is clearly an endeavor to apply some of these principles more or less completely.

THE BROWNING COMPANY

After an address to business men on the application of Christian teaching to modern business, one of them invited the writer to visit his plant and see how they were trying to apply these principles in practice. The plan is a very simple one. The Browning Company of Cleveland employs some 500 men. In 1917, with much doubt and misgiving, the president decided that he would provide an open safety-valve for industrial unrest and take his employees into consultation concerning the conduct of the business on its industrial side. Accordingly he arranged for an informal men's meeting to act as a shop committee. The men elected their own representatives to meet twice each month and consult with the management regarding possible improvements in the business, in working conditions, and relations. The decisions of the meeting were placed in writing as a bulletin for inspection by all the employees. As the president urged them more and more to "produce" he felt that they had not sufficient incentive to do so if all the gain of the increased production came to himself. Accordingly as a motive to increase production, one-tenth of the profits were set aside to be divided among the workers pro rata on the basis of their wages. A plan for group insurance was next inaugurated, the worker receiving an insurance-policy which provides his family with half a year's wages at the time of his death if in the employ of the company, and with sickness benefit of $7 a week up to a limit of 13 weeks from the Mutual Benefit Association. The men's power was only advisory, but it resulted in growing good will, mutual understanding and increased production. Almost immediately there was a gain of 5 per cent in production in tons per man each month and a reduction in the labor turnover of 43 per cent. The men in the factory no longer feel that they are mere hands to be employed or dismissed, but members of a great family working together.

THE FILENE COMPANY

The second plan, that of William Filene's Sons Company, is much more elaborate. In 1891 when the writer left college the Filenes occupied two tiny retail stores in Boston, each with a floor space only twenty feet square. Twenty years later their sales had risen to approximately five million dollars a year and they now employ some 3,000 workers in their retail specialty store. Justice Brandeis in his "Business a Profession" mentions the three characteristics of a profession as "preliminary training, a calling pursued largely for others and not merely for one's self, and where the financial return is not the accepted measure of success." These characteristics will be found in the business of the Filenes and the other companies here mentioned. The need today in business seems to be to lift it to the high plane of a profession.

The Filenes provided a plan of self-government for employees, a system of arbitration through the operation of which employees can call for an adjustment of differences, and a minimum wage scale. The plan puts the final decision, except in matters of business policy, in the hands of the employees. Any matter, except policies of the business, which is vetoed by the management may be passed over that veto by a two-thirds vote of the employees. The Filene Cooperative Association is an organization including all employees and officers of the company as co-workers, without any distinction between employer and employees. Through their four out of eleven members of the board of directors the employees have a voice in the actual management of the business. These four are nominated by the employees but elected by the stockholders.

The plan was inaugurated in 1898 for employees' insurance and medical aid. It was so successful that gradually it was extended with committees for the conduct of Lectures, Education, Libraries, Health, Entertainments, a Club House, Athletics, Music, Publicity, Co-operative Supply, etc. The "Echo" which was started as a house organ by the management but was not popular, was turned over entirely to the employees. It is now self-supporting and very popular. Every employee of the company belongs to the Filene Cooperative Association which is a self-governing body, operating under a charter, constitution, and by-laws. Twelve of the twenty-three members of the committee are elected from the store. An arbitration board of twelve members receives appeals from the employees. The management, as such, has no representatives on the board. It considers cases of dismissal, wage reduction, differences between employees, etc. The company has no objection to their employees organizing. The retail clerks are not organized, but the company maintains working agreements with the unions among their other employees.

The plan of the Proctor and Gamble Company of Cincinnati is somewhat similar. Representation is provided for the whole plant through the Joint Conference Committee. In matters of arbitration the final decision is in the hands of the management through its Committee on Appeals. The plan provides for profit-sharing and "for regular conferences between employes and management to foster friendly relations and mutual understanding." Of the twelve members of the board of directors, three are employes elected by the other employes. "There shall be no discrimination under this plan against any employe because of race, sex, political or religious affiliation, or membership in any labor or other organization."*

COLORADO FUEL AND IRON

The plan of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company and the International Harvester Company has been followed by some 300 other companies in this country. The plan in Colorado was one of the earliest developed in America and was based on a study carried on by the Rockefeller Foundation. Four decades of labor trouble and strikes, including a civil war at Cripple Creek, the Leadville strike, the battle of Ludlow, etc., finally led to the visit of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., to the scene of the trouble in Colorado. A new Industrial Representation Plan was inaugurated which has immensely improved labor conditions and relations in the state. It provides for joint meetings of representatives of the employes and the management. The work is under the jurisdiction of a vice-president of the company known as the "Industrial Relations Executive." The plan was established in October, 1915, among some 15,000 employes of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company. The Joint Conference is composed of an equal number of representatives of the employes and those of the company. There are four joint committees on industrial Cooperation and Conciliation; Safety and Accident; Sanitation, Health and Housing; Recreation and Education. Whenever necessary a board of arbitration is formed. The joint committee on Recreation and Education considers social centers, halls, playgrounds, entertainments, moving pictures, athletics, competitions, field days, holidays, schools, libraries, classes for foreign speaking men, technical education, manual training, health lectures, relation to churches and Sunday schools, cooperation with Y. M. C. A. activities, etc. In the policy of the company there is no discrimination because of union or non-union membership. So far as the above plan has been carried out by the representatives of the company in the spirit in which it was devised it has been entirely successful and has immensely improved conditions in Colorado.

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER

The plan of the International Harvester Company has a Works Council for joint deliberation between representatives of the management and the employes of an entire plant. A General Council endeavors to unify conditions in the various plants. Impartial arbitration is provided for.

*Quotation from pamphlet entitled "Revised Plan of the Employes' Conference Committee" issued by the Proctor & Gamble Company, p. 3. See also "Constitutionalism in Industry," Education Society, 14 Beacon Street, Boston, describing more fully several of these plans.

This plan was inaugurated in 1919 in seventeen of the twenty plants of the company among its more than 30,000 employes. The three other plants later voted to adopt the plan. Representatives on the Works Council are elected by secret ballot by the employes. Meetings of the Works Council are held monthly, the management appointing representatives not to exceed in number the employes' representatives. The Works Council may consider and make recommendations on all questions relating to working conditions, protection of health, safety, wages, hours, recreation, education and other similar matters of mutual interest to the employes and the management. Arbitration is provided for by mutual consent. "There shall be no discrimination under this plan against any employe, because of race, sex, political or religious affiliation or membership in any labor or other organization." Thus the unions as such are not recognized. The company deals only with its own employes. They are free to belong to unions, however, if they wish.

THE DUTCHESS BLEACHERY

We may now consider a type which confessedly endeavors to relate Christian principles to business by the application of the golden rule. We may take that of the Dutchess Bleachery at Wappingers Falls, New York. During the war the president of the company, Mr. Harold Hatch, felt that he must apply his Christian principles to his own business. He accordingly entered into partnership plan with his 600 employes. Wages are paid to labor at the current rate. Wages are then paid to capital at 6 per cent. Two sinking funds are then provided of 15 per cent each of the balance of the profit, the one to protect the earnings of capital, and the other to insure labor against unemployment by providing half wages in time of depression. Of the remaining profit, half goes to capital and the other half to the workers, pro rata in proportion to their wages. The business is run by a board of operatives, a board of management, and a board of directors. The board of operatives is composed entirely of employes and gives ample opportunity for separate meetings. It takes charge of the settlement of grievances in their initial stage. It also manages the houses owned by the company. It is composed of eleven members elected by secret ballot. The board of management composed of three representatives of the management and three of the employes has control of all matters of mill management. This makes possible joint deliberation and gives the employes an equal voice in the management.

Arbitration is provided where a majority of the board cannot agree. The board of directors is composed of five members, three members from the management, one an elected employe, and one representing the public selected from the local committee. This board has final control of the company and its business policies except as delegated to the board of operatives or of management. "The board of directors authorizes the statement that our partnership plan is in no way opposed to organized labor." Mr. Seebohm Rowntree the great English employer when visiting this country recently was deeply impressed by this plan of the Dutchess Bleachery. The whole spirit of the place, the mutual good will, and mutual increased production, have shown the wisdom of the plan. It is bold and far-reaching, thoroughly Christian, and eminently successful.

HART, SCHAFFNER AND MARX

Another type of relationship is illustrated by that of the Hart, Schaffner and Marx Co., the Chicago manufacturers of men's clothing, with approximately 7,000 employes. This differs from all previous plans in that it is based on union organization. All the employes' representatives are union members and are elected by the union employes. As the factory is run on a preferential shop basis there are very few non-union employes. This type illustrates full constitutionalism in industry. The management is thoroughly organized, and they welcome complete organization on the part of the men without limitation or restriction in national trade unions with the right to choose their representatives where they will. The unions are gladly recognized. Meeting as two equal parties, a constitution was drawn up and it has proved not only successful but satisfactory to both management and labor. Executive, legislative and judicial functions are recognized, an impartial judge hears cases, makes decisions, and administers the constitution. With their employes drawn in large measure from revolutionary Russian and foreign European elements, this plan of the frank recognition of unions has proved a great buffer against revolutionary bolshevism in this country. The spirit of the agreement drawn up in 1916 is shown in the following statement:

"On the part of the employer it is the intention and expectation that this compact of peace will result in the establishment and maintenance of a high order of discipline and efficiency by the willing cooperation of union and workers rather than by the old method of surveillance and coercion.

"On the part of the union it is the intention and expectation that this compact will, with the cooperation of the employer, operate in such a way as to maintain, strengthen, and solidify its organization, so that it may be made strong enough, and efficient enough, to cooperate as contemplated in the preceding paragraph; and also that it may be strong enough to command the respect of the employer without being forced to resort to militant or unfriendly measures.

"On the part of the workers it is the intention and expectation that they pass from the status of wage servants, with no claim on the employer save his economic need, to that of self-respecting parties to an agreement which they have had an equal part with him in making, that this status gives them an assurance of fair and just treatment and protects them against injustice or oppression of those who may have been placed in authority over them; that they will have recourse to a court, in the creation of which their votes were equally potent with that of the employer, in which all their grievances may be heard, and all their claims adjudicated; that all changes during the life of the pact shall be subject to the approval of an impartial tribunal, and that wages and working conditions shall not fall below the level provided for in the agreement."*

Shop representatives or chairmen from each shop are elected by secret ballot by the union members. All employes who are members of the union are entitled to vote.

A Labor Department has been established by the company which is now administered by Professor Earl Dean Howard of Northwestern University. He investigates abuses, protects the company's interest, negotiates with agents of the union, administers all discipline, has oversight of all hiring, maintains hospitals, a charity fund, loan fund, recommends compensation, trains foremen in courtesy and patience, and promotes right relations between management and employes.

There is a Trade Board for the adjustment of grievances which sits as a court of original hearing in all matters arising between the company and its employes. Originally composed of 11 members, 5 chosen by the union, and 5 by the company with a neutral chairman, its activities are now successfully carried on by the chairman alone who is mutually trusted by both parties. The writer has had the privilege of being present in the hearings of this court of first instance which works so successfully. The employe presents his grievance. A representative of the company states the case of the company. The representative of the employe's trade union states the case for the employes. The whole spirit of the court is informal, friendly, and human. The chairman of the Trade Board then makes his decision. This may be finally referred to the Board of Arbitration. Questions of fact and testimony are left chiefly to the Trade Board while the Board of Arbitration is mainly concerned with questions of principle and the application of the constitution to new issues. A majority decision is binding on all parties. The company recognizes the union and deals directly with it, and according to agreement gives preference to union men both in hiring and discharging. This plan of Hart, Schaffner and Marx in its relation with the Amalgamated Union is more in accordance with the customs obtaining in Great Britain. There after many years of struggle, unions are freely recognized and dealt with. Mr. Whitley, author of the Whitley Counsels, himself a great Christian employer, speaker of the house of commons, said to the writer, "We employers in Great Britain regard collective bargaining and the frank recognition of the trade unions as both inevitable and desirable; inevitable, in that it cannot be ultimately resisted in the just democratic demand of labor, and desirable in that it works better in the end for all parties concerned."

SPIRIT AND PLAN

The foregoing plans are mentioned only as typical, from the simplest to the most complicated, of hundreds of instances that might be given in this country. There is no one panacea for labor trouble. Each Christian business man has the opportunity of applying the principles of Jesus to his own business. If we honestly seek to follow the golden rule, to recognize the human factor in business, to put ourselves in the place of the employe, methods and adjustments, plans and programs can be worked out. No plan will work well where men are selfish and anti-social. It is the spirit that matters most. A right spirit will show itself in right relations worked out by a system of trial and error, by patient experiment in some plan that will embody the above principles. Sooner or later we shall have to come back to the principles of Jesus, for nothing is settled till it is settled aright, and Jesus shows the way to the only final solution in the application of the principles of Personality, Brotherhood, Service; Liberty, Justice—and Love, the fulfilling of them all, Love, the full sharing of life in indomitable good will, the sole and sufficient solution of all our problems.

*"The Hart, Schaffner & Marx Labor Agreement," by Earl Dean Howard, Chicago, 1920, p. 9-10.

That plan will ultimately prove the best which most fully develops the personality of the worker in self-expression, self realization and self determination, which is not paternal charity but based upon genuine democracy and constitutionalism in industry, and which has regard to the welfare of the whole community. Thus every plan must regard the three factors of the community, the worker and the employer. We are only slowly learning in our own small groups the value of cooperation. Too often we forget that there is a world outside with which we must share our spirit and achievements. Just as the claim of Jesus to greatness rests upon his preeminent service to all—not only to a privileged few—so will our claim to be Christian rest upon applying his principles beyond our own factory walls. We must apply the whole gospel to the whole of life. This is applied Christianity in business.

The Spiritual Revival*

By A. Maude Royden

OUR LORD'S promise that we should be continually given fresh truth and led forward in the knowledge of the truth of the Holy Spirit of God has been abundantly fulfilled, and I believe that every generation receives the light needed for its own problems. If we think of the evolution of the human race, and of the animal and plant races, we shall see that the higher we get the more complicated our problems become. The higher we get the more possible it is to go wrong. He that is low need fear no fall, but he that is high can fall terribly. The corruption of the best is the worst, and the difficulty of solving our problems becomes greater and greater as we go forward. That is to say, absolutely the problems become greater, but relatively I think they do not, because as we go forward we are moving towards the light, we are getting towards God, who is the source of truth, and things that are very difficult today in the dark will be perfectly simple in the light. If you compare a person who is groping along even a very well-known road on such a day as last Sunday in the fog, with a person traveling in the bright sunshine, you will understand how easy it is to go wrong even on the plainest, broadest road. In a London fog, or in an intellectual fog, you may make mistakes which in the ordinary way would seem farcical. You can go to great heights if you can see your way. And I believe our progress ought to become easier and easier, because though, as we rise higher in the scale of being, our problems are more complicated, this is more than compensated by the increasing light as we draw nearer together. We are working now in the dawn; we may work in the full light of day, and things which are so difficult in the dark will be perfectly simple and straightforward.

REFUSING THE LIGHT

But it is impossible for men to refuse the light, and I have been trying to ask myself why it is that people—for after all, people desire truth, it is the divine instinct of human nature to want to know; why do people seek for the North Pole? Why are they looking now for the summit of Mount Everest? They will tell you a lot of reasons, but the real reason is an overbearing desire to know—why is it, therefore, that again and again whole generations of people refuse the light? I think it is because of this: Some great man arises and tells the truth about something, and because it is a great truth, and he is a great man, his words crystallize into a great phrase. And because we are human we love the truth, and we love that phrase, and when the man dies we love the phrase so much that we forget the truth. Over and over again I have come up against the great phrases of religious experience—"Washed in the blood of the lamb," "Redeemed by Christ," "To find in him our only salvation," "To be saved by faith"—these glorious phrases which are of the very poetry of religion, so dear that people cling to them when they are growing hard and rigid; they cling to the form even more than to the spirit. While the spirit is seeking fresh forms we lose it in our very devotion to the truth, the glorious truth that once was revealed to us by that saying.

LOSING THE SENSE OF TRUTH

And so it happens that generations come and go, and many of them refuse the light. And that leads to spiritual decay. If we do not go forward we go back. We must either grow or stop; we cannot stand still. Therefore, unless people will continually get back to the spiritual, and continually seek the light and feel after God if haply they may find him, they will become imprisoned in the great phrases that once set them free. The very expressions that once led to God will become obstacles in their way.

That is why we need a spiritual revival. If we always sought the truth about any expression of truth there would not be a revival because there would be nothing to revive from. A spiritual revival suggests a spiritual swoon or sleep, and that revival ought not to be necessary. But again and again it is necessary because people have, instead of pressing forward to the light, rested in the place which somebody illuminated for them by a great discovery.

Then suddenly, because we do love the truth, suddenly or gradually we realize that we have lost the sense of God, that we have lost the sense of truth; that the thing that was a living flame to our forefathers has died into a handful of ashes for us. That we have become spiritually hungry and thirsty. There comes a time, I believe, after every spiritual decay, when the heart of man begins to long for God, that truth which he has forgotten. That spiritual quest which he had abandoned calls to him again, and he realizes that he has been filling his belly with the husks the swine did eat, and he longs once more for light and truth. Then he sets out to look for God. And, my people, this is a dangerous hour. If we always followed the light we should not have these crises; we should be going forward smoothly and certainly. But after spiritual death there comes the desire for spiritual life, and the desire becomes so clamorous; it is like a man who has been starved. He is so eager that he is liable to satisfy himself in the easiest and readiest way. If with all our heart we truly seek him, we shall ever surely find him, but the desire that awakens suddenly, clamorously, may perhaps stop short of the search and be satisfied with something less than God. A real spiritual revival should be a real advance in the knowledge of God.

Unless there is, therefore, light, there is no spiritual revival in the true sense of the word. If there is only fresh emotion that revival will come and go, and not only not lift the world any farther on in the march towards God, but will actually enervate it, empty it, discourage it, perplex it. Like the war, people are more discouraged now than they were before the war, because they cast so much into it. A spiritual revival that is merely emotion, that is simply a sudden desire for spiritual experience satisfying itself in some purely emotional experience, leaves a man demoralized and undone. If you read the great text-books of psychology today you will find that very often a spiritual revival, so-called, has been accompanied by outbursts of immorality, by sudden loosening of all social ties and all sense of responsibility. That seems strange to some people, but it is not strange. It means simply that the world is full of emotion, full of a genuine hunger for God, a desire for light, but because they are impatient, just because the hunger is so keen, anyone who offers a religious emotion is snatched at, and is felt to be giving the needed food.

KNOWLEDGE OF GOD

But a spiritual revival means knowledge of God. All the great religions of the world have taught us something about the nature of God. A religion cannot be founded on an emotional experience alone. It must be founded on light, on the knowledge of God, and every great religion has taught something of God or it would never have moved the world at all, and every great Christian revival has been caused by someone or some generation giving light about the nature of God; Christ himself supreme, and after him his great followers—St. Paul, who interpreted to the world the fact that God is the Father of all the world. Christ had taught it, yes, but it was St. Paul who brought it home to the Jews that their Christian church must be a universal church; that God is the Father of all mankind. As we go forward we shall find that all great revivalists, St. Francis of Assisi, Martin Luther, and here in this country John Wesley, have all based their teachings on something new in the nature of God; new, though in a sense old; I mean they made it new to mankind. The revival that is only an attempt to answer a need for spiritual experience often wastes itself on pure emotionalism.

Now, at the present day, is there any reason to look for or desire a spiritual revival? I think so. For two generations now we have been refusing the light which God gave us through the great men of science. The result has been appalling. It means a science which is materialistic, it means a religion which is ignorant, and it means a disillusioned world. We have all the circumstances which should create a great revival, and now, and especially after the war, there has come a great hunger for God. I know there are millions to whom the war has brought nothing but a sense of "Let us eat and drink for tomorrow we die." Who can wonder? And yet there are also millions, yes I believe millions, to whom it has brought a heart sickness of a world without God; a feeling that the world is intolerable. We cannot find a God who will pity us and help us and lift us up, and so side by side with the surface indifference and laxity and desire of many people simply to enjoy what life can give, there is moving in the hearts of many, a great thirst for light, a great hunger for God.

CONVERGING STREAMS

There are all the circumstances which create a great revival. Have we got that knowledge, that further light to give? Yes, we have. I believe the future historian of religions will be able to trace during this past twenty to thirty years one stream after another, all converging into the great sea which is the knowledge of God. Science, psychology, religion, a new theology, one stream after another, all at last uniting into a real illumination as to the nature of God. To me, as I think it over, it seems that little groups of people all over the country and all over the world, certainly in America, Germany, and Russia, are realizing the power of the Spirit and the trustworthiness of God in a way which constitutes a new light to the world. These are old truths. Yes, all truths are old in a sense, but certainly they are being apprehended as they have never been before; not by individuals, but by the masses of people. There are seven thousand knees that have not bowed to Baal, and lips that have not kissed him. There are in this world millions who are realizing the spiritual power of God, and the trustworthiness—that is the only word I can use—the trustworthiness of God, in a way which is giving them power and light and everything that makes life glorious and worth living.

Sometimes it seems to me that Einstein and Freud, and Mrs. Eddy, and Mr. H. G. Wells are all working—I would not say along the same paths, but certainly to the same end—towards the increasing humility and reverence of science. The fact that everywhere the mystery and the spirituality of life is being preached by men who would perhaps have been materialists a generation ago; the fact that the men of science of today are of such, I can only call it a spiritual type, many of them so interested in things beyond what we see; the fact that Mrs. Eddy has, not only among her immediate followers but all over the world people who are believing fundamentally the same thing, that is to say, fundamentally they believe in the profound reality of the spirit, the dominance of spiritual over material things, is evidence of a fresh knowledge of the nature and purpose of God. We get H. G. Wells, writing a book which is simply a re-statement in modern terms of the Christian religion. We get Einstein teaching us the extraordinary place of the mind in the universe, and we get the new psychology finding almost all our physical troubles due to some kind of wrong thought.

A DANGEROUS HOUR

We need a revival now because we have refused the light, and in this light we have a new revelation of the nature of God. But I repeat, it is a dangerous hour. The revivalism that shall be based on fear, or even on the meeting of a great and overwhelming need, a revivalism which is an emotion without light, will blast the hopes of a real spiritual revival more perhaps than any material kind of wrong, more even than war itself.

I am trying, and I am only one among many hundreds and perhaps thousands, to meet this need in a way that shall be a real advance. The overwhelming desire for light must be met. It is a great desire, and having now had some little experience—very, very little—I want to tell you what it has taught me, and in what ways I want your help, because I do want your help very badly indeed. It seems to me that a modern revival should be cast in a certain form. It should aim to reach everybody, every section of society, every class of people; the men at work, the children at school, the women in the homes; the rich, who have so much power materially, the poor, who have so much insight spiritually; the people in prisons, in hospitals, everybody should be reached if possible. At least, they should be made to understand that their help is wanted, that we cannot set the world in order unless everybody is going to help. That is why I want so much to go into prisons. Here are people whose world is certainly out of order, but who yet may help to set it in order if they realize that the world needs them in any way at all. Then I think it should not be an appeal for the individual soul; it should be an appeal to people to consecrate themselves for the service of the world. A religion that is not as wide as the world today, in its aim and in its scope, is only going to be a very selfish and narrow kind of appeal. I do not mean—God forbid—that the individual soul must not be saved. I am certain that until the individual soul is saved the individual can never serve the world as he ought to do. But I think the real claim of Christianity is that it is for the sake of the world that we think it worth while to be so severe with ourselves. For their sakes I consecrate myself.

NO FALSE ACCOMPANIMENTS

Then it must have no false or insincere accompaniments. What do I mean by that? Well, I mean we should not have bad music, and we should not sing silly hymns, and we should not hypnotize people. A great deal of apparent spiritual experience is simply hypnotism. You get people being made to sing some tune over and over again, louder and louder; they must put more heart into it. Heart! They want to put their heads into it! Half the time these people are more or less drunk, intoxicated, not as people should be intoxicated, for everyone desires to be intoxicated sometimes; everyone should know the intoxication of being lifted out of himself into something bigger. And this can be done by spiritual truth or hysterical emotion. The latter is far easier than the former, and many people do not distinguish between the two. Therefore I think we should see that everything which accompanies a spiritual revival, if possible more elevated, more noble, than an ordinary religious service. There should be no lowering of standards in order to create the kind of emotional atmosphere that makes it so much easier for the speaker to get his power. That is one of the things we should deny ourselves.

Then again, it should appeal deliberately to the mind. I have found as I have gone about that there is an enormous desire really to come to grips with the things I am trying to say, with the question of religion and God. In Liverpool, for instance, we had three evening meetings and one afternoon meeting in a week. At the last meeting there were nearly two thousand people present, and when I said at the close of the service that I would ask the congregation to leave as quietly and quickly as possible in order that those who wished to stay for discussion could get together, I should think out of the two thousand people not more than three hundred went away. It is rather difficult to run an after meeting of fifteen to sixteen hundred people, but they went on asking questions; I think they would have stayed nearly all night. And nearly all the questions were vital questions that needed an answer, that showed a real hunger for some kind of light, for spiritual or practical experience.

A GLORIOUS EMOTION

And do not think from what I have said that the sort of revival that seems to me needed in this 20th century is a dry, intellectual, unemotional thing. It is true that it must begin with the mind; it is true that it must be a real advance in the knowledge of God, in a well worked up mission, by singing together and being in great groups, and by great and striking appeals; it is true that it must be, if it is to be real at all, an advance in knowledge, a drawing near to the light. But, my people, there is no emotion more glorious or more noble than the emotion which is awakened when one sees a great truth.

Where'er a noble deed is wrought,
Where'er is spoken a noble thought,
Our hearts in glad surprise
To higher levels rise.

That "glad surprise" is perhaps the noblest of all human emotions, that overwhelming emotion that seizes you when you see Beauty, when you see Truth, when you see God. That is the emotion we need. For no driving force comes from a purely intellectual appeal, no spiritual experience is gained from a merely rational explanation. It is when that appeal and that explanation become something more than intellectual, when they become truth; not knowledge only, but truth, that the emotion is real, lasting and spiritual, a fusing of one's whole being in the knowledge and love of God. And the awakening of such an emotion should be the desire of all who proclaim the gospel of Christ and the Kingdom of God. For such an emotion as that does not waste itself in hysteria; it becomes an inspiration, a driving force, a passion in the heart, that makes one long to spread the truth to other people. And it is that emotion, that lasting spiritual experience, awakened by the sight and knowledge of divine truth, which makes the true spiritual revival.

The Church and the "Lost" College Student

By Richard Wallace Hogue

VISITING colleges is a strenuous and a stimulating job. It is also an illuminating experience. I am feeling all three of these effects this morning as I return from one of the largest, and in some ways most typical, of American universities. To bed at midnight, the alarm summons at daylight, breakfast shortly afterwards and now on the train with that fagged-out follow up period which is the intermittent legacy of the strenuous life. But there is a stimulus which stays with me. It comes from the very thing which robbed me of the earlier hours of a full night's rest. Following a meeting, I had resolved to retire immediately to my room in the fraternity house where I was a welcome guest among "brothers" who had never before heard of me. They were a jolly crowd and averaged well up in scholarship as well as in personal charm. This is important, I think, in its bearing on the subject in hand.

STARK REALITY

For the first few minutes it was sheer contact with radiant youth, under the compulsion of an unfeigned hospitality, that kept me from my room and in that of two of the students, with others coming in and out. Very soon it was something different—quite different. The subject that held us—literally held us—was not athletics, fraternity life or any of the varied college interests generally supposed to be the absorbing themes of college students in America. Just how we got into the absorbing subject I don't know. One thing I do know—the visiting "brother" did not force it. Somehow, we didn't get into the subject—it got out of us. Most of it got out of the students with all the unconfined force of a long-dammed stream bursting forth. At first it seeped stealthily through crevices kept almost closed by the walls of self-repression composed partly of the respect of courteous consideration for my feelings. But when I bade them "go on," they went on, and I tell you it was good. There was all the stark reality of what shallow religionists would call their "lost faith." There was the passion, and at times the pathos, of orthodox religion's failure to satisfy their ardent and primal questions. There was the tragedy of idealism unanswered and unused by the forces which had given them their first lessons in life's great ideals. There were honest indictments, terrible in the severity of utter sincerity. And all the time I kept saying to myself, "How fine this is!"—for the lasting realities were there—idealism, sincerity, honesty.

God! how the church needs these today, honesty perhaps above all, in the staid conventionality of those who shape its strict regularities, produce its official pronouncements, regulate its confined activities, proclaim its frantic conformity to the prevailing philosophy of "safety first," and preserve its confining formulas for the truth-searching spirit. There are of course exceptions to this indictment, glorious exceptions in outstanding individuals and hopeful movements. But if we are honest, can we doubt the general and tragic truth of the charge as applied to the organized churches as a whole? How else have they lost these young men, and countless others like them, all sprung from ancestries of loyal church people?

STUDENT AND CHURCH

"Do you know how many of the forty fellows in this house go to church, not regularly, but ever? Just three. When I first came to the university I went to one as long as I could stand it. Then I tried two others. Then I quit—not because I wanted to and not because of what I read in text books or heard in lecture rooms. It was because of what I didn't hear—didn't get—in the preaching, and the life, of the churches. When I was working for the government in the war I found a preacher who had a real message—who was real himself—seemed to understand life here and now—wasn't afraid to apply the truth to the real problems of today. There was no atmosphere of artificial piety about him, no prophesying of the smooth things which would keep him from being unpopular, or uncomfortable. I went to that church, though it was not my denomination. Why don't they put men like that here and in other universities?" That from one student.

And this from another. "I haven't been to church in four years." (He was a senior.) "I believe in living the right sort of life for yourself and towards others. Tell me, what do they mean when they ask 'Are you saved?' I don't get it."

In the morning I had been at the service of one of the churches and found twenty men students out of a five thousand student body. Much larger numbers attended two of the other churches—but what type were they and how many seniors were among them? I felt that the answer came in part from the mottoes, methods, songs and "social stunts" of which I saw symbols and samples in the church with the largest student membership. They were pathetic, truly pathetic.

And are these "lost students" idealists, even while at the grind and in the absorbing activities? Thrusting itself in the midst of this grind and these activities comes the Student Friendship Fund. Its appeal is second-hand, and from far-off lands. It is from foreign nations in the hour of America's greatest revulsion from "foreign entanglements." A large measure of the need comes from lands against which American students were in arms, the outward symbol of the more impenetrable armor of propaganda. A large measure comes from communist Russia.

I was present last night when the appeal was presented, very simply and very briefly, to a typical and representative group who were asked to present it to others. First they gave their own answer—an average of nearly ten dollars apiece. While there a message was received from a nearby university that the 3000 students approached in one day had pledged $8,000. Far and away above the money stood out the sacrifices to be made to pay these and similar pledges in other colleges—this and the instant response to the note of high idealism and of sheer human service. Here are several hundred of them going without five meals a week and meeting at the hour of the accustomed meal to learn more of the struggles and needs of the students of Europe. Is there nothing here of the translation into living reality of words all too long held in detached dogma by the official church—"incarnation" and "vicarious suffering?" Here is a girl student giving the entire cost of a new dress, the need of which has vanished from her vision of far-off girl students who have had no new dress material since 1914. When remonstrated with by a friend for denying himself an overcoat, another makes this reply:

"I can run to and from my classes, while those fellows over there haven't enough food to give them the strength to run."

And so it goes, from giving up movies and dances to denying themselves things hitherto regarded as necessities.

"These conditions are intolerable and must be changed! These men are our brothers and we must stand by them! They must be helped to save themselves and their countries and to make a better world than the one which has been made for them and for us."

STUDENT RESPONSIVENESS

These words of theirs might well be directed toward other causes and conditions nearer home. And to whom more than to the responsible leaders of the church comes the challenge so to direct them? How can the church win them back, with all their capacity for idealism, their eagerness to sacrifice for a cause they believe in and their equipped potentialities for service? This is not the question for chief concern or main interest on the part of the professing interpreters of the religion of Jesus Christ. It smacks too much of the philosophy of self-interest and the policy of "safety first" through which the strongest of them have been lost to the churches. The question is rather how the church shall serve them and through them establish the ignored ethics and the repudiated ideals of Jesus in the realms of business practice, industrial relations, political policies and international affairs. Only ten per cent of the children of America go through High School. Aside from its fatal effect on the permanence of a democracy, this fact constitutes a colossal responsibility for this fortunate minority. What of the challenge to the church and the answer of its leaders to that challenge? As Benjamin Kidd says: "The most important element in this, namely the idealisms of mind and spirit conveyed to the young of each generation under the influence of the social passion, is absolutely limitless in its effect. The power which is represented thereby is capable of creating a new world in the life-time of a generation."

And are our church leaders—the majority of them—among those whom this same author directly addresses? "Oh, you blind leaders who seek to convert the world by labored disputations! Step out of the way or the world must fling you aside. Give us the young and we will create a new mind and a new earth in a single generation."

Mary

LORD Jesu hung upon a tree.
Even the dead came out to see:
So sad it was and yet so rare
To see Lord Jesu dying there.
*"How can I bear to lose Him so!
Cried Mary in a voice of Wo.*

Lord Jesu waited on a hill.
The little stars stood very still.
With angel-wings the cloud was white
That took Lord Jesu out of sight.
*"How can I bear to have Him go!"
Wept Mary on the hill below.*

It did not make her sorrow less
To know he died mankind to bless;
Nor would her tender grief abate
To see Him pass thro Heaven's gate.
*Ah, Mary, fond and true,
Lord Christ was still a babe to you!*

The Winds of March

MY soul is swept with the winds of March,
Gone is all mood of mirth:
The shivering sunbeams coldly creep
Down to the wind-racked earth.

But over the strings of my soul's mute harp,
Through the limbs of the trembling larch
There sounds a strain of hope and of spring,
In the wind-blown month of March.

The Woes that are Austria's!

IT will not be forgotten that the explosion which set off the powder train laid by European diplomacy took place in Austria. Increasing revealments from the hitherto secret archives of European chancellories indicate that the old Russian bureaucrats were equally guilty with the Austrian bureaucrats in creating the immediate friction that fired the imperialistic mines. Both regimes are now in the discard and will remain there for all time to come. The guilty individuals will live in comparative physical comfort for the rest of their lives and doubtless suffer no pangs of conscience. Each is no doubt blaming the others for weakness and mistakes, but they will hardly repent of their folly or admit that their big game was wrong. Meanwhile a great host of the common people of these lands and other lands died for their leaders' sins, millions suffer today in bitter poverty, and their children's children until the fourth generation will groan under the burden of taxation to pay for the big game.

Theoretically Austria suffers her just dues for lighting the flame that almost burned up the world. But there is no Austria apart from the millions of men, women and children who toiled, each in his own small place, knowing little and with power to effect less in the world of diplomacy, so it comes about that these millions pay with the bread of bitterness after bearing the yoke of autocracy. Austria is left economically like the torso of a living thing with arms and legs severed—alive but without power to move or to find food. Vienna was the capital, both politically and economically, of a confederation of states, and held a place as the vital center of their life. These states were sheared away from Austria and having gained their independence gave vent to all the resentments a forced confederation breeds and an autocratic over-lordship irritates. The result is that the new states have reared embargos as walls against the old country and dammed up the old lines of communication, leaving Vienna isolated from her natural and historic sources of supply—a brilliant, luxurious city of splendor, threatened with extinction like that which befell the centers of civilization in the old imperial world. Nothing it would seem can save her except as our complex and more humane civilization dictates for her a better fate, for its own sake on the one hand and for humanity's sake on the other.

Why Austria Starves

I had several interviews last summer with a very keen young Austrian doctor of philosophy and also with an able Czecho-Slovakian professor who knows Vienna and Balkan affairs as only specialists can know them. The young doctor is the son of a wealthy Viennese oil producer and himself a complete convert to democracy and the social gospel. The professor is a personal friend of President Masaryck and was on the commission at Versailles and the commission appointed for the settlement of the national land problem at home. They are both broad minded, liberal and above the petty partisanship that have made Balkan affairs the despair of Europe. The story here given is their story so far as events had transpired up to last August, and the rest of it is based upon my own close following of events in that hapless land in the light of the insight they gave me.

Vienna is Austria today in a manner and to a degree Paris never was France. One-third of the population live in that city normally and the poverty of the rural regions has driven almost one-half of them into that center, not in hope but in despair, looking for a daily wage. Before the war Vienna got her food from far and near, eggs from Galicia, butter and coal from Bohemia, vegetables from Hungary, and pork from Serbia. Since the war the new national borders cut the lines of economic communication and Vienna starves while Serbian farmers cannot sell their pork at a profit. The potato crop was short last season and while other food products were up to the average in the rural sections of Austria the farmers found little profit in their business and inclined to take care of themselves. Before the war Austria produced only a fraction of her coal supply and has been able since to increase it to only one-fourth her needs. Her textile factories are able to procure raw material for only one-tenth the normal manufacture and her people suffer from a dearth of clothing. They need a half million tons of flour and grew only 90,000 tons. Freight rates are so high that transport is economically almost impossible and the railroads pay only about one-third the cost of operation at that. A large leather trade is reduced to one-third normal and the only industries that average up to pre-war production are paper pulp from large forest preserves and certain luxury products that have thriven until now through foreigners coming in to buy on the advantages offered by a grossly depreciated exchange.

What Inflated and Depreciated Currency Means

Tragic Austria illustrates the meaning of an inflated and a consequently depreciated currency. Without credit or raw materials, and with the ruin of war all about her, Austria had no recourse but to start the printing presses. Now paper money without a valuable metal to give it worth on demand is simply another method of issuing notes of obligation payable in the future. As demands increase the volume is increased, the value goes down in inverse ratio, and the rate of exchange becomes more and more adverse. The result is that Austria has a national debt today of 667,745,000,000 kronen. In normal times a krone was a little over 20 cents in American money; it requires today 625 kronen to buy 20 cents in our money. It actually costs more at this writing to manufacture the small one and two krone notes than they are worth after they are made.

Here are some of the results. The railway deficit of some billions last year was 38 per cent of it due to losses on exchange in buying material for repairs from abroad. The wages of the 90,000 employes absorbed less than one-third the cost of operation. Wages have increased 100 times but the cost of living 500 times. The cost of living went up 24 per cent in the first two weeks of this year. Captain Richardson of the Hoover relief committee says that 5 per cent of the people live in comfort, if not luxury, while 95 per cent live in penury, many of them with neither sufficient clothing nor food to keep physical misery away. Except for the various relief funds thousands would have perished this winter. A human touch will make the terrible story more vivid. A great professor whose reputation reached into many lands before the war received a salary of $7,500. Today he gets ten times as many kronen but is in utter poverty. His three daughters have quit school to earn a pittance each, and his son, with deep embarrassment, took $10 from an American for some translations, but said it was more than a month's income for the family. He slips out at night to sell family heirlooms. The great specialist himself has bought no clothes since the war began. His last suit has been turned three times, his shirts are made of bed linen and the family food is lentils, carrots and cabbage. Only yesterday Vienna was the world's greatest center for medical education!

What Is the Remedy?

"If Austria had got credits nine months earlier the great reduction in the value of the Austrian money would have been stopped," writes an able Viennese. In vain has the government pleaded against the sentence of economic death pronounced upon her by the inaction of the great powers. Britain sent Sir Wm. Goode to collect the indemnities and he returned to plead for credits instead. He was dismissed and the whole matter turned over to a league of nations committee. More time was lost while it was getting into action. It recommended a twenty year moratorium and the extension of a loan. All the powers excepting Italy and America agreed, and Italy proposed to follow our lead. Austria owes us $24,000,000 for wheat sent to keep her people from starving. She asks not for cancellation of the debt but for time to provide for those who yet face starvation. Our government has withheld action and thus, because of Italy's waiting upon us, prevented action by the allies. Meanwhile the clouds of paper money have settled down upon the land to suffocate it, the issuing of bank notes increasing in the year 1921 by 154 billion.

British business has been brought by the pinch of depleted orders to see the reign of economic law through eyes that were blinded yesterday by war enmities. England is willing to wait for payment or even to cancel debts and to extend a loan of some $11,000,000 immediately to start trade. However it is simply a case of resorting to the pulmotor, for the boom in trade that was created by foreigners rushing in for bargains made possible by the falling exchange, is over. And now unemployment is increasing, despair is in the eyes of the masses who are saying ominously that "something must be done." There have been food riots and there is feverish haste to arrange heavy cover guards for all shop windows in Vienna.

Czecho-Slovakia is acting in a manner that should guide others in their attitudes. She has made a treaty that recognizes the difference between her ancient enemy and oppressor and the neighboring people who have adopted a republic. It is known as the "Treaty of Lany." In its territorial lines are guaranteed, arbitration is provided for all disputes, the propaganda of enmity is stopped and arrangements are made to stimulate trade. The Czechs will loan Austria 500 million Czech kronen, worth 200 times the value of Austrian kronen, and the raw materials from Czecho-Slovakia will begin to flow across the border into Austrian factories as will also needed food supplies. Of course this sum will not go far, but if other nations that need Austrian trade will do likewise a very considerable help will be given.

The alternative to economic help is a new political arrangement. Natural considerations of race, geography and economics all argue for a union of the Austrian state with the German republic. Her reduced area would make her third in the German union of states. But French opposition makes that impossible. The alternative is one that lies in line with current French policy. It would divide Austria between Hungary, Serbia and Poland with perhaps a slice flung to Czecho-Slovakia as a pious gesture. This would satisfy the policy of a French hegemony for continental Europe. Of course an awakened Britain will not consent to that, so the program of economic rehabilitation is the only hope. Already it has been so long deferred as to make the heart sick with the possibilities of human suffering that is yet to be visited upon hapless people who made no war and desired no war, but who are the victims of a war made by their rulers.

British Table Talk

London, February 7, 1922.

THE sky is still overclouded. India is a source of grave concern; it is clear that we shall need all the courage and grace that can be won if we are to turn the situation to gain for India itself and the British commonwealth. The visit of the prince prompted by good-will and carried out with a fine temper cannot be without lasting good. But it seems that if we can speak of India as a whole, its worship and homage are reserved for Ghandi. There is a general agreement that this man is one of the noblest sons of India, but he is in danger of being used by others with more worldly aims. The idealist has always to be on his guard against his own followers; and in every movement there are politically minded men who are very willing to harness to their plans all the visions and inspirations of the dreamer. It was so in Sinn Fein. It was so in India, where it is openly claimed by the more violent that the success of Sinn Fein has sanctified the method of violence.

Economy

Everyone knows that in a state as in a household it is easier to talk of economy than to work it out in practical proposals. Everyone praises it and suggests that the others should carry it out. We are like the hearer in church who remarks, "It will do them good." In this country we are quite clear that we must retrench. The army? "No," cry the military, "we must not reduce there; better try the navy, or education, or post office." So today there is an agitation with big men involved to avert the dreadful fate of reduction in the army estimates. The favorite point of attack for the political strategist is education. That has the fewest friends, he thinks. In England we have not been so devoted to education as our Scots neighbors, and we only become excited about it when the problem of religion arises. But there are still friends of education who do not quite see why money should be saved for adventures in the near east at the expense of the coming generation. It seems a little mean that a generation which has made so great a muddle of the world and has squandered its resources shall make the children pay. We are like the father who, having spent his all in drink, in the morning raids his child's savings box.

Dr. Jowett

It will be already known to my readers that Dr. Jowett, who is a link between our two countries, has had at last to reduce his ministry at Westminster. As a plain matter of fact, the work of such a man involves an intolerable strain. It is fine that others with a mighty physique, such as Dr. Joseph Parker, could continue longer than Dr. Jowett under the pressure; but even Parker, giant as he was, could only do this by the exercise of peculiar care and by a rigid limitation of his energies. Dr. Jowett, who is not a strong man, has spent himself upon his preaching and must now adapt his ministry to his physical powers as they are today. But it is not improbable that his best work is still to be done under these limitations. How often did Lidden preach every year in St. Paul's? Certainly not many times; yet his voice moved London as few have done. The free churches will have to learn not to be greedy in their enjoyment of preachers. There is one preacher who jestingly remarked that if his hearers came to hear him twice on one day he felt insulted!

The Survival of the Unfit

Last week I paid a short visit, not by any means the first, to the farm colony at Wallingford, in Oxfordshire. It is a place that fills the despondent with hope. There the director, Mr. W. H. Hunt, and the "brothers" who work with him are seeking to train for service in the fields and in other ways men and youths for whom there seems no place in our order. They are sent there by boards of guardians who have come to trust the Christian Union and Social Service which has founded this and other places of a similar character. The colony has 176 inmates and about twenty "brothers." The "brothers" are men who desire to share in a piece of social service. They go out with squads of workers into the fields of thickets, where they plow and sow and hew wood, and learn how to manage horses and cattle. There are classes, too, in shoe mending; and in the evening provision for their further education and entertainment. The whole place has the atmosphere of a sure and practical Christianity. It is good to be there, and to remember that on the slopes of the Oxfordshire hills on the Icknield Way, the old Roman road, and near to the scenes where Hampden fell, there is this place of hope for those who seem useless to the world. The real Christian faith is not a belief in the survival of the fit but of the unfit. And the miracle of saving the waste products of our modern life has been wrought and is being wrought at Turner's Court, Wallingford. The director, a very able, calm and devoted man, sees his way to enlarge his work if the capital were given to him. He is one of those who are not ashamed to confess that they were disciples of that very great man, the late J. B. Paton, of Nottingham. He it was who more than any other taught us that a living faith in the gospel of Christ meant social service. Others like "Robert Elsmere" took to social service when their evangelical faith was threatened. Paton was always a great believer and a great saint and because he was an evangelical he was passionately devoted to social service. His son, Lewis Paton, the head of the Manchester grammar school, wrote some years ago the life of his father. It is a life worth knowing. If there was a man among the free churches who did for them what Ludlow and Maurice and Kingsley did in their day that man was Paton. And Wallingford is one of the places—there are many others—where although he is dead, he still speaks.

The Fellowship of the Mark of Pain

Dr. Schweitzer has begun his Dale lectures at Mansfield College. He has also published his book, "On the Edge of the Primeval Forest"—a book which must be read by all who care for missionary work. It is enough here to set up a sign directing my readers to this book which in a small compass contains much wisdom and romance. Think of a great theologian who has profoundly stirred every theological school in the world; remember that he is also a great organist, and a writer upon music who has written a standard life of Bach; and add to this the fact that he is a doctor of medicine; and then put him in the heart of equatorial Africa with his piano given him by the Bach Society of Paris! But I must deny myself the pleasure of telling how the music of Bach gained in meaning for the interpreter in the solitude of the African forest.

And So Forth

The church of England Assembly is discussing this week some big things such as the new lectionary and some lesser things such as the fees for marriages. . . . By the death of W. C. Braithwaite the Society of Friends and the Adult Schools have lost a devoted friend with great intellectual power and a gift of exposition most remarkable. Had he belonged to another religious society and entered the ministry he would have been honored among the great preachers. But his work was none the less—and perhaps even more—powerful where he was. . . . A letter in defense of the London Missionary Society has been signed by the leaders in the Congregational churches: it is most definite and whole-hearted in its language and should go far to counteract suspicions aroused by the attack of anonymous critics.

February 14, 1922.

THE Geddes report on economy is out; and by the great multitude who are unaffected by it save as they hope to have less income tax to pay, it has been favorably received. But there are many interests challenged, and it is not the way of interests to yield without a struggle. The prophecy that there would be cuts in the education estimates proves correct. Two recommendations touch directly upon matters of educational policy. These were outside the purview of Sir Eric's committee. To raise the school-age and the number of scholars in a class to fifty—these are not affairs to be settled by economists. It is clear that many children of the poor will have at least a year's grounding in the education of the streets. Between five and six they will be robbed of the public school which in nothing has been more successful than in dealing with such beginners. Much is known today of the cawing of a child's mind; the question whether a very important year should be lost to the teacher is not one of shillings and pence. To save a million or two in this way may be a gross waste. There is even less to be said for the proposal to give a teacher charge of fifty scholars. That spells mechanical methods; a lack of personal relations between the teacher and the scholar, who is also a person, and a general lowering of the educational standard. There is no room for doubt that we could save money on our education estimates, but not in these ways. It would be like us to allow five admirable financial authorities to dictate an educational policy! To imagine that a man who has run a railway can therefore direct education!

The Duster

Much attention has been given to "Painted Windows," a new book by The Gentleman with a Duster. It is clever journalism and that is no reproach. "No man is too good to be a journalist." But it has the defects of a rather superficial journalism which tries to set out its goods so that they may appear better than they really are. The art of doing well in examinations is according to the cynic to make the examiner think you know things when you don't. The author is immensely clever and witty and he plainly lives eagerly among the latest rumors and prescriptions of the hour. He has a quick eye for defects. He has, moreover, a standard of judgment which is not always named but is always present. He evidently dislikes all neo-Catholicism. He has the average Englishman's "imperfect sympathy" with the priest wherever he is found, and however good he may be. But in the studies which I am able to check I find him superficial, and suggestive more of the gossip of a club than of any first-hand knowledge. His own guidance for the times is neither new nor profound nor is it helpful. It is a bright idea which must have come to everyone who has given even five minutes thought to the gospel; so far as there is a measure of truth in it, it has been set forth again and again by such men as Dr. Cairns; but by men like that it is never supposed for a minute that we can solve the problem of the ages by any such simple formula. To interpret "faith" in the sense in which Jesus uses it, is a beginning. But to believe with Jesus leads further; if it had not lead further there would have been no such thing as Christianity, and no windows for the duster.

When this accomplished journalist sets out to generalize upon the character and estimate of the many thousands of clergy and ministers, there is only one answer possible: "This judgment depends upon our estimate of the man who makes it; and till we know with certainty by what authority he speaks there is no answer required. It is impossible to bring an indictment against a whole nation; but it seems fatally easy for a certain type of journalist to bring an indictment against a class of men. "It is the business of the papers to tell us what to do," Bishop Creighton said, "and it is our business not to do it." It is the role of the "Gentleman with a Duster" to tell us what to think about our pastors and teachers, but it is not our business simply for that reason to think it.

Religion in the Schools

The archbishop spoke last week with moderation and with a large charity upon the solution of our religious education problem; his speech was warmly received in the church assembly. The proposal now before the church means the surrender of "church" schools to the local authorities under certain conditions. Some will charge the church of England with an attempt to forestall the inevitable. Slowly the "church" schools are being crowded out. But that would be unjust. There is a strong and growing feeling that the time has come for all who believe in the Christian faith to secure that all children shall be taught in an effective way the great principles of their faith. It would be welcome news if the old contention could be ended once for all. The established church and the free churches could unite to provide for the new generation a genuine training for the service of the kingdom of God. The archbishop laid down three positions which will be generally approved." (1) That no education is worth the name of which religion is not the woof and warp; (2) that it shall be imparted by efficient and willing teachers; (3) that it should not be vague or washy, but a genuine grounding in the foundations of the Christian faith. This threefold basis had not been challenged. Details could be settled if the principles were accepted. The church has shown her readiness to accept some scheme, and laid down her basis of principle.

CORRESPONDENCE

A Creed, Plus

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In my humble, feminine opinion even the term "creed" is too liberal for the resolution adopted by the board of managers at St. Louis, as published in The Christian Century for February 23. A creed usually begins "I believe—" which makes it an expression of a personal attitude, and, while it is assumed that those affiliating with the ecclesiastical body behind it will accept it as the expression of their faith, it does not flagrantly announce a policy of compulsion toward other persons.

Having been a Protestant for only about one-third of my life, I was "fed up" on creeds and catechisms and it was the liberality of the Disciples in this respect which drew me to cast my lot with them. I have thought of the foreign field, but I should certainly be discouraged in going out under such autocratic conditions as those dictated by the board of managers, and I think other young people would feel with me.

This "statement of policy," or whatever its creators please to call it, speaks more loudly for its real nature than any defense which can be made of it. Indeed, I find it hard to believe that this resolution is of Disciple origin, especially in this age when Christianity is meeting with such real challenges. It is hair-splitting over non-essentials while vital problems wait. It is unchristian, and savors too much of the intolerance of medieval theology.

Baptism and Orders

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: As an Episcopal minister, holding that despised and effete thing called a creed, I have been much amused and delighted with your editorials anent "The Disciples' New Creed." Now, of course, you are entirely right in your contention, but not at all for the reasons you assign. You are right because you are protesting against a creed which contradicts the broad facts of Christian experience. Your missionary society is wrong, not in insisting on some definite basis of belief, but because that basis is narrower than the present enlightened Christian sentiment of your own membership. In other words you no longer hold that an outward and visible sign like immersion is identical with and absolutely causal of the new birth, or the inner baptism of the Holy Spirit. You are face to face with two horns of a dilemma. If adult immersion is the only valid baptism, then Roman Catholics, Greek Catholics, Episcopalians, Lutherans, Presbyterians, Methodists, Congregationalists, etc., constituting an overwhelming majority of the Christians, are without valid baptism. Yet the fact remains that, judged by the fruits of the spirit, they are producing a high type of Christian character, not to be distinguished from that of Disciples and Baptists in many instances. You must either assume, then, that these fellow-Christians have valid baptism, or that valid baptism is unnecessary to the development of Christian character. The only logical ground for you to take in face of such a dilemma is that while adult immersion is the usual New Testament form of baptism and therefore the one to be adhered to as a norm in your own practice, yet as the Holy Spirit has recognized other modes of baptism in Christian experience, you will not repudiate it in exceptional instances, nor deny fellowship with those conscientiously convinced of their point of view.

You know that the same dilemma confronts the Episcopal church in another form. We have contended that the ministry should come down in an unbroken line of apostolic succession by ordination of bishops and that only such ministers are valid and are authorized to consecrate the Lord's supper. But we are faced with the dilemma that we must concede a valid ministry and valid communion to our fellow Christians of other Protestant churches or admit that a valid ministry and valid communion are unnecessary to the development of a high type of Christian character. The only logical way is for us to assert the value of the historic norm for theoretical and practical purposes, but admit that other forms of ministry and communion are valid and have been recognized by the Holy Spirit, and that we will not deny fellowship with those who conscientiously differ with us. I may say that the liberal wing of the church is rapidly swinging to this point of view as a basis of church unity. And now for your contention that the Disciples are a creedless church. You deny this yourself for you quote them as saying, "Where the scriptures speak, we speak; and where the scriptures are silent, we are silent." Now this is to assert that the entire scriptures are the creed of the Disciples. They say that "human creeds are schismatic." They further say, "The binding of a human interpretation of the scripture upon the church was essentially a usurpation of the prerogative of scripture itself, and hence a froward and impertinent invasion of the realm of divine sovereignty."

Now what are the implications of such statements? That scripture is God-made and the creeds man-made. And yet no one is more convinced than you that such a distinction is essentially artificial and out of date. The entire scriptures are not God-made in the sense of being infallible. Infallible scriptures, infallible popes, infallible church, infallible creeds, all alike belong to yesterday and the collective Christian consciousness is left to select the fundamentals of its faith for today and for tomorrow. We who hold to the Nicene creed are immensely in advance of those who try to profess faith in the whole Old Testament as well as the New. Our task is comparatively simple. We reinterpret its sublime phrases in the light of the Christian consciousness of today but we have no infallibility doctrine of the Old Testament hanging like a millstone round our necks.

Sooner or later as the Christian consciousness realizes that faith in the scriptures cannot be inclusive but must be selective the need of such selection will become imperative for all churches alike. This makes a creed. You, yourself, always speak of Christ as authoritative leader. Some day you must answer the question, Why is Christ leader? What is Christ? The Christian consciousness cannot always remain chaotic, it must clarify itself, try to define truth and falsehood, good and evil. Thus our liberalism has been busy extracting the unsound timbers out of the temple of truth, but some day it must become constructive, build again in definite though comprehensive way the house of faith.

In Defense of The Board of Managers

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: A recent editorial in The Christian Century constitutes a ringing challenge to some one to enter a sturdy defense both for the board of managers and for the Disciples of Christ. The writer is not the chosen champion of either and willingly concedes that, had they been called upon to choose, they would have gone elsewhere.

The characterization of the Sweeney resolution as a "private, creedal statement" which was "officially adopted for the first time in Disciple history" is strikingly out of harmony with the teaching and practice of that communion for a hundred years. The unfortunate phrase, "as understood by the board of managers," was so fully exploited by The Christian Century as to completely obscure the more important one, "in harmony with the teachings of the New Testament," which is the true index to the intent and action of the board. Nor has the insinuation that this action involves any inconsistency with the time-honored shibboleth, "No creed but the Christ," any justification in the Disciples point of view. They have insisted for a century that they were led to practice immersion, a burial in water, for the precise reason that the acceptance of Christ as the sole creed of the church demands obedience to a specific act commanded by him in the great commission. They have affirmed this conviction times without number in their periodicals, missionary literature, conventions, and in individual statements made on multiplied occasions. As they have never accepted the "model" conception of baptism any Scripture which commands baptism would meet the demand of The Christian Century for chapter and verse to justify the Sweeney resolution. The board of managers must be acquitted of having done "something new in modern ecclesiastical history."

Perhaps the most amazing statement of the editorial is that the "water regenerationists have won an amazing victory." Granted that Dr. Spencer understood Rev. Wallace Tharp aright at the Louisville congress, which he may not have done, why should a set form of words that has been in honorable use throughout all Disciple history suddenly come to have a meaning, when used at St. Louis in the year of our Lord, 1922, which, in the words of The Christian Century, has been "so bitterly resented by the Disciples of earlier generations"? What indicates that the board of managers ascribe to immersion the "abstract efficacy" which has been denied by Disciples from Alexander Campbell down?

If there were not so many varieties of conscience accommodations leading to cooperative and organized usefulness would be easier to make. In this matter the conscience of the China missionaries, who at the present time insist that they have never practiced "open membership," is important, and that of the board of managers is entitled to some consideration. Neither the missionaries nor the board righteously can ignore the conscience of the people whose cooperation is the very life-blood of the missionary enterprise. To attempt to do so would be fantastical and quixotic. The necessity is to find a happy meeting point.

If there is anywhere among the Disciples a group that believes that "the game is not worth the candle," or, in other words, the advantages to be gained in the controversy are not worth disrupting their great missionary organizations and destroying the missions, the situation may contain unlooked for elements of hopefulness. We must assume that there exists in this great body of Christians who have contended so vigorously for Christian union a clear and accusing conscience on the subject of division and strife. The Christian Century declares that "it seems incredible that in the year of our Lord, 1922, four years after the great war, with a broken world in need of reconstruction, a large and intelligent Christian communion should be wrenched and torn over a question as thin and remote as this, etc., etc." If, in the mind of the editor, the question is thin and remote, he cannot espouse either side with a great enthusiasm. If contention over such an issue did not tend to ennui it would be impossible for him conscientiously to resist the will of the majority when he is well assured that such a course will produce a most hurtful and unseemly division. Great cause for gratification lies in the fact that the aggressive advocates of "open membership" are inclined to think very highly of the opinions of The Christian Century. It is very encouraging to think that, after all, these good men may consider the issue "thin and remote." They have come to look upon the subject of baptism from a viewpoint which they confess to be entirely new among the Disciples, and they have come, without in any manner interfering with the cordial relations which they sustain to the mass of their brethren, to the practice of what they acknowledge to be an "innovation." It must be confessed that the great missionary societies which constitute the United Society were formed before the "modal" conception of baptism had any vogue whatever among the Disciples. It is an inescapable fact that this conception has very little vogue at the present time. What an opportunity for magnanimity and true "liberality!" With what a generous and lofty spirit the "liberals" might say to the "conservatives": "We have exercised our full liberty in receiving the unimmersed into our own churches. We know that you would feel that you were not true to the New Testament if you were to do as we do. We confess to an entirely different viewpoint from which the matter seems to us to be, as applied to our cooperative work, a very unimportant matter. We will therefore respect your scruples and follow what the Disciples have understood to be the New Testament practice for a hundred years. Our conscience on the subject of Christian unity declares that it would be a great sin to destroy the actual unity which we have attained to secure a hypothetical unity that may never be realized."

The Christian Century has indulged in some very interesting speculation on "what the neighbors say." It is possible that neighbors who take the view that the issue is "thin and remote" may think the Disciples have traveled a long way to seek trouble. They may well speculate on which involves the greater inconsistency, for the Disciples to continue united in their great missionary program, following their ancient practices, even though they willingly and gladly admit that there are most splendid examples of Christian character and consecration among the unimmersed, or, to divide into hostile camps that will cripple and destroy their missions and drift further and further apart until their very existence is a stultification of every appeal that has ever been made for a united church. It may seem strangely anomalous, a bitterly ironical fact, that the thing by which this "large and intelligent Christian communion is wrenched and torn" is called "practicing Christian union!" These neighbors might be much better pleased, no doubt, to see the Disciples have a conscience on the subject that would lead them to "practice Christian union" among themselves!

Unitarian Membership

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue of Feb. 23, on page 248 and 249, you state that the Unitarians "who with a decline of 30,860 members during the past 6 years, number only 51,635 members." You doubtless copied the statistics put out by the Washington secretary of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. This, however, is not correct. Rev. Minot Simons of the department of church extension of the American Unitarian Association, under date of February 18 wrote me as follows: "On the basis used to figure our loss in 5 years, we have estimated a gain in constituency, as a matter of fact, of 21,421 or 25.9 per cent, making our present constituency 103,936."

Grant me the pleasure of reading a correction of these figures in an early issue, as I am a Unitarian and am mighty proud of the fact.

In Other Words: We Need a New Apocalyptic

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: When I say that The Christian Century is one of my most welcome visitors, and has been for more than two years, you may be willing to permit me to take issue with your recent editorial, "The New Eloquence." I do not object so much to what you say about Lincoln and Webster. Certainly the method of the latter would get nowhere today. But what I do object to is the implication that the style of oratory needed in our day is that without passion. Preachers ought to grow "mad" over such insidious and destructive efforts to undermine the teachings of Jesus as those of the "Fundamentalists," falsely so-called. There ought to be fire, passion, call it what you will, over the Pharisaism of today, as there was in the days of Jesus and John the Baptist. These mighty teachers were never more eloquent than when they scorched the hypocrites of their own day. We ought to face the facts, and one cannot do that without arousing within his own soul passions that will not down but that demand utterance, fiery utterance. One cannot stand in the presence of Niagara and not feel its tragic power. One cannot stand on the shore at Brigantine during a storm at sea, and not experience dismay. This sense of dismay ought to be felt by every preacher who stands in the presence of the ocean of sin, and who in the midst of this mighty battle is compelled to feel the bite of snapping dogs about his legs. The times call for union in the effort to make the teachings of Jesus actually apply in the life of the world, and instead, we have bickering and biting and snapping within the church itself. In another editorial you speak of the attempt of one Dr. Riley to control Eureka College. Can the honest lover of Jesus Christ stand still and allow our Christian colleges to be abandoned while ignorance in the cloak of piety does its utmost to ruin them? But after all perhaps you are right. One has to laugh at the antics of white mice.

The Wages of Sin—Downfall

TODAY we see the crash. Yesterday I saw a handsome motor smashed against a tree—it was the end of the joy-ride! We may play fast and loose but we pay at last—and the evil day may not be far removed. For years the tree has been rotting inside, at last only a little breeze brings the proud and beautiful monarch with its colored leaves crashing to the earth. Today the man dashes by in his limousine, tomorrow he sits in his cell in the Tombs. We are all in at the killing! The reporters drag the whole hideous story out into the light, they serve it steaming hot with the cereal at breakfast. For years the banker has been embezzling, has he? Well, here he is on the front page, first column. For years the big business man has been hiding his sin, suddenly the storm breaks and here he lies like a shattered tree—all the inner, hidden evil revealed. And if he is not found out by others he will tell the world himself: the student in that peerless story of Dostoyevski, "Crime and Punishment," stands up in court and shrieks his guilt. Hawthorne makes poor, pale Arthur Dimmesdale stand up before the town and confess his crime though it kills him. Shakespeare makes Lady Macbeth moan out her dismal, bloody secret. In the Passion Play Judas in a passion of remorse confesses the betrayal of his best friend and then rushes off to hang himself with the very girdle that held the guilty coins. If there is one lesson that we should thoroughly learn from all literature and experience it is that hidden sin will eventually bring open disaster. Let us take that big lesson to heart today. The joy-ride ends in the grand smash.

What is true of individuals is also true of nations. Israel, we saw in the last lesson, violated the fundamental laws of living. We beheld Israel degenerating in soft indulgence and rotting in moral fiber through social injustice variously expressed, now she falls. In humiliating captivity she goes into open disgrace. Egypt tells the same tale; Greece adds the weight of her testimony to the same truth. Fair and stately Greece—was there ever such a beautiful nation, such poetry, such heroes and heroines, such dramas, such philosophies, such architecture, such orations and rhetoric—but by inner moral decay fair Greece came to her sad ending. Rome—every school-boy knows the story—Rome came to laugh at morality and to degenerate in lazy ease; then came the terrible pagans from the north. Surely, the wages of sin is death while the free gift of God is eternal life. Obedience to the fundamental laws of white living and social righteousness spells certain life.

Keen historians see in modern civilization the seeds of death. We seem to learn little from history; the reason why history repeats itself is because people are fools. If we are heedless of the faults of ancient nations we cannot hope to improve upon them. If the story in the morning paper does not cause you to cut short your hidden sin, you too must add one more sorry example of failure to the long, long list. If the story of Egypt, Persia, Greece, Rome, Russia and Germany makes no impression upon your mind, the noble United States will sometime follow in the tracks of former failures. Macauley saw the broken arches of London bridge and predicted the downfall of the British empire unless she learned from all that had gone before.

Splendidly our country cast off human slavery and overthrew the liquor business; bravely the churches today are demanding industrial justice and social purity. The American home must be strengthened if our civilization is to exist. It is a shame to compare with Japan in the number of divorces. Deep on the walls of every court must be carved the ten commandments if our country is to avoid the way of all the earth. The function of the church is like that of the prophet of Israel to call men back to the paths of righteousness. There must be no timidity in that voice; only God must be consulted for the message. The church must be the flaming torch to illumine the darkness of selfishness; the church must be the salt to arrest the decay of indulgence. As we love our country we must support and encourage the church of Christ. We must not blind our eyes to our faults and our serious sins. Injustice must be pilloried; the flashing rapier of truth must be thrust through all indecency; the white-hot iron of righteous scorn must cauterize all corruption. At the last supper the disciples asked "Is it I, is it I?" and well we may examine out individual lives and the moral standards of our nation. "The wages of sin is death."

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Dr. Jowett Resigns

The resignation of Dr. Jowett from the pastorate of Westminster chapel in London is an event of international importance. He was preaching in America during the war to great throngs when he was urged by the king and the prime minister of England to return to his native land, an unusual honor. Since his return to London he has faced conditions in religious work in England which have broken his health, and some say his heart. At the time of his recent resignation he told his board of church officers that he did not think it would be necessary to give up preaching altogether, but that it would be necessary to find a work less taxing to his strength. Dr. Jowett had a leave of absence last year of six months.

Southern Conservatism Unitarian Opportunity

The Unitarian Ministers of Boston at a recent meeting considered the subject of extending the Unitarian message into the southland. Already one preacher is under appointment, formerly a Paulist father of the Roman Catholic church. The Unitarians argue that they flourish best where orthodoxy is most conservative. In view of the campaign of many orthodox church members of the South against the study of modern science in the public schools by other than medieval methods, it is quite as clear that the Unitarian reasoning is sound. It may be safely predicted that many strong Unitarian churches will be organized in the South in the next few years.

Preparing for Peace in Time of Peace

It is far easier in these days when no acute international situation occupies the public mind to discuss the underlying philosophy of peace. The World Alliance for Friendship through the churches is making hay while the sun shines. A national demonstration will be made at a congress at Cleveland, May 16-18. Widely varying interests will be brought together to discuss the question of making sure the peace of the world. These interests are relief, labor, agriculture, economics, education, religion and politics. Among the speakers already secured are Henry Morgenthau, Frank A. Vanderlip, Rev. William P. Merrill, Mr. Sherwood Eddy, President William P. Faunce, Dr. Frederick Norwood and Dr. Lynn Harold Hough. Additional speakers are being secured and it is planned to make the program an outstanding event of the ecclesiastical year.

Election of the Pope by Modern Methods

That the Roman Catholic church really does change is indicated by the fact that it is now less than twenty years since the present method of electing a pope was soundly established. For a long time before 1904, the temporal sovereigns of certain outstanding Catholic countries had the right to veto, and through their cardinals sometimes influenced an election. Previous to 1059 the election of the pope was largely in the hands of the clergy of Rome, indicating that the pope was in earlier days just the bishop of Rome and elected by quite the same process as bishops in any other diocese of the world. These facts, minus the interpretation may be secured from any standard Catholic reference work. The election of the pope recently was very interesting to the various Catholic temporal powers of the world, but there is no intimation of direct influence upon the election.

Protestants Growth Twice That of the Catholics

A careful study made by the journal, Current History, indicates that the Protestants of America are growing twice as rapidly as the Catholics which is contrary to the ordinary impression. In the period from 1906 to 1916 covered by the government statistics, the Roman Catholics increased from 14,210,755 to 15,721,815, an increase of 10.6 per cent. In the same period the Protestants increased from 20,025,014 to 25,025,990 or 23.4 per cent. In the Catholic figures include all baptized babies and nominal members, however slight the connection. In the Protestant figures only those old enough to join the church on their own initiative are included. Roman Catholic leaders are restless in the face of the statistics and they realize that they have a great leakage. They hold that the most outstanding cause for loss of members is to be found in intermarriage. Probably most Protestants feel

A New Batch of Church Statistics

The Federal Council has recently issued its annual statistics of the churches of America. Many interesting facts are given, and primary among these is the fact that the sectarianism of America goes on unblushingly. The Lutherans have probably gone farther than any other denomination in bringing some sort of unity to their denominational household. Seventeen bodies now cooperate with the National Council, and five bodies with the Synodical Conference. There are seventeen different kinds of Baptists, though fourteen of the Baptist bodies have only 266,042 members as compared with the millions to be found in the three leading Baptist denominations. Of the Methodists there are seventeen varieties, but the vast majority of white Methodists are to be found in the Methodist Episcopal church and the Methodist Episcopal church, South. Some small bodies are greatly divided. The Adventists have a total strength of 136,233, but they have five denominations. The Dunkards have almost exactly the same size, and they, too, have five denominations. The Mennonites with a constituency of 91,282 have sixteen denominations. The United Brethren are now the divided brethren, for they have two bodies. A study of the statistics would seem to indicate that the more theologically conservative a denomination is, the more subject is it to division.

As one classifies the denominations into ritualistic, evangelical and liberal communions, one is at once struck with the vast preponderance of the evangelical movement in America. The growth of the Roman Catholic church aside from the immigration areas has been negligible. One finds in the two leading liberal denominations a total of only a little over a hundred thousand members. Unitarians complain of the figures and insist on the inclusion of their associate members, but even if such figures be included, the liberal church membership in this country is only a tiny fraction of the total. The Federal Council estimates the evangelical constituencies as three-fourths of the total religious group in this country.

The raising and spending of money is a gauge of church influence that is perhaps quite as significant as the counting of membership. Such figures measure devotion and activity. The Methodist Episcopal church reports eighty-five millions last year over against the seventy-five millions of the Roman Catholic church. The denominations follow in this order: Presbyterian in U. S. A., $47,036,442; Southern Baptist, $34,881,032; Protestant Episcopal, $34,872,221; Southern Methodist, $33,859,832; National Council Lutheran, $23,048,701; Northern Baptist, $21,926,143; Congregational, $21,233,412; Disciples, $11,165,391. To the total income for religious work in this country for all bodies is put at $448,424,084, a very impressive figure, for it represents an average of five dollars per inhabitant of the country—men, women and children.

If the Federal Council figures are correct, they give quite a great deal of reassurance as to the essential soundness of the churches of America. A growth of four million in church membership in five years indicates a healthy normal increase. It is rather surprising to find that the Sunday-school enrollment is only half that of the church enrollment. However, the Sunday-schools have made about the same rate of growth as have the churches. The Disciples of Christ are unique in the fact that their Sunday-school enrollment is almost equal to their church membership. This doubtless is due to the Sunday-school promotion work which has been done in the communion.

Were this vast host of religious people included in the evangelical bodies cooperating adequately under common leadership, the effect of such cooperation on the nation would be untold.

that intermarriage makes more Catholics than it takes away from the church. The opposition to fraternal orders is a great source of leakage which is now partly stemmed by the organization of Catholic orders. Undoubtedly the advance of scientific education in the public schools is detrimental. It is interesting to note that the Catholic church is growing only in those states in which there is a considerable immigration.

Churches All Get Together in Lenten Services

Five churches of North Adams, Mass., have gotten together in a Lenten program this year. They are the Baptist, Congregational, Episcopal, Methodist and Universalist. On March 5 the ministers in all these churches will have the same sermon theme, "The Christian's Mission." In the evening of that day the churches will unite in a service at the Episcopal church with the Methodist minister preaching. The Lenten plans include cottage prayermeetings, and many other of the familiar evangelical practices. For three weeks before Easter the churches will cooperate in union evangelistic efforts. The significance of this combination is to be found in the fact that churches not usually regarded as evangelical should join in a thoroughly evangelical effort.

Controversy and the Growth of the Churches

That there seems to be a definite relationship between theological peace and the growth of the churches is pretty clearly indicated by the figures. In the southern Baptist church where Baptists are uniformly conservative, the growth in five years has been 19.9 per cent while among the northern Baptists where controversy rages over the premillennial issue, the loss in the same period has been 19.9 per cent. The Disciples were once listed among the most rapidly growing of all the American communions. In five years past during which time a group of conservatives have been vigorously fighting the organized work they have grown only 3.9 per cent while the northern Methodists show a growth of 18.1 per cent. The Methodists in that period have grown steadily more liberal in theology, publishing through their denominational house many books thoroughly progressive in their theology. They have had no serious divisions. The Episcopalians, whose theological variations are more serious than in almost any other American communion have suffered a loss in this period of 1.3 per cent.

Makes Big Claims for the Christian College

President E. M. Waits of Texas Christian University has been studying the "Who's Who" book and has come to some startling conclusions with regard to the significance of the Christian college. He says: "Eight of the nine chief justices were college men, seven out of eight were from Christian colleges. Eighteen of the 27 presidents were college graduates; 16 were from Christian colleges. Eighteen out of 26 leading masters of American letters were college men; seventeen were from Christian colleges. Of the members of congress whose achievements or prominence secured them a place in 'Who's Who in America' two-thirds were graduates of Christian colleges."

Methodist Ministers Want Doctrinal Test Abolished

Methodist ministers in New England commonly want the doctrinal test for membership in the Methodist church abolished. The matter has been before General Conference, and once received a majority committee report, but was turned down by the conference. The subject was debated at the Boston Methodist Ministers' meeting on February 27. Those favoring the removal of the doctrinal test were Revs. Webster H. Powell and F. D. Taylor. On the other side were Revs. C. H. Shackelford and J. W. Stephen. The debate made a lively session for the ministers.

Religious Press Publishes Attack on Arthur Nash

No layman in recent times has had so wide a hearing as Arthur Nash with his address on the Golden Rule in Industry. His message was received with enthusiasm in some of the greatest churches of the land and before the recent sessions of the Federal Council of Churches. Now comes an attack on his industrial methods by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America. They assert that Mr. Nash is "fighting unionism with his own methods of high-sounding religious talk." The union further asserts that the workers' control of the factory is not genuine for the bosses "force the workers to sign almost any petition that may be presented by the management. The charges mentioned above have been published in the Western Christian Advocate, a Methodist paper of Cincinnati.

Does Not Require the Five Point Unitarianism

Even the Unitarians are becoming broad in their terms of membership these days. In the old days the five points of Unitarianism were opposed to the five points of Calvinism. Rev. Lyman V. Rutledge in an evangelistic sermon for the All Souls church of Braintree, Mass., recently said: "The membership of the Unitarian church is made up not of people who act and think alike, but of people who seek honestly for more truth and greater opportunities of service. It cannot be too strongly emphasized that a Unitarian church accepts a Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian or Catholic without requiring him to renounce his creed. The right hand of fellowship is given on one plain condition, that a man be true to the faith that is in him."

Buddhists Want a League of Religions

The dream of achieving the peace of the world through a league of churches has challenged the imagination of men in various parts of the world. As originally projected it would be a Christian league. Now comes a proposal that it shall be a league of religions. The Japanese Buddhist leaders have expressed themselves in favor of such an arrangement. The editor of the Eastern Buddhist says: "The world is now ready for the plainest and loudest announcement that we can make of all our religions that they are one or at least united in demanding peace on earth and glory in heaven. And by peace we mean the prevalence of justice, fair deal and humaneness all over the world not only among individuals, but among nations and by glory we mean the triumphant march of spirit over matter, of light over darkness, of love over selfishness."

How Church Statistics are Gathered

It is at this time of year that church statistics are issued from the office of Dr. Henry K. Carroll, a Methodist minister, who has been working at this task since 1890. In addition to the statistical labors of Mr. Carroll, the government census bureau gathers statistics of the churches and the Federal Council of Churches has recently made this task one

Baptists Organize for the Cities

THE Baptist denomination seems to have some special genius in dealing with the immigrant problem in the great cities and the story of Baptist city mission work is a very interesting one. While the city mission work of all denominations is in a state of experimentation, the Baptists have shown courage and originality in trying out new methods.

In Chicago the denomination is supporting four Christian centers where a settlement house work is carried on in whole or in part. Eight Baptist churches among immigrant peoples doing work in a foreign language, are receiving support from the society and nine missions. Besides these organizations the Baptists have a number of foreign speaking churches which are now self-supporting entirely, particularly among the Scandinavian populations. The English speaking peoples are not neglected, and work is supported in twelve churches and nine missions where English is the language spoken.

The tremendous growth of Detroit in recent years, by reason of the automobile and other industries, has been one of the outstanding facts of urban development of America. There are more Poles in Detroit than there is total population in any other city in Michigan. This city of a million souls has 200,000 Protestant church members, which is indeed a better showing than Chicago can make, but is not as good as it should be. Six hundred thousand people are outside the church Catholic or Protestant. The Baptists of Detroit have spent $600,000 during four years in securing locations and in erecting new buildings. Four new buildings will be erected during 1922. Among these will be the Polish Christian Center.

San Francisco has long been regarded as the most difficult church city for religious work on the continent. While one person in five in Detroit is a Protestant church member, the proportion in San Francisco is one in twenty-eight. The Baptists up to the present time have established five English-speaking churches and two Chinese churches. There is in addition a Swedish, a Russian, a German and a Negro church. In seven months the increase in Baptist membership in San Francisco has been very nearly twenty per cent, which indicates the virility of the churches.

Pittsburgh Baptists long since felt the challenge of the industrial situation in their city. They now have ten foreign-speaking churches and missions in that city. They have a Christian Center among the Negroes, and Rankin Christian Center for whites is now being launched. Pittsburgh Baptists have seen the advisability of approaching the problem of evangelizing the city from an educational standpoint and they now have a director of religious education who serves the whole city. The denomination in this city takes pride in joining with other communions in the practice of Christian comity in the location of new work.

In Denver the home mission challenge is found in a group of Mexicans who have been found to be particularly susceptible to Christian teaching. There are seven thousand of these people. In a recent evangelistic effort 38 people professed conversion to the Baptist faith. The Denver Union is paying the salary of the Mexican pastor, and is supplementing the salaries of some of the English-speaking men.

In Buffalo a mission to the Hebrews is conducted by the various cooperating denominations who trust to the Baptists the holding of the property and the administration of the activities. This work among the Hebrews is led by Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Machlin, who are the missionaries in charge.

In Cleveland one of the big facts is the invasion of 35,000 Negroes from the south. These have organized 35 Baptist churches. Only 12 of these churches have been recognized yet, for Negro Baptist churches do not always have proper leadership and right standards. Among the new churches organized is a Hungarian church and a Czecho-Slovak church. In St. Louis the Baptists have assumed entire charge of the evangelization of the Italians of the city under direction of the comity committee of the federation. There are sixty Negro Baptist churches in St. Louis, but these are separately organized.

Because the Baptist church has not been so definitely Anglo-Saxon in its origins, it has found its way into the hearts of some communities where "English" methods of approach are not congenial.

The Belief in God and Immortality

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology in Bryn Mawr College; author of "A Psychological Study of Religion."

This book consists of three parts. The first is a scholarly investigation of the origins of the idea of immortality. It embodies an important contribution to our knowledge of that subject. Parts II and III are those of chief interest to the general public. Part II consists of statistics of belief in personal immortality and in a God with whom one may hold personal relations. For the first time we are in possession of reliable statistics valid for large groups of influential persons. The figures are in many respects startling, in particular those revealing that, in all the groups investigated, the proportions of believers are much smaller among the more distinguished than among the less distinguished members. The author seems justified in his opinion that the cause of the present religious crisis cannot be remedied by the devices usually put forward, for it has a much deeper cause than those usually discussed. Part III treats of the Present Utility of the Belief in God and in Immortality.

"A book which every clergyman, as well as every one interested in the psychology of religion and in the future of religion, should read and ponder. For Professor Leuba has made a contribution to our knowledge of religious belief that is of very considerable significance."—Prof. James B. Pratt, in the American Journal of Theology.

of its functions. This will help to explain why there is so much diversity in the statistics offered to the public. Many church organizations have very loose methods of gathering the figures which they present to the statistician, with the result that certain haziness is always characteristic of the figures. Nevertheless it is possible to arrive at some generalizations with regard to the religious situation in America. The Brooklyn Eagle in editorial comment recently called attention to the large number of people in America who are either members of the church or adherents. This number is estimated at 96,000,000 out of a total population of 105,000,000. While there are many in the metropolitan centers who have forsaken the altar for the golf course and the open road, still the vast majority of Americans still respect the churches, and this majority is today greater than it was a year ago and considerably greater than it was six years ago.

New Party Organizes in Baptist Denomination

A new group organization within the Baptist church seems in the process of formation, according to the official journal of the denominations. The Fundamentalists are already well known for their insistence on literalistic interpretations and for their interest in premillennialism, but the new party will use the word Evangelical to describe itself. This group insists upon its faith in Jesus Christ, but rejects the doctrinal pronouncements put out by the other group. With two organized groups in the field, the northern Baptists should have such a liberal education in theology that there would be no lack of intelligence about the issues.

Church Stays by Its Downtown Problem

Among the churches that have boldly remained in a downtown district is the Judson Memorial Baptist church of New York City. It is in the heart of the Italian colony, and it is said that 120,000 Italians live in the back yard of the church. Among the institutional features of the church is the Judson Health Center and the Judson Neighborhood house. In the latter is a nursery where children are cared for at ten cents a day while their mothers go out to work.

Bishop Gailor Still Against Volstead Act

The Sunday Evening Club of Chicago brings to its platform religious men of a wide variety of religious conviction. Recently Bishop Gailor of the Protestant Episcopal church, who is acting presiding bishop, spoke with strong reference to the prohibition laws of the United States. The bishop is violently opposed to these laws. His argument proceeds from the theoretical point of view of a personal liberty philosophy instead of from the point of view of the social effects of prohibition, as in a recent issue of the Survey magazine. A number of distillers and brewers were members of the bishop's church in days gone by. His point of view does not fully represent the Episcopal church, however, as many loyal temperance people may be found in this communion.

America Will Lead in Catholic Mission Work

Long since America has led the world in Protestant mission work. The contributions in this country are three times those of England, the nearest competitor. Now comes news that the pope has taken the leadership of Catholic missions from the French and given it to the Americans. The war crippled the mission work done by Catholics from France, Germany and Italy so the Vatican must look to America for finance. The Catholic church has a missionary training school at Techny, a suburb of Chicago, and in other ways are profiting by Protestant methods.

Episcopalian Rector Has Church on Wheels

In Kentucky a priest of the Protestant Episcopal church has built a home on a forty-horse-power truck in which he lives. He moves from town to town, administers the sacrament to Episcopalians, baptizes the children and gathers the facts about Episcopalian constituency in the town. The priest sleeps and eats in his traveling house and church. The method of work will be closely watched by the representatives of certain other sects who see in the traveling church a fresh opportunity of service.

Notes and Comments

THIS is an age of propaganda, when many people expect and desire that the magazines and newspapers they read shall have a strong bias toward their own opinions, without much reference to truth or fact. Among these people, The Yale Review cannot hope to find its public, nor has it. Its appeal has been, and will be, to that great body of independent men and women who wish to know the facts and who like to see a free play of intelligence over all the questions of the day, whether in public affairs, science, literature or art. To this group The Yale Review appeals, and strongly. The Yale Review is at the forefront of the intelligent periodicals of the times. It is a quarterly bringing with it just that leisure which good reading demands, as well as the authority which longer preparation of articles insures.

IT DOES NOT forget the things of the Spirit, but gives a large place in its quarterly contents to essays and poetry that are of permanent worth and striking literary charm.

Reverend Dr. John Kelman, of New York, says: "The Yale Review has made a unique place for itself among the journals of America and it stands for a type of culture which will more and more prove itself to be one of the highest and most valuable influences in American life."

The price of The Yale Review is $4.00 a year. Published: January--April--July--October

FOUR NEW BOOKS

The Approach to the New Testament

By PROF. JAMES MOFFATT,
Author of "The New Testament:
A New Translation," Etc.

"There are factors in the intellectual, religious and social world which involve a new estimate of the New Testament. Advances have been made in literary and historical criticism and methods of research. We are learning how to approach this great literature from the proper angle and thus to see it in its true perspective. My instructions were, not to offer any results of research such as might appeal only to experts, but to lay before the educated public an outline of the present position of the New Testament in the light of modern criticism—some brief statement of the general situation created by historical criticism which should also bring out the positive value of the New Testament literature for the world of today as a source of guidance in social reconstruction, so that readers might be enabled to recover or retain a sense of its lasting significance for personal faith and social ideals."—The Author.

Price $3.00, plus 12 cents postage.

The Universality of Christ

By WILLIAM TEMPLE,
Bishop of Manchester.

"Dr. Temple is not only a theologian and a philosopher who already ranks, but also an explosive personality afire with love of the church and the people. He escapes all classification. If he is a theorist, he has also proved that he has an amazing capacity for affairs. His latest book, a small one of great significance, consists of four lectures delivered to the recent Christian Student Conference. The notes of the book are simplicity and a certain originality in presentment. It is written with lucidity and force. It may be commended as an excellent and very sincere piece of apologetic, which minds, young minds especially, perplexed and harassed in regard to fundamentals, may peruse with great benefit."—The Guardian.

"These lectures were framed with a view to suggesting answers to problems specially prominent in the minds of Christian students at this time."—The Author.

Price $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

The Divine Initiative

By PROFESSOR H. R. MACKINTOSH,
Author of "Immortality and the Future."

The lectures in this book when delivered in London made so deep an impression that the Student Christian Movement published them in book form that they might have a wider hearing. Dr. Mackintosh has here set forth the reasons for Christian faith in a fresh and trenchant way. His book is a notable addition to present-day apologetics. It will rekindle hope in many an address and sermon which its reading will inspire.

Price $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

The Nature and Purpose of a Christian Society

By T. R. GLOVER, { Author of "The Jesus of History," "Jesus in the Experience of Men," "The Pilgrim," Etc.

Through some strange oversight this remarkable contribution to the discussion of the character and nature of the Christian church has not heretofore been published in America. It is in its third edition in England and should find a large audience in the United States, where the author's "The Jesus of History" and "Jesus in the Experience of Men" have been so widely read.

Price $1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

For the Playwrights of Tomorrow — A Professional Course in

PLAY WRITING

under the personal supervision of Theodore Ballou Hinckley, Editor of THE DRAMA (formerly of the University of Chicago), assisted by the famous playwrights, critics, actors and producers, is offered to a limited number of ambitious people. This is an unusual opportunity to take a personalized course in play writing, which is carefully supervised by recognized authorities in drama.

Personalized Critics of Your Plays

Your work will receive the individual attention of Mr. Hinckley. His criticisms will not be generalizations, but will be directed at your specific needs. He will dissect your plot, your characters, and your dialogue, and give you definite, constructive criticism and help.

The course covers from six months to a year, depending upon the speed of your work. You may decide that for yourself. Several busy professional people are doing the work in their spare time.

Throughout the entire course, the aim is toward completion of plays for professional production and not toward mere amateurish effort. You will be taken step by step through study courses, books, practice plays, criticisms, etc., from the simplest rudiments up to the actual completion of plays.

Producers Will Read Your Plays

If your manuscript has the endorsement of THE DRAMA, it will receive a reading by managers. Your plays will be analyzed by Mr. Hinckley with the idea of production in mind, and plays of real merit will be brought to the attention of producers.

Good Plays Earn Big Royalties

Many successful plays have made their authors rich. Lightnin', The Bat, The Lion and the Mouse and many others have earned many thousands of dollars. The income from The Bat is said to be more than $6,000 a week. If you have ideas and imagination, the practical dramatic technique and honest and competent criticism of this course should enable you to write a successful play.

You will be taught how the public taste in plays changes, both as to subject matter and its development. Through his broad study and experience, Mr. Hinckley knows what to stress and what to avoid. He can train you to sense the changing demands of the managers and the public.

The Theatre as a Pulpit

As a reader of The Christian Century, a magazine of ideas, it is probable that you have a reason for writing plays, which you consider of even more importance than fame or money—the wish to bring the truth about life effectively to the consciousness of many people. Correct dramatic technique is more essential to the thoughtful play than to those of a lighter variety, for there must be no trace of didacticism or preaching. Your play must present your opinions in such an attractive and skillful manner that the audience will be held spellbound by its dramatic power, and absorb your ideas without effort. The course in play writing will teach you how to reach people effectively and forcefully.

Limited Enrollment

Only a limited number of people can enroll, since the work is so highly personalized.

Fill out the coupon and mail it for complete information at once. The low cost of enrollment, together with the details of the instructions, will please you. You will see how different this is from ordinary courses. Ensure your place in the class.

The Good Samaritan Is Tired

CLEANING up the roadway between Jerusalem and Jericho would save the good samaritan a lot of work and worry. Just now the good samaritan is tired. Many travelers have fallen among thieves and been left wounded and bleeding and half dead. Dr. Voris, cabling back from Armenia, tells the story of fresh massacres in unhappy Armenia. He finds thousands of skeletons from last autumn's onslaught. Women and young girls were herded into a valley, violated and murdered, a few of the handsome young women being reserved for a worse fate in the harems of Turkey. Orphan children are wandering about the land near to death from starvation and the orphanages established by Christian charity are full to overflowing. Meanwhile the Turk is rehabilitating himself politically. The French have withdrawn from their responsibility in the Turkish empire. Britain feels the delicacy of her position as the ruler of so many millions of Mohammedans. America has persistently refused to accept any responsibility at all. Greece has been making a military demonstration against Turkey and has occupied Smyrna, but she will have to withdraw unless she gains some measure of European support. The Turkish empire has been greatly reduced in area by the world war, but the very places where Turkish rule is the most obnoxious are the places where the Turk is today in undisputed control. We cannot do otherwise than continue to play our part as good samaritan to the starving children of Armenia, but how much better would it be if the Christian nations would issue a joint notice to the Turkish empire that every additional violation of Armenian rights should be punished. The navies of the world have always been defended by people believing in armaments as necessary on account of the actions of backward races. Yet curiously enough the most glaring abuse of a backward nation committed within a century has never brought so much as even a naval demonstration.

Will the Next Generation Be Religious?

JUVENILE delinquency has increased in the United States thirty-five per cent since the war. Present-day conditions have at last attracted the attention of men and women who are by no means sensationalists or alarmists. Superintendent Mortenson of the public school system of Chicago has been widely quoted on this matter. He holds that the movies, the modern forms of the dance, the styles in dress and jazz music are responsible for the lower standards among young people. The Chicago Evening Post in an editorial recently indicted the parenthood of the city for the increase of moral laxity in youth. This journal said: "Adult example is teaching the boyhood of today (and girlhood as well) that law need only be respected when convenient, and by those who are unfortunate enough to find no safe way of evasion. That is the fault of men and women who lack the character to put a right restraint upon themselves; who lack the honor to play fair with their country and their fellows." A deeper diagnosis is that which finds in the inadequate training of our youth in religion and morals the explanation of much juvenile delinquency. Everything that belongs to human life must be made a part of education. Certainly religion cannot be left to one side as an instinct which will care for itself. It is just as necessary to teach a child righteousness and the fear of God as it is to teach the three r's. In many sections of the country there is recognition of this fundamental need, and week day schools of religious instruction are doing a noteworthy work in supplementing the disciplines of the public schools. A survey of all such community work will be made in connection with the meeting of the Religious Education Association in Chicago the last week in March. Those who are interested in the building of a better civilization will hardly find in the United States this whole year a more important meeting than this will be.

The Churches And World Peace

IF the United States senate should refuse to ratify the treaties adopted by the Washington conference, the military party in Japan would find its own attitude justified. On the other hand if the United States votes to accept a limitation of battleship building which manifestly forbids any aggressive policy in Asia, the liberal party in Japan will have its hand strengthened and it will doubtless come into a dominant position in the politics of the empire. In this great emergency the religious leaders of all America, Catholic, Protestant and Jewish, have issued a joint manifesto in behalf of ratification. A campaign is starting which ought to spread all over the land. If the senate goes wrong in this matter, it will devolve upon us to get a new senate as soon as it is constitutionally possible to get one, for no political clique can withstand the united voice of the religious conscience in this land. In Boston a mass meeting of citizens has already been held. Other cities will follow as soon as the need becomes clear to them. We have had enough of war. We all know what we think of the war party that wrecked Germany. But a war party that would make the United States hated as Germany once was could not long hold the reigns of power in this country. Occasionally religious idealism fastens upon a great issue and pushes that issue through to success. The hour has come to make our peace talk effective in a practical measure.

St. Louis Churches Know Their Task

ST. LOUIS churches are now better prepared to attack their problems than is any similar group of churches in the entire country. The committee on social and religious surveys of New York City has just completed a survey of St. Louis which gives the religious leaders of that city facts rather than guesses. The survey will be published in book form, and is announced to appear in May from the Doran presses. Advance sheets indicate that St. Louis has in some ways an easier task than some other cities. For instance, it is shown that only 13 per cent of its people are foreign born. That is much lower than the percentage in most cities of similar size. The balance between Protestant and Catholic forces is almost evenly maintained, with 39 per cent of Catholics and 36 per cent of Protestants. One fifth of the entire city enrolls itself as indifferent to the churches. The figures on the equipment of the ministry are distinctly encouraging. Of 94 pastors, 83 had at least a college education, 67 had seminary training in addition, and 17 did graduate work in addition to the seminary training. The denominational statistics show the Methodist churches growing, and the Congregational churches declining. Eight out of every ten Protestants go to a Methodist, Lutheran Evangelical, Presbyterian or a Baptist church. Episcopalians, Disciples and Congregationalists have relatively smaller representation in the city than in the country as a whole. It is rather astonishing to learn that 59 per cent of the Sunday school enrolment is outside of the church. Certainly not so large a percentage as this is below the age where church membership is to be encouraged. It is also astonishing to learn that in St. Louis five members are gained annually for every member who is retained permanently. The study of church retreat is very informing, and will doubtless result in a stiffening up of the city mission program in holding the downtown sections of the city for organized religion.

Japan Pays Tribute To Sunday

AS the people of the orient come into contact with western civilization they are particularly attracted to the institution of the Christian Sunday. Japan has recently legalized the observance of Sunday. This does not at all mean that Japan is becoming Christian. It is merely a recognition that the sabbath was made for man. Meanwhile movie promoters and the sporting element of America are trying to take the Christian rest day away from this country. Only the most persistent efforts backed by a secretary and an organization have prevented serious lapses in our American legal changes during the past year. In the long run the Christian rest day must prevail, for the law of God is written not alone on tablets of stone, but in the muscles and nerves of tired humanity. Nor will we always tolerate the idea that a rest day is legalized for the sole purpose of making rich a few people who have built up powerful organizations for the promotion of commercialized recreation. The day must be used for the highest good of man. That means rest from daily toil for the largest number of people possible. It means a renewal of the sacred ties of the family life. It may legitimately mean such recreation as the individual chooses for himself, provided this recreation does not clash with the rights of others. It ought in all souls to mean supremely a day for spiritual uplift and culture. Japan has as yet seen Sunday only as a day of rest. She has yet to discover still other and higher possibilities in this great institution. And we can hardly expect her to make the full discovery so long as thousands of our own citizens are still far more pagan than Christian in their treatment of this good gift of divine providence.

Stop Debauching China!

PARTICULARLY pernicious is the practice of those nations who contribute to the moral downfall of China at a time when she is politically disorganized and unable to protect herself. The sale of narcotics to the Chinese is a scandal of a century standing. Great Britain has realized the iniquity of her opium wars, and now restricts the amount of the drug that may be shipped in from India. Japan is now taking most of the profit of the drug trade in China, though in recent years America has participated largely in that shame. Congress is now considering the Jones-Miller bill which would limit the American exportation of narcotics. During the recent conference in Washington the American leaders were urged to bring up the subject of the traffic in narcotics but the Japanese were facing so many demands from the western nations that it was not deemed prudent to add another. Nevertheless it is certain that one day Japan will be brought to book before the nations of the world if she does not herself see the wisdom of discontinuing this evil trade. But there is no use in crowding Japan on the matter until we have cleaned house in our own land. This is a subject on which the churches should speak out insistently. The nation expects the leadership of the churches, and nothing could be so disappointing to good friends of the church as silence in the presence of an iniquitous drug traffic.

A Creed by Some Other Name

A MORE uncandid procedure could hardly be imagined than that by which the creed-making movement within certain denominations undertakes to justify itself to a constituency trained to believe that creeds as authoritative formulas of opinion are contrary to the mind of Christ. The expedient is simply to call the creed by some other name. In the Baptist denomination the fundamentalists are calling it a "confession of faith," or merely a "statement of the Baptist position." Among the Disciples it is disguised as an "administrative policy." It must be quite amusing to Presbyterians and Methodists whose "confession of faith" and "discipline" have long been the target of virulent polemics by Baptist and Disciple preachers to observe the twisting and turning by which certain prominent leaders in these "creedless" denominations now bring forth an apologetic for the precise thing they have always condemned in their neighbors. The strategy of the Baptist fundamentalists is referred to elsewhere in this issue. The Disciples creed was adopted by the board of managers of the United Christian Missionary Society, whose missionaries at home and abroad were pledged as being in "sincere accord" with it. Rev. Z. T. Sweeney, who introduced and advocated it in the board, writes to an Indianapolis paper declaring that "the greatest scientist in the United States aided by a 20,000 power magnifying glass will utterly fail to find a sentence, word or syllable in that resolution that can be construed into a hint of a creed." This of course sounds quite annihilating. But an editorial in The Christian Evangelist entitled "No Creed Was Made," is of the same sort. The reason why no creed was made, according to that editorial, was the fact that the members of the board of managers were Disciples and as such they could not make a creed! Other reasons similarly apriori were given. It seems not to have occurred to the editor, or to Mr. Sweeney, to show how the operation of this specific interpretation of scripture would differ from the operation of the Presbyterian creed or the Methodist discipline. As a matter of fact there is no difference in principle except that the adoption of a creed as an "administrative policy" is more drastic than the adoption of a creed as a profession of faith. The purpose of a creed is to unify opinion and standardize practice. It is a direct violation of the freedom of the individual soul for which both Baptists and Disciples have historically stood, and of congregational autonomy which has been one of the most basic convictions of the Disciples mind.

Ben Franklin and Religious Toleration

A FAVORITE amusement of Benjamin Franklin, the father of American journalism, was the writing of canards. One of his famous efforts was a fifty-first chapter of Genesis not found in the Christian Bible, but lately discovered. In this celebrated document, Abraham drives away from his tent men of other religions who would not join in Abraham's prayer of thanksgiving. God appeared to Abraham in a dream and pronounced a curse upon him for this inhospitable act, which led the patriarch to hunt up his disaffected guests and bring them back again to his tent to pray in their own fashion, and yet eat his bread. Probably every man has his pet religious aversion. Franklin often speaks petulantly of the Quakers, accusing them of inconsistency in their attitude toward war. Nevertheless it was his influence more than that of any other man in American history which wrote into the constitution of the United States our American principle of toleration in

So Many Joys

I HAVE so many joys. One joy of lovely sights
That down my days defile and dream along my nights;
My soul is like a room with mirrors all set round,
Where Beauty, once beheld, hath infinite rebound.

I have so many joys. One joy of movement free
That makes me sister to the winds and to the sea.
Oh, verily, my hand hath pleasure all its own;
My feet that press the turf distinct delight have known!

I have so many joys. One joy of hearts that speak—
That, ere a word can pass, will tell me what I seek;
Such joy there is in being loved; but vaster joy
In loving. These twain joys there's nothing can destroy.

I have so many joys. In yielding homage one.
Such glorious creatures God hath made beneath the sun!
For some of these, and their white faith, and deeds sublime,
'Twas given me to meet as on toward God we climb.

I have so many joys. One, memory linked with hope;
For, even as those stars struck out in heaven's cope,
Are shining, still, these thousand years upon the earth,
So, all the loves I've lost, still shine upon my hearth.

I have so many joys. One joy of loneliness,
And one, unnamed, that bears me whither none may guess.
Nay, not myself. For out of self afar I wing;
And only know, returning, I my joys must sing.

EDITH M. THOMAS.

matters religious. However, our fundamental law is still far ahead of our common attitude. We have a horrid brood of religious hatreds. Men in the name of a dogma disfellowship brethren of a lifetime. Logical consistency makes one man bar out of the kingdom of God all of the unimmersed, and another man excommunicate all those who "do not recognize right government in the church." Ben Franklin in his early teens was an infidel. He was made an infidel by reading theological treatises in a print shop. Later in life he insisted on congress being opened with prayer. Life's experience had in part undone the mischief wrought by the dogmatic theologians. Shame to all men who in the name of the Christian's God of love teach hatred and cultivate intolerance and narrow down their fellowship to those alone who pronounce their shibboleths.

The Baptist Perturbation

THE BAPTIST denomination is wrenched more seriously, perhaps, than any other communion by the theological controversy that has broken out with unprecedented virulence since the war. The Congregational and Presbyterian communions are considerably perturbed and the Disciples even more bitterly torn than they, while Methodists and Episcopalians are, up to this date, keeping the controversy in the bounds of fairly good order. But among Baptists the movement of reaction has taken on a more self-conscious and confident air. This may be due, superficially, to a single fact, easily overlooked. There is no free organ of liberal opinion left in the denomination through which the leaders of progressive thought may express themselves. Since the Northern Baptist Convention absorbed all save one of the independent journals published by the denomination and merged them in a new periodical, The Baptist, the field for free expression of opinion has been left entirely to the ably edited Watchman-Examiner which, with shrewd journalistic sense, has adopted a policy of ultra conservatism and hostility to the leadership that has hitherto had the respectful confidence of the rank and file. The Baptist, meanwhile, representing the official mind of the denomination and burdened with the responsibility of keeping the treasury full and the missionaries' salaries paid, has had to inhibit that free and full discussion which formerly was carried on in the Standard, its immediate predecessor. The result is pathetic. A great denomination of more than a million and a quarter is suffocating intellectually for the lack of an open, generous and independent consideration of the issues that have arisen.

There has been no adequate discussion of the creed adopted in connection with the acceptance of a big gift of money last summer by the convention at Des Moines. Dr. Shailer Mathews gave vigorous expression to his sense of the unbaptistic character of that action in a non-church periodical, and was gravely censured for washing denominational linen in other than the Baptist's own back yard. The reason was, however, that there were no facilities in the Baptist back yard for doing this particular bit of washing and men like Dean Mathews had to take their washing to the neighbors. As the situation now stands it looks as if the so-called "fundamentalist" wing of the church is in a fair way to capture the denominational organization at the annual meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention to be held in Indianapolis next June. This is a gloomy prophecy, but unless some wide-circulating medium of free discussion is found in which progressive and modern opinion may have an equal chance with the strident expressions of the fundamentalists one runs no risk in making it. The effect of the capture of the convention by the forces of reaction will surely be the adoption of a creed which will bind the denomination for years to come, if indeed it does not effectually split the body in two.

To understand the present situation and the issues implicit in it, it is necessary to consider several outstanding events in the recent history of the northern convention. In 1919 and 1920 the millennial doctrine began to find pronounced utterance in certain prominent Baptist pulpits, and with it there came to self consciousness the whole body of conservative doctrine known now as fundamentalism. A good many of the advocates of these doctrines came to feel that they were not getting the prominent recognition to which they were entitled in denominational positions, and on convention programs. They felt, moreover, that there was no likelihood of securing such recognition so long as the denomination's tasks and emphases were determined by men of modern feeling and interest. Accordingly a hundred and fifty-six of them issued a call to a pre-convention conference in Buffalo, June, 1920. Heading the list was the name of Dr. J. C. Massee of Brooklyn. It is generally known that the movement has back of it a moving spirit less evident, and in some ways shrewder than he, yet it certainly has few his equal in popular gifts. He has been the president of its two pre-convention conferences—the second being held in Des Moines last June. We are on safe ground, therefore, in viewing this conservative theological movement as it is represented by Dr. Massee.

A premillennialist, who believes that the Bible is not simply inspired but "inerrant," and that the universal fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man are "pernicious doctrines," Dr. Massee contends that "doctrinal cohesion" is essential for denominational cooperation. In order, as he puts it, "to take the hands of our theological, philosophic, and scientific monkeys off the tail of our denominational convictions" he is a fervid advocate of the adoption of a confession of faith in the so-called "fundamentals." After a divisive appeal by a Toronto preacher (who soon afterwards split his church almost in half) the second pre-convention conference did adopt such a confession.

Dr. Massee's aggressive and persistent effort since has been to agitate for its adoption by the convention itself, and thus to make it "the official declaration of faith" of northern Baptists. Avowedly to this end, and "to determine the policies and personnel of the next convention," he has sent out far and wide at least three letters. Appended to the first, six other names followed his own. In the second letter he wrote: "Baptist seminaries should expel from their faculty every teacher who has in any wise departed from the historic Baptist faith. Baptists cannot tolerate a scientific attitude towards the Bible."

When asked by Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin what would be involved in the adoption of the proposed confession Dr. Massee at first replied that he had not thought it through. Later, however, he acknowledged that he would have it used as a basis for church membership, for missionary appointments, and for the relation of individual churches to the convention. In this connection it is interesting to recall that in his opening address at the second pre-convention conference he said: "Baptists have ever refused to subscribe to a formal and an authoritative creed. But Baptists have persisted through the centuries in setting forth confessions. . . And they have been in the past a basis for fellowship between the churches as between members in the churches. . . . If the time is not now, it must soon come when by formal action we shall determine a basis of fellowship in faith and in service for our Baptist churches." How this would differ materially from "a formal and an authoritative creed" to which "Baptists have ever refused to subscribe" many of his hearers failed then to see and Dr. Massee did not stop to explain. With his statement concerning historic Baptist confessions, it is interesting to compare that of Dr. Howard Osgood, his equal in orthodoxy and his superior in scholarship, as Dr. Massee would not be unwilling to admit. "Confessions of faith," wrote that great Baptist scholar, "have never been held as tests of orthodoxy, as of any authority or binding force."

Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin prominently represents a denominational group that, to distinguish themselves both from the fundamentalists and the liberals, have adopted the name of "evangelicals." In view of the theological issue that has been raised they believe that the time has come for the convention to give the world a "statement" of the historic position of Baptists, but one "not to be used by the convention in any personal or denominational relationships." In keeping with this is the published conclusion of a recent conference of two score Baptist leaders in and about Philadelphia. They felt that such a "statement" was devoutly to be wished. But they declared in italics that it should be looked upon "only as explanatory" and "never to be used as a norm or official standard of orthodoxy." They expressed their approval of the action, four months ago, of a group of leading Baptists from both the north and the south. In considering, among other things, the question of a Baptist confession, Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, president of the northern convention, and Dr. E. Y. Mullins, president of the southern convention, figured prominently in the discussion which resulted in a very significant resolution. In substance it was a request that the two conventions appoint a committee, half from each, to prepare "a statement of faith and polity briefly embodying the basic and fundamental principles and beliefs of Baptists."

From all this one does not need to be a prophet or the son of a prophet to make a somewhat confident guess. If not next June, probably in the near future, northern Baptists will adopt a doctrinal "statement," which may be called a "confession," but assuredly will not be called a "creed." The question, however, that many are anxiously asking is: Will it not after all be a creed? Without doubt it will be used as a safe shelter from behind which bigots may shoot at the growing numbers of liberal Baptists whose "scientific attitude" will be construed as a departure "from the historic Baptist faith."

It is to be regretted that the theological issue is so mixed up with the finances of the different agencies of the denomination. Those whose hands are on the helm of these agencies would put it the other way round. They deprecate the unfortunate way the financial situation is disturbed by injecting into it the theological issue. Great denominational debts are to be paid, to say nothing of completing the tremendous drive of the New World Movement. There is imperative need of heart-whole cooperation. It would mean a good deal for denominational finances if the fundamentalist committee would urge those it represents to cooperate heartily with the rest of the denomination at this acutely critical time. But from the standpoint of militant fundamentalism, this is a most opportune time to take the offensive and to strike hard. Denominational administrators, worrying away their health over the present straits, would be more than human if they were not tempted to gain financial cooperation by theological concessions. Back of certain decisions, admissions and concessions that Dr. Massee, in his second letter, refers to as "of hopeful portent just now" it is not hard to see the effect of the financial stress. The action of the convention last June in accepting the large gift with a creed attached was a case of letting more than the camel's nose under the tent.

There are exceptions, however, to this sinister policy. Some who are classed as conservative are above using in the interests of their theological program the whip that the present unprecedented financial need has put into their hands. One such has just written in The Baptist: "Brethren, for the sake of our honor, our denominational loyalty, our interest in the salvation of the world, and constrained by the love of Christ, let us lay aside any differences relative to doctrine, leadership or methods and let us finish this blessed task through one great united effort." His voice, however, does not represent the strategy of the leaders.

In his opening address in the first pre-convention conference Dr. Massee frankly said that the conference was "in the interest of the conservative interpretation" of the historic position and principles of the Baptists. It was called "to restate, reaffirm and reemphasize the fundamentals" of their New Testament faith. There manifestly was no thought of reconsidering whether, after all, the so-called fundamentals were true. Much emphasis has been given to loyalty to the historic position of Baptists. But practically no attention has been given to the question: What, in view of modern opportunities for increased light, should be the Baptist position now—even though it should differ from that of the past? One searches in vain in Dr. Massee's two conference addresses and his three subsequent letters for any suggestion about fundamentalists having doctrinal conferences with those of contrary views. Their views are simply not worth consideration. So he would have them summarily dismissed from Baptist offices, professorships and even church membership. Enough that they do not hold to what he believes was the historic position of the Baptists. Like Diana of the Ephesians, great is the historic position of the Baptists! The two pre-convention conferences over which he presided, more especially the second one, primarily were conferences against rather than with those who differed or were thought to differ from the fundamentalists. Instead of encouraging discussion as to just what is the truth about the doctrines at issue, the method of fundamentalists is to create disturbance against those who differ from them. Fundamentalists, somehow, seem to be shy about confronting, with arguments, the so-called liberals. Recognizing that "the vast majority" of Baptists still hold to the "historic position," their propaganda against these liberals is through demagogic appeals for loyalty to the faith of the fathers. They are seeking by mere force of numbers to impose their "fundamentals" upon the denomination, without really facing the fundamental: Are these doctrines true?

It is true that Dr. Woelfkin's evangelicals, also, are not raising the issue as to whether or not the so-called fundamentals are true. The case, however, is very different with them because they do not want any theological issue at all. Their desire now to have a new statement of the historic Baptist position is mainly due to the fact that they see in such a statement a way out of the present muddle. Nor are the liberals likely to ask the convention to face the question as to the truth of any or all the articles in the proposed confessions. Probably an important reason for this is that, in the limited time of the convention, there would be danger of demagogism proving too much for argument before a popular audience, too likely to be influenced by the type of platform forensics of which the conservatives are by general acknowledgment the masters.

There are other reasons why liberals, evangelicals and fundamentalists are not giving due attention to the most fundamental question: What is the truth about these matters now in debate? One is the characteristic unwillingness of the men of scientific culture to engage in public debate. It is a fact, at once lamentable and admirable, that the men of scholarship throughout all the churches, when controversy arises, yield the platform to their critics while they sit in the audience as spectators. No call has yet been issued by Baptists, Presbyterians or Disciples or any other denomination for a pre-convention conference of men representing the modern as against the merely traditional spirit. It is doubtful that this course of silence and dignity is well chosen. Scholarship will not be hurt by the dust and scar of conflict. The whole fundamentalist set of doctrines must be met with a challenge that is backed up by a willingness to debate the issues on their merits. And if Baptists cannot provide themselves a journalistic organ in which the discussion may go on in calmness and dignity, there is nothing better left than the rough and tumble tussle before a public assemblage.

It is hoped that before the denomination is tied up in a creedal sack by the fundamentalists at Indianapolis next June, the men of modern, scholarly mind will decide to contest such a destiny in the only way that seems open to them.

The Manager of the Mill

A Parable of Safed the Sage

ONCE upon a time, when I was moving about the country, and musing up the map in several locations, I left the train, and hired a Mule and rode up a Creek many miles. And I came upon a little Settlement whose most important industry was a Stave Mill. And the Mill bore a Sign, saying, Standard Oil Company.

And I met the Manager of that Mill. And I have rarely met so mighty a man, or at least a man so conscious of his Might. And he produced for me the Reports of the Standard Oil Company, of which he was the local and visible head, and told me of the greatness thereof. And he told me about his own management of the Company, and of the way in which John D. had grown to rely upon his judgment.

And he told me of what John D. said unto him the last time he met him at the Galt House in Louisville, and how John D. spake to the intent that he was now getting on in years, and looked chiefly to the Manager of this Stave Mill to keep the Company off the rocks, and hold up its Dividends.

And all the folk that lived about the Mill and earned their bread by riving out stave-bolts and by the sawing and shipping of staves to make barrels for Standard Oil heard the speech of the Manager, and considered how great a man he was. And they thought that John D. was in comparison a man of little account, and a Back Number at that.

But it came to pass upon a time that I met John D. And we sat together at the table, where I ate a good dinner and he ate Graham Crackers and milk. And he spake very quietly and compassed his spirit with meekness. And as we spake together, I mentioned the Stave Mill and its Manager. And I learned that John D. had never learned that the Standard Oil Company had a mill on that particular Creek.

But John D. was a mild man in comparison to the Manager of that mill.

Thus did I learn what I had suspected all the time, that the Manager had never seen or known John D., whom he talked about as if John D. had been his bosom friend and junior partner.

But this have I often found, that small men in places of petty power grow arrogant and boastful. But I have known great men in high places who have been humble.

Can the Church Function with a Social Gospel?

By Paul Jones

THE traditional symbols of the four evangelists are the Ox, the Man, the Lion, the Eagle—all of them indicative of elements of nobility in addition to their special significance. If one were seeking a symbol of the modern church there would be a temptation to suggest the ostrich as the most appropriate emblem. The futility of the way in which the church so generally seeks to evade the impact of the social problem by hiding its head in the sands of pre- and post-millennial speculation or questions of organization and extension is a strong reminder of the reputed habits of that bird. There is little value, however, in adding to the accumulation of criticism which has been heaped upon the church. Among those who are deeply concerned for its welfare, there is a sufficient realization of its failure adequately to meet the pressing needs of our day. The call is rather for a searching examination of the conditions of the situation it faces.

INDIVIDUAL CHURCHMEN

Can the church function as a dispenser of the social gospel? That is the way the question comes today. Time was when such a question would have been repudiated as an insult. It would have been suggested that it was only a question as to how best the church could apply the gospel to social relations, not whether it could. We have now, however, a growing number of men such as Seeborn Rowntree of England, Harold Hatch of the Dutchers Bleachery of Kappingers Falls and John J. Eagan of Atlanta, who as manufacturers and Christians are endeavoring to apply Jesus' principles as they see them in industrial relations. The church may justly take credit for the inspiration which started them on the job, but it must be noted that it is not the church which is applying the principles: such individuals are doing it. There are also various fellowships and groups of Christian people who are working for the application of these principles to the whole industrial problem or specific aspects of it, and while there is no doubt as to the sources of their inspiration, they are not the church itself.

Even definite church groups engaged in the undertaking are very often merely tolerated. A person connected with a certain social service federation, when asked if the church was not back of the organization, replied, "Yes, quite far back." To these must be added the far greater number of people who as investigators, managers, administrators, members of radical unions, like the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, the Industrial Workers of the World and socialists in general are working for the application in social and industrial relations, of principles which much more nearly conform to those of the gospel than the ones at present in operation, although such people would in general repudiate any Christian motive in their endeavors, or any connection with the church. In other words, so far as the social gospel is being applied today it is not the church which is functioning in that direction. Let us ask the question in entire frankness then: Can the church do it?

We have long since gotten away from the idea that charity, in the sense of work done for others in what is usually a patronizing spirit, through our various welfare institutions, valuable as it may be, has any close relationship to the social gospel. In the church, people are only beginning to see the significance of that change by which the industrial life of the country has advanced from a condition of individual relationships to one of group relationships, groups of workers on the one hand and groups of owners on the other. In a first effort to meet this situation, the church has conceived of the social gospel as a by-product of the religious life; that when men are "saved" they should express the fact in social relations, bringing the Christ spirit into them. In reality it is the other way around. In losing themselves in the effort to express the principles of Jesus in all the relations of life men find that release which is the essence of salvation. Self-preservation may be the first law of nature, but it is no law at all of the Christian gospel. The church has, in general, sought to preserve and extend its influence and power, and may now be looking for a chance to exploit the new interest in social problems to its own advantage. To the extent that it does so, it is bound to fail, for the social gospel suggests that it must be ready to lose itself for the establishment of the kingdom of God.

ALTERATION IN TECHNIQUE

The term "brotherhood" which is the keynote of the social gospel means teamwork at the bottom of things; so that whether it is a matter of industrial, racial, or international problems, the call is for an actual entering into group relationships not working upon them as if they were cases for treatment from the outside. We have thought of individuals doing that, and many have with the greatest possible abandon given themselves in such Christlike work. The question now is whether, if the church is the representative of Christ on earth, the embodiment of his spirit, or in the classical phrase the extension of the incarnation, it can as a body give itself in like manner and so live the gospel in these human relationships.

Certain handicaps to such an expression of social Christianity hinder the church of today. It has been dealing with, and its machinery is largely equipped to deal with, individuals for the purpose of their salvation. A complete alteration in technique affecting theological training, parochial methods and working of the general boards, will be required if that very different social expression is to be secured. The church's present system tends to lead up to worship as an end in itself rather than as a center of power for expression in the wider field of group relations. The energy of the church today is largely self-centered and preservative. In the Episcopal church, and probably in the others in somewhat similar proportion about 90 per cent of the financial contributions go to keeping up the parochial plant and work and 10 per cent to missionary work. The former item ministers almost entirely to the comfort, satisfaction, prestige and development of the local congregation and even the latter is given largely from the motive of keeping up the prestige of the local church and the desire to have the denomination go forward in its work. It is self-centered, rather than outgoing in its emphasis. The church, too, has become tied up with certain conventional group points of view which represent a distinctly unsocial attitude toward international, industrial and race relations. It has accommodated itself to the nationalistic spirit of each country it is in, it has with the growth of property and endowments and the need of large financial banking for its undertakings, accepted the viewpoint of the vested interests of the world and it acquiesces in the racial prejudice of the group it belongs to.

It will take a tremendous wrench to enable the church to overcome these obstacles to full social expression. It will need to develop a great corporate conviction of sin; but as yet it is hardly conscious even of the fundamentally unsocial aspect of its extremely nationalistic emphasis in the late war.

ELEMENTS OF HOPE

But suppose we turn to the other side of the picture and inquire what elements of hope there are in the situation. The church certainly has certain assets which give promise of value in the expression of the social gospel. It has something of a grasp of the essential principles of the gospel, although it has only partially applied them. Its basis is sound. It has a real moral earnestness, too often applied however to matters of personal conduct which are trivial in comparison with the great social problems. It has developed a capacity for self-sacrifice in individuals which is an earnest of the power that might be released by corporate sacrifice. It has, too, a growing body of ministers who feel keenly the impact of the great human problems and who are endeavoring, single-handed sometimes, to carry their churches into spheres of live social action. Thus with the message, the earnestness, the capacity for sacrifice and the leadership, the church is not ill-equipped to move forward into that almost unexplored field of corporate Christian expression.

There is a special factor in the situation, for which the church is not responsible, perhaps, which nevertheless presents one of the greatest difficulties in the way of such expression. It is the current measure of success or achievement which dominates American life especially. We must succeed and let people know that we are succeeding and get the credit for whatever we have accomplished. It has been built up by the whole psychology of advertising and publicity and the church not only has succumbed to that requirement but will have to reckon with the contempt which a well taught world will heap upon an organization which might attempt to practice humility and self-sacrifice in any large way. It is not hard to fight definite evils, or even antagonize strong vested interests if the issue is clearly drawn, for there is always a backing to be won in such attempts and the promise of well earned recognition, if the contest is successful. The world is generous in its praise of a successful fighter. It is far harder to lose oneself in a cause where the organization can get no credit but may lose whatever prestige it enjoys. Yet it seems as if that were the task marked out for the church if it is to follow the line which Jesus himself has laid down.

CREDIT FOR SERVICE

The first step is the recognition of the fact that the church not only does not need the credit for what service it may render, but must not seek it. Its truest service will be rendered where there can be no return in prestige for what it does. In a western town where two colleges are located, there was no provision for students to gather except in saloon and pool holls. Under the auspices of a church, a reading room was opened and then a clubhouse was built with library, reading room, games, pool tables, baths and tennis courts. An organization was built up on the lines of the Y. M. C. A. and the large patronage of the students proved the value of what the church was trying to supply. Within six years one college built a gymnasium, both put in swimming pools, both built tennis courts and the town put in a library. One by one the needs which the church supplied were taken up by other agencies which could handle them more adequately, and the church closed up its club activities. It had done a more effective piece of work than if it had kept the field for itself.

It is a striking thing that in many of the movements for social betterment, labor movements and revolutionary movements, men and women have found that emotional release which comes from losing themselves in a cause bigger than themselves and in which they can spend themselves with that abandon of dedication which is the doorway to the life more abundant. People are finding there what they used to find in the church. They are not finding Christ in the technical sense, but they are finding what he came to bring and it would be a mere quibble to object to what is a very real experience because they did not get it from the official organization stamped and labeled in the authorized way. The church must be content if in any way the essential principles be spread, and rejoice accordingly, even though that development seems to be taking its job away. It is quite possible that in the working out of social relationships in terms which Jesus expressed there may be a better approach to finding the personal Savior than through formal entrance into the church which many feel he has deserted. If it is still true that a tree may be judged by its fruit, many of our churches with an output of men and women, individually righteous, theologically orthodox and socially blind, would hardly bear comparison with certain social movements which are producing men and women of rough exterior and unconventional standards, but thorough social consecration. They are the ones who are doing more to bring in the kingdom.

RELIANCE UPON MACHINERY

Such an observation inevitably leads one to the further conclusion that the church needs not only humility in which to view with composure the spectacle of other organizations carrying on what it has hitherto regarded as its work;

it needs to be freed from its reliance upon organization and machinery as means for accomplishing its purpose. It is perfectly true that in this twentieth century no cause can succeed unless it is properly organized, thoroughly equipped and adequately advertised. That is the reason why the church does not need to rely on those methods; its proper ideal is the opposite of success in twentieth century terms. Its function is not (as we have sometimes figured it) to gain the whole world; such a result too readily suggests the probable loss of its soul.

Boards of social service and the like have played valuable parts in the various churches, in the educational work that they have done. They have helped to open the eyes of the people in the churches to the fact that there is a social gospel and that it makes certain demands upon the organization. In no sense, however, can they be thought of as discharging the responsibility of the church in the matter of the social gospel. It has usually been true that every new board has been created to do something that people were neglecting and the result has usually been that because the responsibility has been shifted to the board they have neglected the matter still more.

The suggestion has been made that we ought to have a department of peace in our federal government. The suggestion does credit to the good intentions of those making it, but what is rather needed is to get the present department to function in a peaceful way and back of that to organize our whole economic life on the basis of good-will and cooperation, rather than on the basis of strife as it is at present. Peace is something to be lived, not to be administered by a board as an offset to our ordinary activities. In the same way, the social gospel cannot be administered by a board; it must be lived by the church.

A CENTER OF INFLUENCE

So far what has been suggested is largely a matter of contrasts; the present aims and methods of the church compared with what those aims and methods ought to be. In general, the thought has been that the church should not be the great hive of industry into which people are drawn to get them to work, but that it should rather be the center of a vitalizing influence, subordinating itself to the larger community and social interests, setting its people to work in fields where their sympathy and cooperation is needed, where the return will not come to the organization. Instead of going into the competitive field to win people from other organizations, as it does at present, the local church, if it is in any measure to express the social gospel, must lose itself in the creative life of the community.

In a world where the self-seeking competitive principle dominates society, the church will accomplish only one thing by living that competitive and self-centered life and preaching its opposite: it will more and more convince the world of its unsocial hypocritical futility. In that suggestive little book, "Christ and Cæsar," Miglem and Morgan have put it in this way: "The church is to be committed to a love that knows no barriers and will brook no refusal, overcoming enmity and indifference by the active display of love; it is to be in the world and yet not seeking by any external and coercive means to impose its ideals upon the world."

Some may be inclined to raise the question, What will become of the church if it ceases to look out for and protect its own interests? But I would submit that that has nothing whatever to do with our problem. It is not a counsel of prudence which I am suggesting, quite the reverse; it is that adventurous spirit of service which has in all ages marked those disciples of Christ who have gone out fired by the heavenly vision, not counting the cost. It may be suggested for the timid, however, that if there is any validity in the whole Christian conception of life, if love and service are proper bases for life, the thing will work out. It may possibly be to the complete elimination of certain forms of church organization; but even that would be a cheap price to pay for the spread of a more real spirit of brotherhood in the life of the world.

OBSTACLES IN THE WAY

It need hardly be said that such a transformation in the aim and technique of the church is not going to be brought about at once by the mere statement of it. The obstacles that have been noted are too formidable and the faith of people too dim. What are some of the approaches to it which can be initiated at the present time when people do not see the whole goal, steps which in the taking will strengthen the church to go even farther in the future?

Let us suggest a few partial ways of changing the present ego-centric emphasis of the church. To parallel the organizations at present working for the missions of the church, where the prestige comes back to the organization, why not organize to supply some need where there would be no returns, as the Quakers have done in their feeding work in Europe? Instead of the ordinary church supper, or its antithesis, the patronizing bread-line, why not have a supper of real fellowship for those in need outside? Why not offer the church buildings to some struggling union, or better yet, to some revolutionary organization that needs a place to meet? Why not supply people, if any are available, who would take the place of workers and give them a needed vacation? Why not equip church members for work as guards and attendants at prisons rather than sending flowers to the prisoners and leaving them at the mercy of a brutal and inhuman system? Why not contribute to union strike and defense funds as a means of helping people to help themselves, instead of waiting to extend charity when they have failed? Why not invest church endowment funds in cooperative or constructive enterprises where they will serve a double purpose? Why not encourage the people to make a thorough study of the principles of social and industrial relationships as the field where the gospel is most needed today? Why not get the local church to refuse to participate in any campaign against any human group whatever, whether representing a supposedly dangerous class, race, creed or nation? Why not seek for opportunities to win by the redemptive power of love individuals or groups who seem to have departed from the true social standards?

But enough of the possible lines of approach to that broader and more comprehensive entering into and identification with the social expression of human life which is the real social gospel. When the church abandons its attitude of spiritual snobbery in which it imagines that it can "put over" something in the industrial field by doing something "for" the workers, thus winning their gratitude and allegiance, and begins in humility to forget itself and seek ways of working with all others who are striving for sound economic conditions and the full creative expression of life, it will have found the key to the solution of the problem. As Micklem and Morgan put it: "The social revolutionaries have come to see that real justice does not primarily involve a more equal distribution of things; rather its chief requirement is a fresh adjustment of human relationships with a view to greater liberty and a worthier status for those who by their toil maintain the economic order." The church, by abandoning the protection of property values and what have been considered its own interests, can, if it has faith enough to seek the kingdom of God first, join the ranks of those who put human relationships ahead of all else and lose itself in seeking the life of the world. It will then not dispense the social gospel, perhaps, but better, it will live it.

The Modern Poet's Search After God

By Caroline M. Hill

THE modern novelist feels the Great Hunger and finds it a good title for a book. He describes the life of a man driven by this hunger but he does not try to tell us what it is. People buy the book but when they have read it they cannot define the Great Hunger. One poet (who has written nothing else that can be called religious) has a poem called "The Cry":

There's a voice in my heart that cries and cries for tears;
It is not a voice, but a pain of many fears.
It is not a pain, but the rhyme of far off spheres.

It may be a demon of pent and high emprise
That looks on my soul till my soul hides and cries,
Loath to rebuke my soul and bid it arise.

* * *

The child turns o'er in the womb; and perhaps the soul
Nurtures a dream too strong for the soul's control,
When the dream hath eyes, and senses its destined goal.

Deep in the darkness the bulb under mold and clod
Feels the sun in the sky and pushes above the sod.
Perhaps this cry in my heart is nothing but God.

"The Hound of Heaven," which has been called the greatest religious poem ever written, has the Search as its theme but works out a different figure. The soul of man is the pursued and not the pursuer. The soul flees from God, fearing lest having him, it will have nothing left; but at last yields, knowing that having him it will have everything else.

Some of the searchers find and some do not, and some decide that the Search is its own reward. The riding of the knight after the holy grail has inspired Chesterton's "The Wild Knight":

So with wasted grasses in my spear
I ride forever, seeking after God.
My hair grows whiter than my thistle plume
And all my limbs are loose; but in my eyes
The star of an unconquered praise;
For in my breast hope forever sings
That at the next white corner of the road
My eyes may look on Him . . .

Hush—I shall know

The place where it is found: A twisted path
Under a twisted pear-tree—this I saw
In the first dream I had ere I was born,
Wherein He spoke . . .

But the grey clouds come down

In hail upon the icy plains: I ride
Burning forever on consuming fire.

The same figure controls a most rhythmical poem by Gale Young Rice called "The Mystic." Poetry is written to be read aloud and there is nothing in modern religious poetry more musical than this one suggestive of the metre of Shelley's "The Cloud":

There is a quest that calls me
In nights when I am lone,
The need to ride where the ways divide
The unknown from the known.
I mount what thought is near me
And soon I reach the place,
The tenuous rim where the seen grows dim
And the sightless hides its face.

This compelling rhythm holds us more and more and more through five stanzas, ending:

I have ridden the wind, I have ridden the stars,
I have ridden the force that flies
With far intent through the firmament
And each to each allies.
And everywhere that a thought may dare
To gallop, mine has trod—
Only to stand at last on the strand
Where just beyond lies God.

Another contemporary American poet goes hunting for a silver heron, but when it is caught it is but "a piteous freight, a dark and heavy weight, despoiled of plumage, its voice forever stilled." Still the poet's soul flies above him for the quarry it shall find.

Perhaps to most modern readers the unsuccessful searchers are more appealing than the successful. But even they do not leave us comfortless. Masfield's "Seekers" ends:

Friends and loves we have none, nor wealth nor blest abode,
But the hope, the burning hope, and the road, the lonely road.

The most simple and most universal finding is in nature:

Wherever the old urge of life provokes the dumb dead sod
To tell its thought in violets, the soul takes hold on God.

In the country there is always faith and joy is the natural way of living. Only God can make a tree. All the birds are his holy folk. Nature makes mystics of us all. Wordsworth's "Tintern Abby" remains the most noble expression as well as the most suggestive psychological explanation of the feeling of a presence in nature:

Of all the mighty world of eye and ear—both what they half create and half perceive.

The wish and the attainment of Blake, Tennyson, Emerson, Chesterton and Edward Carpenter has been

To see the world in a grain of sand,
And Heaven in a wild flower,
Hold Infinity in the palm of your hand,
And Eternity in an hour.

William Watson's "Ode to May" leads us to understand the sun worshipers. Emerson tells us that "In the mud and scum of things, there always, always something sings." Dorothy Frances Gurney says that "One is nearer God's heart in a garden than anywhere else on earth."

The heavens, the mountains and the ocean have been described by the older poets, but no contemporary ventures to treat them again. Truly the approach to the supernatural through nature is the easiest way, but it is kindergarten compared with the cooperation of human beings demanded by the great problems of life. The modern thinker seeks to find an ever evolving reality at the core of all human action too.

Among the successful searchers are Browning, Tennyson, William Watson, Masefield; the Irish poets, Francis Thompson and Lionel Johnson, Edward Dowden and George William Russell; and many lesser names in England and America. Among the unsuccessful are Sir Alfred Comyns Lyall, Wilbur Underwood, Paul Lawrence Dunbar, Max Eastman and Gale Young Rice. Some express it hopefully and some hopelessly. Hilda Doolittle's "Pygmalion" says:

Each of the gods, perfect,
Cries out from a perfect throat:
You are useless:
No marble can bind me,
No stone suggest.
They have melted into light
And I am desolate.
They have melted
Each from his plinth
Each one departs.
They have gone:
What agony can express my grief?
Each from his marble base
Has stepped into the light
And my work is for naught.

A religionist would say that each one is more perfect than the others and his work is most successful. One's temperament often chooses for him whether he is positive or negative.

The modern attitude toward religion is that so far as possible each person is to be trusted to choose the kind of spiritual food convenient for him; but meat must be kept out of sight of the babies, and missionaries must be sent to the heathen to educate their taste—strong souls can be trusted to choose their balanced ration. Ezra Pound thinks of God as a gallant foe that plays behind the veil. "Whom God deigns not to overthrow hath need of triple mail." That is a very original conception but it is not likely to survive unless it is very good poetry. For there is very little poetry of negation that has come down to us. Most that one can find is in contemporary literature. Most pessimistic of all is Max Eastman, to be quoted because he shows what life must be to one who does not look for the great unifying concept:

Serene the silver fishes glide
Stern-lipped and pale, and wonder-eyed;
As through the aged depths of ocean.
They glide with wan and wavy motion;
They have no pathway where to go,
They flow like water to and fro.
They watch with never-winking eyes,
They watch with staring, cold surprise,
The level people in the air,
The people peering, peering there:
They also wander to and fro,
And know not why or where they go.
Yet have a wonder in their eyes,
Sometimes a pale and cold surprise.

The authority of the poet has always been recognized; he is the one who can see reality; he is the one to whom God whispers in the ear. As Edwin Markham puts it:

He passes on before the race
And sings out of a silent place.
Like faint notes of a forest bird
On heights afar the voice is heard;
And the dim path he breaks today
Will sometime be the trodden way.

Says Lloyd Mifflin:

The poet is the only potentate,
His sceptre reaches o'er remotest zones;
His thought remembered and his golden tones
Shall in the ears of nations uncreate
Roll on for ages and reverberate
When kings are dust beside forgotten thrones.

The poet's voice is recognized as the voice of God because it is clear and concise, because he cracks the moulds of thought and wings away, because he himself believes that God speaks through himself, believes there is a divine fire hidden in his heart of hearts that shall burn him clean and pure. He believes that he must pay a terrible price if he will be this organ through which God may speak. The American transcendentalist, Samuel Johnson, says this inspiration is the Life of Ages, richly poured, the Love of God, unspent and free. The poets do not speak the language of science or try to explain how the Life of Ages is present for all to draw upon. Some of the modern cults hold the same idea. The concept of evolution was grasped poetically long before it was worked out in biology, and the Great Anthology has more believers now than ever before because it is now clear that it is poetry and that poetry runs far ahead of science in its understanding of reality.

For the modern seeker to take the medieval point of view, pretending to believe what he knows is not true, would be as stultifying as it was for Galileo to recant. The reconciliation is to be found in poetry. The poet weaves the web of the years, say Alfred Noyes and Odell Shepard. "He walks in the world of the weary as if he loved it most," says Henry van Dyke. This Presence is in all life, especially where humble men gather together.

In short, he is the working hypothesis of the poet, as evolution is the working hypothesis of the scientist.

It is with the church the poets fall out. The modern poets are democratic and the church is not. The organized institution of religion has been successively despotic, monarchic, oligarchic, autocratic and in a few spots democratic. A democratic age must conceive a democratic God and is striving very hard to do so. The radicals are sworn enemies of the old church because they know that the mortal enemy of all democracy is organized belief in the infallibility of any human being. There is little modern poetry about the church.

Its door is old, and its tower points cold
To the milky way,

says a writer in the "New Republic."

But a very sincere Kansas poet, Edwin Ford Piper, describes the country church as the center of social intercourse and source of spiritual uplift:

O little church, the settlers come for miles.
Some few, unhearing, sit in selfish dreams;
But here the most are really worshipers.
Seeking in fellowship a sympathy with God.

A little thing, this church? Remove its roots—
Osso upon Pelion would not fill the pit.

The poets do not end their quest by joining the church—far from it; although to devote one's self to the service of the church as that institution was a quarter of a century ago is a different matter from working with it now that it has passed through the social movement and through the war. The young men who study theology have always seemed to the writer a different species from the normal. Are they poets who have just fallen short? Or are they neurotics? Should they not be mentally tested to see what is their controlling complex?

On the other hand, perhaps those who cannot believe are those who lack poetry in their souls. It is the Sons of Martha who have our respect, and "to them is belief forbidden." The believing mind has much more of our respect than it had a generation ago, provided it carries its belief into action and does not merely lay its burdens on the Lord that he may lay them on Martha's Sons.

And what is it the Seekers find?

The medieval ones fell back upon the authority of their great predecessors—the visions of St. John, the Revelation, and the saints of the early church; the modern ones look within their own souls. Tennyson expressed the essence of modernism when he said, "There is more faith in honest doubt, believe me, than in half the creeds." Some find satisfaction in service, some in the contemplation of Christianity, some in emotional assurance, one in what she calls the refracted lights of an unseen perfection, many in the works of nature. Like Shelley in the "Hymn to Intellectual Beauty," their eyes are drunk with beauty that their eyes can never see." Whitman's passage to India answers the question of this age and of all the ages:

Sail forth—steer by the deep waters only
For we are bound where man has not yet dared to go.
Oh, farther, farther sail!

Perfection they do not find; companionship they do find. One of the war poets, Charles Hamilton Sorley, has expressed the modern note:

Perhaps the gates are not so fair,
Nor quite so bright as once they were,
When God himself on earth did stand
And gave to Abraham his hand
And led him to a better land.

For lo, the unclean walk therein,
And those that have been soiled with sin—
The publican and harlot pass
Along; they do not stain its grass.
In it the needy has his share,
In it the foolish do not err.

* * *

They do not find the beauty that they seek,
Nor the God they set their trust upon;—
Yet still they march rejoicing on.

That is, they find the search itself sufficient justification for life. "The greatest joy is just the joy of going on." Again Whitman is most courageous when he asks his own soul if it dares to walk out into the unknown—

Where there is neither any ground for the feet, nor any path to follow.

This may seem very pale beside the medieval visions of paradise, where the fourfold river flowed and the tree of life bore fruits that gave refreshment for all thirst; but, if any thoughtful modern person should try to tell what had been heaven in his experience, no doubt he would say the consciousness of free growth; and hell would be an environment in which he was daily conscious of hopeless degeneration. If this decay is personal and physical but is accompanied by spiritual growth in the midst of the renewal of new life that is going on, old age may be happy and death a blessing. One may be happy to go on victoriously and yet die personally, but the going on idea must be present.

The poets find God in humanity, and immortality in going on. The grown-up idea of heaven, the idea which functions, is well expressed in John Hall Wheelock's "The Far Land":

We are sighing for you, far land—
We are praying for you, far land,

* * *

Through the terror of the ages
We have sought it, till the ages
Have stamped our lifted faces with our love.
But long though we have wandered, where we are
The far land is not. O that land is far!
Beyond the night, beyond the morning star,
The far land grows farther as we move.

In song and sacred story
We yearned to it, in color and in sound:

* * *

In the sweat of daily labor
We strove to bind it fast in steel and stone:

* * *

So we built ourselves a heaven,
Our God we set in heaven,
With prayers and praise we wrought them to our will:
But they could not fill the measure of our love
In the far land—O they were not great enough!
There is nothing, there is nothing great enough!
The far land is something greater still.

New Towns for Old

By Bruno Lasker

INDUSTRIAL changes apart, there is no feature of American social life more in need of renovation than our method of town and city building. Indeed, perhaps it would be more accurate to say that we have not had such a method. Most of our communities "just grewed." The trouble is they have grown so fast that our "improvements" and "reforms" have not kept up with the increasing ill-health, ugliness, lack of comfort and wastefulness which they have created.

It is sometimes said that in the country there are as bad slums as in the cities, only they are not so noticeable. Maybe, but the important fact is that in our congested industrial centers even wealthy folks cannot give their children the environment they ought to have, and the great mass of future American citizens are brought up in crowded streets, crowded schools, crowded homes, crowded playgrounds—where there are any—always under a pressure which is unnatural and does not allow of the slow development of what is best in them as human beings and heirs to a Christian civilization, even though it may sharpen their wits.

It would be funny, were it not so tragic, to watch our monster cities at the game of attracting from the country, the small towns and from each other more population so that their business men may have more customers, their factories more laborers, their theaters more patrons, their streetcars more straphangers. There seems to be no town in the east that does not try in earnest to become a second Philadelphia—which itself is still "boosting" though its population outnumbers that of seven of the forty-two states combined; none in the west that does not dream of itself as outranking Chicago or at least Kansas City.

SCHEMES OF IMPROVEMENT

There are many grand schemes of city improvement with magnificent boulevards and "civic centers," most of them based on the entirely false idea that the growth of the community is a matter of course and of advantage to the people who live in it. Our civic reconstruction, to amount to anything at all, must start out from correct thinking, from a knowledge of facts as they are, from a practical endeavor to provide for the needs of tomorrow as well as those of today. First of all, if these tests are applied, it will be found that many of our cities are already far too large for decent living conditions. Nothing can really improve Brooklyn, let us say, except the removal of some of it. The finest war memorial for many of our so-called "cities of the first class" would be—not the erection of yet another useless monument—but the pulling down of some existing block of buildings to make room for a little breathing space where children can play or office workers eat their lunch. The next point is that some towns, not yet too large, could and should guard against the danger of over-growth before it is too late, and deliberately stop growing.

Have you ever been in Madison, Wisconsin? It is a lovely town, with its two lake fronts, its stately buildings, large parks, well kept streets, simple and comfortable homes. Why should a town like this, and there are happily many like it, allow its "boosters" to make of it a second Milwaukee?

There is plenty of land on this continent; there is available plenty of energy and capital if we know how to use it. Why should we not start building new towns, as our forefathers did, towns that shall express our social ideals, our notions of comfort, efficiency, beauty, as their towns expressed theirs? At a meeting of housing reformers not long ago a speaker got up and said: "I don't hold with all these newfangled ideas about houses; those our grandfathers built are good enough for me." "You are right," said the next speaker, "it is those our fathers built that are not good enough." Those old fellows of two generations ago built houses for use and not for sale at a large profit. For them, a house was a home in which, when they built it, they hoped to stay and which, if possible, they would leave to one of their children to live in after they had gone. The modern town dweller often has no real "home." He is moving around once or twice a year from "Discomfort Apartments" to "Stuffy Stairs Mansions" and thence to "Childless Chambers" or "Misery Model Tenement." If he has children, landlords frown on him and he has to spend the best part of his income on rent. Even then he cannot give them an environment that will help to build up and ennoble their character and knowledge.

TOO MUCH IMITATION

It would be useless, of course, merely to imitate the homes and towns built by a past generation. We have done too much imitating. We should try, rather, to use this reconstruction period to create something that will take account of the progress made in technical knowledge and at the same time embody our own ideals. Now there is one thing which our fathers realized less than our grandfathers and which we are again beginning to perceive, and that is that we cannot possibly have a satisfactory home unless the surroundings of that home are satisfactory, too. There are four items in which a home to meet modern standards must be satisfactory; and these four items we must look for also in our community if, indeed, it is to be a fit abode: comfort, healthiness, efficiency and looks.

It is not comfortable to be crowded into a small apartment with four or five children, to be squeezed twice daily into an overcrowded streetcar and to stand up during a long ride to a distant suburb. It is inconvenient to have to make an hour's or two hours' journey to some outlying park to get a little fresh air on Sundays.

It is not healthy to breathe stale air because there are not enough windows in the room or because the windows open on a narrow court or on a street so closely built up that the air cannot get to the windows. Unclean streets, encumbered empty lots, open sewers, belching chimneys, a congestion of streets which prevents the taking of enough open-air exercise—all these make for ill-health.

It is not efficient to live in a house so arranged that the housewife must spend the best part of her time carrying water or where the windows and doors are so arranged that you cannot shift the beds out of a draft, or where the furnace consumes more coal than should be needed to heat the house, or where there is no place where to store a barrel of apples. It is wasteful to live in a house that is either much too small or much too large for the needs of the family: in the one case there is unnecessary extra cleaning, in the other happy home life is impossible and the people's earnings go to saloon, movie and pool-room. In the same way, it is wasteful for a city to provide things which, because of the great distances, only few citizens can enjoy though all must pay for it. It may be to the advantage of a few storekeepers in central streets to have huge crowds pass their doors, but the absence of noise and flurry would make for greater efficiency with the great majority of citizens.

SOCIETY AND NATURE

The new city we need must be one in which we are glad to rear children because it provides the advantages of social life and good schools but retains the influence of nature and simple things. It must be health-promoting; its large yards, shady avenues and parks must invite open-air life; its cleanliness must make the street little more than an extension of the home. In that city a man must no more think of spitting on the pavement than he would think of spitting on his parlor rug. It must be inexpensive because so laid out as to give every kind of business and home exactly the advantages which it requires for the development of the fullest possible efficiency. It is more important than a low tax rate that the services paid for out of the taxes should be of maximum value to the whole community.

The new city must be beautiful. Some people harbor the absurd thought that seeking for beauty is not to be "practical." But there can be no worthwhile social life, no community spirit, in a place of which it is impossible to be proud to be a citizen. Only fools will be proud of a big bank building—belonging to somebody else—because it is higher than any building in the next town, or of a new bridge merely because it has cost a great deal of money. We can only be proud of our homes if there is an air of beauty and care over the whole of it, if not only the front steps but also the back fence and back porch are in good repair. Apply that to your city; don't think you can deceive yourself or your neighbor with a fine memorial to the war heroes, with an impressive municipal building, with a showy lighting arrangement in the main street! It is the whole of the community that counts, the little back streets as well as the front, the poorer sections as well as those where "desirable residences" are for sale.

STANDARDS FOR CITY BUILDING

The new city, in other words, must be built from the ground up on the lines of a plan that makes for comfort, health, efficiency and beauty. None of these can be left to chance. And it is just as easy to lay out streets in such a way as to go round that fine clump of old trees as it is to have them cut down, to plan streets that curve and give a new, delightful view every few steps as it is to have all streets straight and alike, with the same view or no view at all. Instead of disregarding schools and churches in laying out a town or suburb, it is just as easy and costs no more to plan it so as to give the most prominent and best sites to these buildings which, if well designed, in their turn will give beauty and character to the whole place.

We have been too much in the habit of leaving the building of our towns either to chance or to the profiteer. These are days in which common men aspire to better things and are rightly impatient with the stupid and neglectful ways into which we have fallen. That is what reconstruction means, applied to towns and cities; that the new spirit of fellowship and patriotism must find expression in an environment that breathes freedom and life.

It may be that before going very far in that direction we shall find that our whole method of getting homes and towns built has become obsolete, that the newer ideal of the community will force us to adopt new ways of promoting, financing and building them. Already, the idea of the self-owning town, for instance, the town that is owned and democratically managed by those who live and work in it, is everywhere gaining ground. There are other possibilities, deserving careful study. Let those who care for their fellowmen, those able to look forward as well as backward, those not afraid of change merely because it is change, contribute their thought to the new city and help bring it into being.

Why?

THE men of the earth said: "We must war

As men of the earth have warred;

'Tis ours to wield on the battlefield

The unrelenting sword."

But they who had seen the valiant die,

The fathers of men, they answered, "Why?"

The men of the earth said: "We must arm,

For so we would reveal

The nobler part of the human heart,

The love of the nation's weal."

But they who had sung their lullaby,

The mothers of men, they answered, "Why?"

The men of the earth said, "We must fight,

For so the fit survive;

By the jungle law of fang and claw

The strong are kept alive."

But a crippled, cankered progeny,

The sons of the culls, they answered, "Why?"

The men of the earth said: "We must fall,

And falling build the road

O'er which the race with quickening pace

Can find its way to God."

But down from a Cross uplifted high,

The Saviour of men, He answered, "Why?"

British Table Talk

London, February 28, 1922.

PRESENT indications are that the number of American visitors to England this year will equal and probably exceed pre-war records. The influx has begun earlier than usual, many having come for Princess Mary's wedding. Early in February the Aquitania brought 100 passengers to the Savoy hotel alone, many going to other hotels, and shortly after the Mauretania brought about as many more. The Cecil, Ritz, Victoria, New Metropole, Grand, Charing Cross, Picadilly and other hotels have booked many orders for visitors from the United States. Many American college and university professors are now spending their sabbatical year with us. The manager of the Savoy hotel says: "Americans are glad to be back again, for they are mostly visitors who are familiar with London. They say it is pleasant, after the stories of high prices circulated in America as part of a futile anti-British campaign, to find things much cheaper than they had expected." Reductions in prices recently made by the Gordon Hotels Limited, are part of a movement that has been in progress in London for some months. The entire tariff at the Cecil was lowered last November, and prices at the Savoy are also less than they were last year. At the recent licensing sessions, when the liquor interests made unsuccessful attempts to extend the hours for the sale of intoxicants, which have been much curtailed since war, one of the arguments used was that increased facilities were sought for the benefit of American visitors, who otherwise would prefer Paris to London! The secretary of the Brighter London Society, which is strongly supported by brewers and distillers, states that in 1912 Americans spent 36,000,000 pounds in London, but in 1921 only half that amount.

The Political Outlook

Visitors to London who are interested in European affairs and the concerns of the British empire will find much to engage their attention at this juncture. We are not yet safely through the Irish tangle; India is a source of continual anxiety; the problem of Egypt does not admit of easy solution; Mesopotamia is pretty much of a white elephant. In the political world the old party divisions have disappeared, and the historic groups are divided among themselves. The Conservatives are numerically the strongest, but by themselves they are not likely to obtain a working parliamentary majority. The Labor party, as by-elections show, is steadily rising to power. The Independent Liberals, a small but compact body, sturdily maintains the old Gladstonian tradition. Lord Grey of Fallodon (foreign secretary when the war broke out), emerging from four years of retirement (due to failing eyesight, now largely restored), has become their most active and forceful spokesman. Mr. Asquith, official leader of the Independent Liberals, is rather tired and may not aspire to resume the premiership. Nobody knows what will be the result of the general election, which will probably take place at latest next autumn. It may be that though the Conservative-Liberal coalition in its present form is doomed, we shall have another combination cabinet. The respective leaders are urging their followers in any event to continue to pull together. In the unlikely event of the Liberals being returned in sufficient strength to form a government, possible arrangements are Grey as prime minister, in the house of Lords, and Asquith as leader of the house of commons, perhaps with Lord Robert Cecil as active colleague. The Labor leaders are hardly ready to take office by themselves, even if the number of their candidates elected justified the step. Events may force the responsibility upon them sooner than they want to assume it. While at contested elections they refuse to come to any understanding with the Liberal or any other party, a composite government of Liberals and Laborists (acting individually, rather than as party representatives) may emerge after the next election or the one following it. Meantime, Lloyd George occupies the anomalous position of being the most influential statesman, but without an organized party or electoral machinery. He is the dark horse of politics, and, to change the metaphor, unless he can see his way to retain the whip hand, he may prefer to retire to the country house he is building in Surrey.

Lloyd George and Free Churchmen

The free churches have always been predominantly, though not entirely, Liberal in their political sympathies, and Liberal leaders, notably Gladstone and his successors, have realized the value of the nonconformist vote. The Grand Old Man spoke at the City Temple several times; he once made an important political pronouncement on Ireland at the house of the late Dr. Joseph Parker and occasionally he asked free church divines to meet him at breakfast. Following this precedent, Mr. Lloyd George entertains representative nonconformists at Downing Street from time to time. But his later political development has alienated from him the sympathy of many former supporters. Politically, nonconformity is for the time being split into two sections: those who support Lloyd George through thick and thin, headed by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, editor of the British Weekly, and those who have parted company from him, led by the Christian World. Shortly before the annual assembly of the National Free Church Council at Liverpool, the prime minister invited about twenty free church ministers to breakfast with him at his official residence. The guests included Dr. Shakespeare, Dr. Garvie, Dr. Lidgett, Revs. R. C. Gillie, Dinsdale, T. Young, S. M. Berry, and S. W. Hughes. Some of these, notably Dr. Shakespeare, are his enthusiastic admirers; others, like Dr. Garvie, are lukewarm or even hostile to him. It is suggested that one reason why Lloyd George summoned the gathering when he did was that two Independent Liberals, Sir Donald Maclean and Lord Gladstone, having been invited to address the Liverpool meetings, he would like at least one coalitionist to have a similar opportunity, and Mr. Balfour's name is mentioned in this connection. It seems that politics were eschewed at the breakfast table, the conversation turning mainly on religious questions. The host urged that it is incumbent upon the churches to stimulate the spiritual revival that is needed in order to improve the material conditions of the people. England, he considers, needs a spiritual revival more than anything else. Some of the guests agreed that a spiritual revival must precede social improvement; others thought the politicians ought to introduce reforms that would help the revival. One of the guests was much impressed by the fact that the prime minister did not appeal for any political backing, but was content to ask his friends to pray for him. Rev. T. Nightingale, who was present, strongly repudiates the idea that the National Free Church Council, of which he is secretary, can be used as an auxiliary to any political party. "Within the council," he says, "are those who represent Independent Liberalism, Coalition Liberalism, Labor, and Conservatism. As an organization, it cannot ally itself. It is in existence for purely educational, moral and spiritual purposes, and it can only touch great political questions where moral issues are involved."

Can Anglican Divisions Be composed?

For some time past divisions within the church of England have been becoming more and more acute. The three main schools—catholic, or high church; evangelical, or low church; liberal church, or modernist—have been in such sharp conflict that a crisis impended. A praiseworthy effort to see if it is possible to arrive at mutual understanding is being made by representatives of all parties. Nine diocesan bishops, including Dr. Temple, Dr. Henson and Dr. Watts-Ditchfield, and twice as many leading clergy, including Canons Glazebrook and Underhill, have addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury a remarkable document. They confess they have grown weary of disputes, which tend to perpetuate hostility and suspicion, and prevent the church as a whole devoting her energies to the edification of the faithful and the conversion of unbelievers and giving her proper witness in the social and political difficulties of the time. "Reunion with other bodies without a more real unity among ourselves will at best only increase the existing confusion." Face to face with serious tendencies of modern thought, Christian teaching needs to be consistent and convincing. The memorial proposes a re-examination of grounds of difference, with the view of arriving at an unambiguous statement of doctrine in matters of importance, without either imposing a cut-and-dried system or creating new tests. Having discussed the subject at a series of meetings, the signatories suggest to the Archbishop of Canterbury that he should appoint a representative commission to endeavor to find a basis of doctrinal agreement. Taking the view that the work should be regarded as no less onerous and important than the production of the revised version of the New Testament, they suggest that the commission should mainly consist of young men, say, under 45. While recognizing the earnestness, capacity and devotion of the writers of the letter, and the harmfulness and probable needlessness of a great deal of current controversy within the church, and earnestly desiring closer fellowship among its different sections, the archbishop does not see his way to do exactly what is asked and suggests that conferences might reveal larger unity and closer sympathy than is thought to exist. Alive to the gravity and far-reaching character of the proposal, he asks for a re-statement and elucidation of it, with a clearer indication of the sort of questions, theological, ecclesiastical, or practical, to which it is thought the suggested commission might find useful answers and in what shape they should be formulated. The comments of the Anglican newspapers afford evidence of the divisions it is thought to remove. The Guardian believes that this inspiration towards a new synthesis of faith will be welcomed by the majority of church people and regards as possible a genuine unity of belief. "The days when men were heretics if they did not accept in verbal detail formularies which represent the knowledge and the philosophy of earlier times have gone never to return." On the other hand, the Church Times does not like the suggestion, suspecting that the underlying intention of the memorialists is to provide a substitute for the thirty-nine articles, and fears the work of the commission would "degenerate into the finding of a formula." More will certainly be heard of the proposal.

Archbishop and "Heresy"

To convocation at both Canterbury and York petitions have been presented charging certain speakers at the Modern Churchmen's Conference at Cambridge with teaching doctrines entirely subversive of the Christian faith and the Christian religion. The Archbishop of Canterbury strongly deprecated the exaggeration which he believed to be current of the scale of the controversy. Judging from some of the things that have been said and written, it might be supposed that there is a great phalanx of "heresiarchs" setting in battle array against the doctrine of the church, and that it is the duty of the bishops to rally the forces of the faithful in defense of the Christian faith. In his belief, the apprehensions are greatly exaggerated and the whole picture distorted and over-colored. His grace hopes that this will be made clear when the matter comes up at the next group of sessions. York convocation also deferred consideration of the question to the next sessions, but appointed a committee, consisting of five bishops, including Drs. Henson and Temple, to consider what answer should be made to the petition. No complaint can be made of the attitude of the high authorities of the church to allegations of heresy. While it is cautious and, as is natural, even conservative, there is no attempt to stifle thought or suppress discussion. Indeed, the dominant spirit is one of tolerance and a desire for liberty of thought and speech. The archbishop having declined to intervene in the case of Mr. Major, no proceedings for heresy will be instituted against him. There being things in the prayer book that mislead and repel plain people because to them they seem false or incomprehensible or silly, Mr. Major suggests that the idea of liturgical uniformity should be abandoned, and alternative sets of services provided for Anglo-Catholics, Evangelicals, and Modernists. Canon Adderley says that all agree some passages in the thirty-nine articles might well be altered or scrapped, and he points out that what is happening now in regard to the creeds is very similar to what has been done in the way of biblical criticism.

The Church and the Workers

Desiring to translate into action the findings of the archbishops' committee on Christianity and industrial problems and the industrial section of the Lambeth report, the Industrial Christian Fellowship is striving to remove the present apathy and hostility on the part of democracy towards the churches and to spread a spirit of fellowship between all sections of the community, by a consistent advocacy of justice between man and man. At the annual service of the fellowship at St. Martin-in-the-Fields, Rev. G. A. Studdert-Kennedy ("Woodbine Willie") declared that there is growing up amongst us a force that must either issue in bloody revolution, or the assent to the demand of the workers for fairer treatment and better conditions of life. The fellowship's executive committee has confirmed and ratified some important resolutions concerning employers, investors, employees, and consumers, passed at a meeting of the council. The resolutions were moved from the chair by the Bishop of Lichfield as the outcome of a discussion on the present industrial order and what Christians can do. In the first resolution, after expressing sympathy with the employers because of their "responsibility in this time of industrial crisis and upheaval," the council suggested that "by their own active acceptance of the principle of democracy employers may show that the Christian way of fellowship and sacrifice can become an actual factor in economic life." The second resolution appeals to investors "to regard all wealth as a trust, striving to make investments in the spirit of service." The third resolution, concerning employees, affirms that the same principle concerning the separate functions of those who supply the capital and those who organize the plant may be applied with equal truth to them, that labor has its duties no less than its rights. In the fourth resolution the consumer is begged to "inquire into the labor conditions involved in the production of goods for his use." Churches are invited to observe April 30 as Industrial Sunday. Canon Peter Green, Manchester, has been pointing out how the customs of the bishops in general life affect the opinions of the democracy, and thus may discredit the church. "The church," he holds, "should get rid of the idea of bishops' palaces and of clergy living like 'resident gentlemen' or wealthy city merchants or the professional classes." At a meeting of the University of London Labor Party Mr. Sidney Webb remarked that he would not give away at present the number of bishops who are members of the Labor Party, "but we have had for years a definite number of the bench of bishops who are members." Because of a statement that he does not believe in discussing social questions in the pulpit, the Norwich Free Church Council has decided not to make arrangements for another visit to the city of the Rev. Douglas Brown, the revivalist. The Rev. P. S. Carden, of the Scott Memorial church, insists that unless the church challenges the existing order as well as sin in the individual, it will be practically futile. "The present industrial system means perpetual war. It propagates a crop of unspiritual and unchristian things. If ever the church is to save the world it must challenge this evil before unemployment, poverty, slums and disease can be eliminated. Christianity means life, a life which cannot be lived in the squalor to which so many are condemned today."

Dr. Jowett, Dr. Clifford, and Others

On grounds of health, after taking the very highest medical counsel, Dr. J. H. Jowett has definitely resigned the pastorate of Westminster Chapel. He says that since his return from America he has been like a bird with a broken wing and that there have been very few days when he has not suffered from a sense of weakness. The church proposed an arrangement by which he might continue some regular service at Westminster, but he has decided to close his ministry in May when he will have completed four years there. He, however, hopes to preach occasionally.—Dr. Clifford has undergone a second successful operation on his eye. On the day he re-entered the hospital he attended the annual meeting of the Metropolitan Free Church Federation and made a felicitous speech at the installation as president of Rev. S. W. Hughes, his successor at Westbourne Park. His sight continues to improve and he hopes to attend the free church council meetings at Liverpool in March. A new communion table in Westbourne Park chapel bears the following inscription: "This table is dedicated by the church to the loving memory of Rebecca, the wife of Dr. John Clifford, his devoted helpmeet for nearly fifty-eight years."—Congregationalism has suffered a severe loss by the sudden death, at sixty-four, of the chairman of the union, Rev. A. J. Viner. Rev. T. Yates takes his place.—Regent's Park chapel having to close in May, Rev. F. C. Spurr has accepted an invitation to Birmingham.—More than 60,000 signatures have been received for the petition to the king for a rehearing of the trial before the Privy Council of ex-Archdeacon John Wakeford.

CORRESPONDENCE

Jesus As An Advertiser

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your issue of January 12, containing Lloyd Douglas' article on "The Galilean Psychology," reached me last Saturday. As my sermon topic for Sunday was "The Most Remarkable Advertisement in History," I naturally read the negation of my line of thought with great interest. Of course no one can read Douglas without interest. But the trouble with this article is that "it ain't so." Were I to be as sweeping as he, I should say that Jesus was the most consummate master of the art of advertising ever known, and that he advertised to the limit.

Did ever patent-medicine man make more sweeping promises to cure all physical ailments with his decoction than Jesus made to cure all spiritual ills when he said, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest? . . . Learn of me . . . and soul health is yours?" This is what I termed, in preaching on it, "the most remarkable advertisement in history." I compared Jesus with the quack doctor, showing that the Great Physician makes good his advertisement and the quack doesn't. Did not my topic accurately characterize Matt. 11:28-30?

When Jesus said, in effect, to the Samaritan woman, "If you knew who is talking to you and what I could do for you, you would make application in a hurry"—was it not the essence of skillful advertising? And did he raise any objection to her becoming his walking billboard and bringing out the whole town to hear him?

In Luke 10:1 the Lord sent ahead of him seventy advertising agents "into every city and place, whither he himself was about to come." They were to do just what the twelve were told to do in Matthew 10. "As you go, preach, saying, 'the kingdom of heaven is at hand.'" In other words, "Wake up, people. The long-expected deliverance is upon us. A new social order is impending. Love and brotherhood are to take the place of hate and tyranny. We bring you good news. In a few days you will be visited by the Chief Organizer of the new regime. You better turn out and hear him." After such a campaign is it any wonder that the crowds fairly trod on one another to get near Jesus?

And he authorized his advance agents (the twelve or the seventy or both) to do another sensational thing which would arouse the utmost interest. "Whatsoever city ye enter . . . heal the sick that are therein." If, when healing, the disciples remarked, "We are mere tyros at this. You should see what our Teacher can do. When he comes along bring your incurables to him"—would not the whole countryside be on the qui vive for his visit? I have, yet to see any satisfactory account of Jesus which ignores his miracles. A manifold reading of Mark shows that what astounded him most was Jesus' cures of mental diseases. In my far-away youth I delighted in Stalker's "Life of Christ"—and not all the later books are better. In speaking of the miracles he said, "All Galilee was for a time in motion with the crowding of the diseased of every description who could walk or totter to be near him, and with companies of anxious friends carrying on beds and couches those who could not come themselves. The streets of the villages and towns were lined with the victims of disease as his benignant figure passed by." And in another paragraph Stalker added, "His miracles were only the bell tolled to bring the people to hear his words." That is, they were a tremendously effective advertising medium.

I venture to suggest that "Galilean psychology" was not very different from other psychology; that advertising brought crowds to Jesus and is a legitimate method of forwarding his cause today—and that Brother Douglas's delightful story, "Wanted—a Congregation," very satisfactorily answers his article!

On the Liberty of Getting Drunk

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your usually fair and interesting paper is marred by the first editorial note in the number for March 2 in which you say that Bishop Gailor "still bewails the loss of the liberty of getting drunk in the United States, which, of course, implies the liberty of another man to get him drunk." I am sure that neither Bishop Gailor nor any other decent man has ever made any such statement, nor anything that would imply it. Because with many others—the bishop and our Lord himself—the bishop maintains there is a use for wine, it is shocking to say that he believes in the liberty of getting drunk. It is strange that any sane person would put the temperate use of wine on a parallel with prostitution or the use of morphine. But our extreme prohibitionists seem to have become quite as reckless in thought and speech as alcoholists.

Division—Vertical or Horizontal

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The greatest evil of our times is not to be found in denominational divisions, as the Rev. Mr. Opie contends in an article in The Christian Century. Divisions rightly made are right and highly necessary. Division on merely speculative grounds is sheer rationalism and infidelity. Division on the ground of keeping the ordinances intact as originally practiced seems all unnecessary. Its true character is seen by applying the universal law both of Christ and of common sense, namely, "You shall know a tree by its fruits." The kind of division which has the sanction of common sense and experience, and of our holy scriptures also, is that which divides the work as the Christian company did when it set aside certain men to serve tables and others to proclaim the good news. Concerning such a division the apostle tells us that "the hand of Christ's body cannot say to the foot I have no need of you, nor can the eye say to the ear I have no need of you." The proper and necessary division is the division of labor in the things to be done. Many individuals in all branches of the present evil tree are willing of themselves to "serve tables," to be boot-blacks for Christ's sake, that is to be the feet or "uncomely" part of the body, who are not willing their "mother church" should be anything other than the eyes or ears or the whole face and head of all the sects. The evil thing about our Christian—anti-Christian—branches or cleavages is that they are cleft or broken off vertically, that is, from top to bottom, and have carried every stratum with them from sun-kissed soil and flora clear down to reptilian and sulphurous bottom. It is a common and truthful saying, "There are good and bad in all churches." That is because they have divided from the world mass vertically, that is on philosophy or speculation or treating the traditional ordinances either as dead uniform laws or as belonging to the spiritual order of liberty, as Christ dealt with the forms of Moses which had lost their original significance.

Now Christ does not break off vertically to select his elect ones, but horizontally. He sets the sheep on his right hand and the goats on the left. But we set the sheep and goats on the right hand and the goats and sheep on the left. So we have followed the world and are worldly. Who can wish to see the present worldly sects unite? Are we not worldly enough with every stratum of earthiness streaking every slice broken off? To cure sectarianism let us divide the work into sects or sections, that is, into committees formed with express adaptation for the work to be done in order to get the answer to our daily prayer, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as in heaven." Then as new members are received into the fold of Christ each would be assigned to a specific work. We should thus have a blessed horizontal division, with sheep and gold and wheat and fruit bearing trees on our right hand, and goats and dross and chaff and dead branches on the left. As wise master builders we would ask every convert: "Now believing with all your heart that Jesus is the Christ of God what function in his kingdom do you choose to perform?" The answer being given we would say: "We have divided into ranks as committees and you will belong to the division for the care of the poor or sick or ignorant, or to put away the liquor traffic, or do the work of training youth in the things of religion."

In a word, let the present denominations become committees, divided not as to territory but as to the work to be done, and let every one join that committee whose work appeals to the convert's conscience as important and to which he feels he is adapted. The old program of each sect trying to cover the whole field working, rather I should say playing, side by side with all the rest is the folly and sin of our day and has made of our good old Bible a mere scrap of paper.

And here is the great new work to be done at once. Let every young Christian lad be put under sacred pledge that he will never go to war with any nation, and let him pair off with lads of other nations so there may be no more complaint from the militaristic advocates than is necessary. We have missionaries in most countries through whom we can carry out such a program. It cannot be done by our old sects. This will heal our shameful divisions and end the curse of war.

The Intellectuals Defined

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I cannot let Mr. E. P. Baker of Argyle, Minn., close the subject of "Our Young Intellectuals," as he seems to have done in a recent letter to your columns, without pointing out his unintentional unfairness to them, due, evidently, to his ignorance of the special sense in which the word "intellectual" is used. I should like to quote, on this point, from an article on "The Revolutionary Intellectual," in the Atlantic Monthly for June, 1920, by J. Salwyn Schapiro, of the College of the City of New York.

Professor Schapiro explains the term thus: "I use the term 'intellectual' in the European sense as referring to a person of education and culture who is actively interested in radical and revolutionary movements. In this sense a scholar, no matter how learned and how devoted to his subject, is not an intellectual if he holds conservative views. A reader of Tolstoi, Marx, Ibsen, Shaw, and Sorel, no matter how young and superficial, is an intellectual, if his views are radical. I use these contrasts in order to emphasize the new meaning of the word, not to disparage the intellectuals, for among them are to be found scholars and thinkers and scientists of a high order of ability."

My personal comment would be that most church-going people have not half the religion of these "young intellectuals," to whom freedom of self-expression is the law of being. Their conceptions, their ideals, constitute for them a religion, though they do not recognize it as such. Schapiro says: "It is not only in social and political matters that the intellectual has taken an advanced stand. In philosophy he avows pragmatism; in art, futurism; in poetry, vers libre; in psychology, psycho-analysis. The subject in which he is not the least interested is religion. That is not even a private matter; it is no matter at all. He does not pay the church the compliment of being hostile to her."

Religion is to them of course associated with the church. And the church is today in the position of a person who, in the general conversation of a drawing-room, in which he has figured for some time to his own entire satisfaction, suddenly finds the conversation sailing over his head on a subject of which he knows nothing and cares less, though all the rest are interested in it. So he is ignored to his great discomfort. So the young "intellectual" does not mention the church, but "simply ignores it as a force incapable of good or evil," because it seems to him to have neither known nor cared about the social problems in which he is interested.

The hope of the situation seems to lie in the increasing number of "clerical intellectuals" in the church. They alone have it in their power, by taking a radical stand in the pulpit on social questions, to bring our fervid, artistic and literary young people to a new appreciation of religion and the church.

Where, Indeed, is the Man?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your journal is an inspiration. It is indispensable. And in your last issue, February 9, I was greatly interested in your several references to federation and the community church. I am also turning to your editorial on "The Community Church" and to Dr. Brunner's article on "The Country Church," in your issue of April 28, 1921. "The Country-Life Bookshelf" is now more than five feet long, and big men and women are making it longer. The famous articles on "Big Country Churches," by A. B. Macdonald in The Country Gentleman should have permanent form and wide circulation.

Now, what has been done, suggests what may be done. And there are tens of thousands of communities which want to be "shown" the real thing. Eventually they will adopt the idea and pay the price. Good-enough, twentieth-century, indispensable, country ministers will have no quarrel with salary.

Here is a community which may be made a lighthouse for thousands of other rural communities if the right man will come to us. Le Raysville, Pennsylvania, is an incorporated borough in Bradford county, in the northern tier, and which has national distinction in agriculture. Its population is of the best—of good old New England ancestry, proud of their schools and patient with their churches. No foreign element or undesirables in the community. Many farms have trucks, tractors, modern lighting, heating, milking machines, etc. The boys and girls go to higher institutions of learning and nineteenth century preachers won't do.

The village, in itself, is attractive, and is big enough to have the conveniences of "city" water, gas, etc. It has a furniture factory, foundry, newspaper, bank, big hotel, creamery, etc. Since the churches were federated, two years ago, we meet in the best and most commodious church building which was erected almost a century ago in a fine park right in the center of the town. The church building has since been modernized; has modern lighting, heating, opera chairs, chapel, kitchen, dining room, etc.

The churches of the town have had many admirable pastors and a few have acquired distinction. One of these was Washington Gladden. But as far as I know, none of these really visioned the new country church or the new country life. Real community spirit and a real community church have yet to be developed. We have as yet no man to fill the place as a real minister of the new country life in the twentieth century. Here is a splendid opportunity for a good-enough, big-enough, broad-enough, live-wire man. He must be a real man and a mixer; a man of character and culture; Christocentric rather than egocentric; a man of Christlike religion rather than narrow pietism and pharisaism. He must be more than a preacher, he must be a minister and community builder—a gracious tactful leader. He must have university spirit and abundant common sense. He must be a man who is thoroughly democratic, a real friend of publicans and sinners—one who honestly delights in, and intelligently loves the common people. These will hear him gladly, support his program and pay the salary. But he must have brains enough and heart enough to appreciate common humanity, even as did Jesus, Lincoln, Tolstoy, Burns, Riley, Mazzini, Gladstone, Livingston, Damien, Grenfell, “Ralph Connor,” and the other immortals.

The right man has an unusual opportunity to develop a community life which will be an inspiration to thousands of other country communities eager for the new country life. Where is the man?

Building Up the Church

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: From Lloyd Douglas to F. J. Gurney, I have read your correspondents' views on "Building up the Churches" with deep interest. May I add a suggestion or two on the subject. I cannot recall any passage in the New Testament where we are either commanded or instructed to add members to the church. That men and women were added by the Lord as they were saved through the preaching of the gospel, is of course recorded. That many persons, who were apparently not saved, crept into the church to its injury is recorded. All kinds of instructions are written in the word for the care and admonition of the church. Our Lord's commission was to carry the gospel into all parts of the earth, and as his followers did that God gave the increase. Ergo: If we who believe in, and love and worship our Lord will steadfastly, from pulpit and pew, in all our daily contact with our fellowmen as employers or employes or in any other way, by word and action tell the "old, old story," God our father will take full care of the increase. The psalmist says, "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." Have we not spent a great deal of labor in vain?

A NEW HYMNAL BY EASTER

WORSHIPFUL and beautiful services are now coming to be the chief desideratum in the churches. In these days the apostolic injunction to "let all things be done decently and in order" is being truly heeded. But have you ever entered a church where the building was of the best, where the sermon and other features of the service were according to the most refined standards, but where the hymn books used were actually shabby-looking?

Are you making an effort to conduct your services in a worthy manner — but with worn-out hymnals?

Why not a new hymnal by Easter?

Downtown Church Makes a Fine Record

First Christian church of Kansas City has been regarded by many as a declining enterprise on account of its downtown location, it being the oldest Disciples church in the city. Two fires put heavy financial handicaps on the church, but the record for the past two years has been little short of marvelous. Eight hundred new members have been received and a full program of activities using the building every day in the week have been developed. Dr. Arthur Braden, the pastor is also responsible for the Bible teaching of the Disciples Bible chair at the University of Kansas, and part of his week must be spent at the university. In his ministry is a fine combination of Christian scholarship and practical administrative sense.

New Testament Scholar Coming to America

Dr. James Moffatt, professor of church history in the United Free church, is coming to America in the spring. He is best known in this country for his translation of the New Testament, which finds an ever increasing use among religious people. His recent lectures on "The Approach to the New Testament" have been published in a book. Dr. Moffatt has a full lecture itinerary for March and April and it is expected that he will visit most of the important centers in this country.

How an Old Preacher Feels

Among the elder preachers of the country who are still on the job is Dr. Russell H. Conwell. He was interviewed recently on "How men who have passed seventy think about death and the life beyond." He said: "As I enter my eightieth year in a few days I feel anxious that the Lord will let me stay on earth until I have completed my plans for a high-class half-time university for the common people, which can be copied in any American city. It seems to me that then I can leave the temple like old Simeon and with gladness, 'Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace.' The sunset is brighter and more cheering than the morning. I deeply long to go on where I can meditate."

Pastor Found for Oldest Church on the Continent

Probably the oldest Protestant church on the continent is that at Plymouth, Mass. This congregation, which is now Unitarian, has called to its ministry Rev. Alfred Rodman Hussey. Mr. Hussey has been for a number of years the literary editor on the Christian Register. He spent fourteen years in Baltimore as pastor of First Unitarian church.

Socialist Sunday Schools a Feature in England

The socialist movement is far more significant in every country of Europe than in America. In England the socialist organization has inaugurated Sunday schools in which are taught the fundamental principles of the movement. A set of ethical principles has been worked out, and a catechism elaborated. While the ethical principles are not different from those of Christianity, there is added the fundamentals of economic teaching given by Karl Marx, and there is substracted the teaching about God and Christ which are characteristic of Christianity.

William Jennings Bryan Makes a Generous Gift

William Jennings Bryan has made a generous gift to the foreign mission board of his denomination. He offers to donate his home in Lincoln, Neb., which is a large house able to accommodate forty people, for the use of infirm and broken-down missionaries from the foreign field. The foreign missionary works on a salary which makes it impossible for him to accumulate much, and yet the church's provision for him in case of invalidism or old age has never been adequate. This has been recognized by Mr. Bryan in a way that should start the ball rolling in some of the other denominational camps.

Pew Rent Almost Gone Among Episcopalians

The Free and Open Church Association was organized in this country something over thirty years ago. Through its efforts, ninety per cent of the Episcopal churches of the country have abolished pew rents. Of 5,796 churches and chapels 5,221 are free. Rev. John A. Goodfellow has served as secretary of the organization for thirty-three years. St. Luke's Episcopal church of Evanston, Ill., one of the large churches of the country, recently abolished the pew renting system.

Dr. Swearengen Encouraged About the Church

Dr. Henry C. Swearengen, moderator of the Presbyterian church, has traveled very extensively all year and has come to some interesting conclusions with regard to the condition of the churches. He asserts that theological differences are not troubling the Presbyterians very much, but the outstanding difficulty in the way of church progress is to be found in the incapacity of some ministers to sense the new situation. He says: "I believe the church has today a firmer grasp of its own task, a better conception of what it must contribute, than it has had in a hundred years, and than other lines of effort possess. All of the great currents of thought at this moment are flowing in channels marked out by Jesus Christ. I have not heard one word of controversy on theological grounds for months, nor have I heard of anybody who has heard any. We have had our storms of controversy in the past, but the skies are remarkably clear today. As I come upon obstacles to more rapid progress, greater growth in numbers, more and better service for the public good on the part of the Presbyterian church, I think the more serious hindrance is the seeming inability of the ministers to sense the situation, to lead in work, to paint the visions, to grasp things that are all around and about them. Laymen seem to me to be far ahead of ministers. Our next steps as a church are to secure better trained workers."

Federal Council Secures a Negro Secretary

For the first time in the history of the Federal Council of Churches it has a negro secretary. The newly organized Commission on Race Relations has secured two secretaries, one a white man and the other a negro. Dr. George E. Haynes is the colored man. He is a graduate of Fisk University, taking a master's degree at Yale, and his Ph.D. at Columbia. He has taught sociology and economics at Fisk University, served the Y. M. C. A. as a secretary of the international committee, and was the founder and pioneer secretary of the National League on Urban Conditions among the negroes. The other secretary of the Commission on Race Relations is Will W. Alexander of Atlanta.

Wants Modernist Organization in Episcopal Church

Rev. J. McBride Sterrett, of All Souls' Episcopal church of Washington wants a modernist party organization within the Episcopal church in America. Observing the success of those who have organized to medievalize the church, he feels that these efforts should be met with a counter effort of the openly modern sort. Dr. Sterrett is so much in earnest in the matter that he has written a book called "Modernism in Religion," which is now on the press. He says: "A call for openness and for frankness of utterance on the subjects seems to be timely. A call for forming modernistic parties in all churches seems to be an imperative one. Let us stand by our church; accept our heritage in it, and yet organize a new party in full sympathy with the new learning; accepting the accredited results of modern biblical and historic criticism and daring to see old faiths in the light of the twentieth century. Thus we may help to make the church a more ministrant servant of the Master in his mission in the present age. I shall define a modernist as one who feels that he is the heir of all the ages, but on the plane of none; and an heir to increase the heritage by new methods"

English Heresy Trial Comes to An End

For a number of months the chief theological topic in England has been the beliefs of Dr. Major who had denied the resurrection of the flesh. While admitting that the fathers of "the undivided church" held to this dogma, he insisted on his right to believe in a spiritual resurrection. The bishop of Oxford who has tried the case has had for theological advisers Dr. Headlam, Dr. Lock and Dr. Watson. These have all insisted that a believer in personal immortality is not to be regarded as heretical for disbelieving the dogma of a fleshly resurrection. Meanwhile the high church party which initiated this heresy trial is rather sorry that it joined issue on such a vulnerable doctrine. Dr. Major has nowhere in his trial compromised his position, standing frankly on his right as a modern churchman to construe the creed for himself.

Appropriations to Armenia Cut

Although the conditions in Armenia this winter have doubled the responsibility of the near east relief committee, the committee was compelled to send a cablegram the other day cutting their appropriations 25 per cent. Dr. Charles V. Vickery who has a great gift in helping us all to visualize the actual conditions, has said that the effect of this cablegram was just the same as an order to line up on Broadway a hundred thousand children and shoot them down with a machine-gun. He contrasts the wealth and luxury of the nation's metropolis with the destitution and death of the Bible lands. The committee is making a supreme effort to continue to maintain the work in the orphanages for the hundred thousand children already admitted. The various famine committees find that even so terrible a thing as the death of millions by famine palls on the imagination of the world after a while, and the Christian mind tends to become just as callous and unsympathetic as the pagan mind in the presence of these tragedies.

Catholics Visualize the Road to Industrial Peace

While opposed in toto to the socialist movement throughout the world, the Roman Catholic church in America is making a most careful study of industrial questions and is reaching a viewpoint that is progressive and helpful. The National Catholic Welfare Council recently published "four outstanding and immediate requirements for industrial peace." They are: (1) Universal recognition of the living wage principle; (2) Freedom for labor unions to function effectively; (3) Reform in anti-social policies of many labor unions, which can be easily brought about once the union leaders recognize that the war against unionism has definitely ceased; (4) A comprehensive plan for conciliation and arbitration of disputes, established by law and involving authoritative decisions, but not compulsory acceptance of the decisions of either party."

John Hayes Holmes Takes Conservative Side of Debate

A debate over the relation of the church to industrial movements was staged in New York recently when Dr. John Haynes Holmes, Unitarian minister and well-known religious radical, faced Dr. Scott Nearing, a social radical. The discussion was concerning the question, "Can the Church be Radical?"

While churches have often used palliative measures, it was denied by Dr. Nearing that the church could be radical in the sense of applying a principle consistently. Dr. Holmes told of the many pronouncements of church bodies, of the labor churches springing up in various parts of the country, and he further expounded the fact that church conservatism is far more theological than economic. No judges had been appointed for the debate, but witnesses who were present throughout the entire discussion asserted that the very great preponderance of the applause was given to the preacher defending the church, which is regarded as a great advance over the attitude of radical audiences of a few years ago.

Merger of Sunday School Workers Is At Last Complete

After years of agitation and consultation the schism in the ranks of the Sunday school workers of America has been healed. The International Sunday School Association and the Sunday School Council of Evangelical denominations have voted to unite and as soon as congress passes appropriate legislation, the merger will be a legal fact. The name of the new organization is the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education. This organization will immediately appoint a committee on education composed of not over sixty members. Sets of professional workers will

is a book by Russ Webb, a westerner, with a new line of thought that analyzes our banking system with a new vision. It strips our banks of their cloak of mysticism and their air of dominance and lays bare their inner workings so that Mr. Average Man can see right through and beyond them. It discards time-worn conventionalism and places the banker in his proper place among us. It reveals the bank's privileges and duties toward the community and the individual, and then it shows why the goods are not—cannot be delivered. It outlines a systematic change in our monetary machine and directs how, step by step, it may be brought about. It points the individual to his own opportunities and responsibilities and then presents him with a manual of procedure. It is economic theory, plus practical business, told in the light of actual observation. Every progressive man or woman will read it. Single copy, postpaid, $1.00. Motor to Church All Year Round

First Congregational church of Mount Vernon, N. Y., has removed the last excuse of the stay-at-home. This church furnishes motor transportation all the year round to people who by reason of ill health, age or distance find it impossible otherwise to attend church. Thirty-six machines are subject to call, though they are not all needed every Sunday of course. The result has been a very interesting increase in attendance. Rev. Carl S. Weist, the pastor, originated the plan of reaching the whole town with motor cars. It is hinted that in addition to the help given to unfortunate people, the new plan affords a help to the resolution of the motorist who might otherwise be lured down the highway Sunday morning in place of attending church.

Student Volunteers Help Raise Money

The Disciples enterprise of raising ten thousand dollars in the state of Illinois for a steamer on the river Congo equipped for the comfort of women and missionaries who must often make a home on the boat for protracted seasons has resulted in much generous giving among the women's missionary societies of the state. A Streator society recently invited three members of the student volunteer band of Eureka College and these young people presented the need of the boat for African work with very telling effect.

Chicago Disciples Banquet Their Missionaries

No center in America is more popular for returned Disciples missionaries than Chicago. Every year a considerable group is to be found at the University of Chicago pursuing advanced studies. Chicago Disciples have often used these missionaries for special addresses, but on a recent evening a banquet was given in their honor. This interesting event was held at Jackson Boulevard church on the west side, and the various missionaries were presented for greetings and messages.

Religious Education Will Be Big Theme in Chicago

The last week in March religious education experts from various parts of the country will assemble to report on the workings of various programs of week-day religious instruction in connection with the public schools. The Religious Education Association, which was born in Chicago nineteen years ago, will also meet here at the same time. The Commission on Education of the Chicago Church Federation will hold a special meeting during the week at which Dr. George A. Coe will speak on "Religious Education and Political Conscience."

This will be a dinner meeting at the Auditorium hotel. The spiritually under-nourished child of America should be provided with abundant pabulum after these various meetings.

Dr. Mott Goes to the Orient with High Hopes

Dr. John R. Mott is connected with a number of Christian organizations, and one can scarcely think of any great missionary conference without his presence. He is chairman of the World's Student Christian Federation, chairman of the International Missionary Council in addition to his constant responsibility as general secretary of the international committee of the Y. M. C. A. Dr. Mott sailed from San Francisco February 21 to attend the conference of the federation in Peking April 4-9. The World's Student Christian Federation embraces nearly 200,000 students and professors in various parts of the world, though the major part are to be found in occidental lands. Dr. Mott says of the coming meeting: "The flower of the men and women Christian students of China, Japan, including Korea, India, Ceylon, Siam and the Philippines will be present. It is believed that the effect on the federation itself will be profound and far-reaching. Without doubt the federation is today too largely occidental. It needs that which will come from the message, experience and leadership of the prophets and Christ-like leaders and members of the student movements of the east."

Greek King Said to Favor Roman Catholics

The Greek King continues to oppose the election of Meletios to the patriarchate of Constantinople. It is said that the king has steadily leaned in the direction of uniting Greece with the Roman Catholic church. Whether this would be possible in view of the age-long protest of the Greeks against certain Roman attitudes remains to be seen. The king of Greece would like to see Meletios deposed, but the other Orthodox communions of the orient are loyal supporters of the new patriarch. It is said that Meletios has three great aims in his ecclesiastical policy: to set up intercommunion with the church of England, to secure American and English support in taking back St. Sophia's cathedral from the Mohammedans in Constantinople and the tying up of the destinies of the eastern peoples with the dominant nations of the world, the Anglo-Saxons.

Church Publicity Experiment Ends

Rev. Benjamin M. Brown, who has been in charge of the newspaper evangelism carried on the past winter in the Chicago Post, has resigned to accept other work, and a very interesting experiment has been discontinued. The commission on publicity of the Chicago Church Federation is considering the holding of a publicity institute some time during the spring. Rev. J. T. Brabner Smith, who is connected with Methodist publicity, is the chairman of the commission. The Chicago churches have made rapid strides in recent years in developing the methods by which their work may be known in the community, and the exhibition of printing samples is always interesting as exhibiting not only the way of telling a story but the story itself.

Dr. Ainslie Gets Approval of Nebraska Ministers

Dr. Peter Ainslie is the most talked of heretic in the Disciples communion this winter. He has been pilloried by conservative journalism, and his addresses reported stenographically in order to find some crumb of false doctrine. He recently visited the Ministerial Institute of Nebraska which is known to be more conservative than the average Disciples ministerial organization. After hearing Dr. Ainslie through several days, the ministers gave him and his organization a vote of confidence without a single dissenting vote and with only two ministers refusing to vote. This is one of the signs that the Disciples ministers, who in days gone by were known as outstanding advocates of liberty, are tired of wearing the blind-bridles furnished by certain reactionary powers.

Methodists Doubtful About Law Enforcement Man

Mayor Thompson of Chicago appointed a Methodist minister, Rev. J. F. Williamson, as law enforcement officer. The Methodist ministers at a recent meeting were asked to endorse the work of this officer but failed to take action. It developed in the meeting that there were two radically different points of view, some believing the appointment of Mr. Williamson was to catch the Protestant vote in the spring election, while others felt that the mayor is making an honest effort to clean up the city.

Popular Revival Movement in Scotland

A religious awakening that seems to be quite comparable to the Welsh revival has broken out in Scotland. The leader is a cooper by trade who has had none of the training for the ministry. Jock Troup is the leading spirit, but other young men have joined themselves to him for a preaching ministry. At the latest report these religious workers were preaching in Dundee to large audiences. Jock Troup lays no stress on mere emotionalism, but in accordance with Scotch character is making a strong demand for the giving up of sin.

Demand the Expulsion of Mormons from England

The Mormons have invaded England in large numbers with a force of workers who receive no salary from the Mormon organization, but who labor at their own charges. Recently the presence of these religious workers has revealed itself by the interest taken by certain young people in the movement, and the home secretary has been asked to expel the Mormons from the country. It is said that the present British strength is 158 workers and 7,000 converts. A Brit-

The Fundamentals of Christianity

By HENRY C. VEDDER

Professor of Church History, Crozer Theological Seminary.

The answer in detail that this book attempts to give to the question "What is Christianity?" is based upon three convictions: (1) that man's apprehension of the character of God has not stood still but has grown with his growth (2) that the highest forms of this progressive knowledge of God are found in the Old and New Testament literature and culminate in the words of Jesus as preserved in the Gospels (3) that the teaching of Jesus is, therefore, the standard by which all other teaching claiming to be Christian must be compared and, in case of conflict, rejected. It is the main object of this book to convince its readers that the parting of the ways has been reached with the Historical Christianity based on Paul as its authority which still has such wide vogue and that the future belongs to a Christianity that will determine its doctrines, program and methods on the authority of Jesus alone.

"OUR BIBLE"

By Herbert L. Willett

One of the most popular volumes ever published by The Christian Century Press. This recent book by Dr. Willett has been received with real enthusiasm by the religious and educational press of the country. The following are a few of the estimates passed upon the volume:

"Just the book that has been needed for a long time for thoughtful adults and senior students, a plain statement of the sources and making of the books of the Bible, of their history, of methods of criticism and interpretation and of the place of the Bible in the life of today."—Religious Education.

"Every Sunday school teacher and religious worker should read this book as a beginning in the important task of becoming intelligently religious."—Biblical World.

"The book will do good service in the movement which is now rapidly discrediting the aristocratic theology of the past."—The Public.

"The man who by long study and wide investigation, aided by the requisite scholarship and prompted by the right motive—the love of truth, not only for truth's sake but for humanity's sake—can help us to a better understanding of the origin, history and value of the Bible, has earned the gratitude of his fellow-men. This we believe is what Dr. Willett has done in this volume."—Dr. J. H. Garrison in The Christian-Evangelist.

"Professor Willett has here told in a simple, graphic way what everybody ought to know about our Bible."—Jenkin Lloyd Jones in Unity.

"Dr. Willett has the rare gift of disclosing the mind of the scholar in the speech of the people."—North-western Christian Advocate.

"Interesting and illuminating, calculated to stimulate and satisfy the mind and to advance the devotional as well as the historical appreciation of the Bible."—Homiletic Review.

"One can recall a half-dozen volumes having to do with the origin and the formation of the Scriptures, all of them valuable, but not one so practical and usable as this book."—Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones.

"This readable work distinctly illuminates both background and foreground of the most wonderful of books."—Chicago Herald.

"The book evinces an evangelical spirit, intellectual honesty and ripe scholarship."—Augsburg Teacher.

"Scholarly but thoroughly simple."—Presbyterian Advance.

"A brilliant and most interesting book."—Christian Endeavor World.

A new edition of this book, Dr. Willett's finest contribution toward a thoroughly reasonable study of the Bible, is just from the press.

ish newspaper reports an elder as saying that he believes in a plurality of wives, "but we don't think the time is ripe to practice it." War conditions have been the chief support of polygamy, and the present days when so many women have no prospect of marriage makes a revival of polygamous doctrine and practice possible.

Pioneer Missionary Killed by Bandits

Dr. A. L. Shelton, Disciples missionary who in 1920 escaped his brigand captors in western China, was killed recently by a new brigand band which had captured him. The cable news is brief, and up to the present time there is little in the way of particulars save that the tragedy occurred on February 17. Dr. Shelton was born in Indianapolis in 1875 but most of his childhood was spent in Kansas. He served in the Spanish-American war. Immediately after the war he was married, and obtaining a scholarship in the medical department of the University of Kentucky, he completed a four-year course in medicine. In 1903 he went to China under the direction of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, whose work is now carried on by the United Christian Missionary Society. Dr. Shelton was held for ransom by the band of outlaws in 1920, but refused to allow himself to be ransomed, as this would subject all other missionaries in the region to the danger of capture. He asked his captors to kill him, but his courage made such an impression on them that they did not dispose of him this way, but carried him about for forty days. He developed a tumor which nearly cost him his life, and was left by the bandits in a dying condition when he was rescued. Mrs. Shelton is in India at this time doing some translations, and had expected to rejoin her husband in Tibet when this translation work was finished. Dr. Shelton's daughters are in California in school. Two new missionary families went out with Dr. Shelton on this trip, Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Morse of Tulsa, Okla., and Mr. and Mrs. M. H. Duncan of Buffalo.

Veteran Disciples Minister Dies

Rev. I. J. Spencer of Lexington, Ky., died in a hospital in Peoria, Ill., recently following an operation. He was filling the pulpit at Eureka, Ill., when he was taken ill. His twenty-seven years of service at Lexington, Ky., in Central Church of the Disciples was the outstanding fact of his life. Last year he was given a retiring pension by his church equal to the full annual salary he had been paid, and his wife is provided for on the death of her husband with half this salary.

Would Set Up Family Altar in Every Christian Home

The Family Altar League, a non-sectarian, international organization which has been laboring for fourteen years in the interest of daily Bible reading and prayer in the home, announces in its annual report that in 1921 it passed the 50,000 mark in the number of homes in which it has been instrumental in establishing family worship. The league, in celebration of this attainment of its goal of years, has embarked on a new era of service. Its quota for 1922 has been set at 100,000 new homes maintaining the family altar. A literature is being prepared for the use of the churches. The organization makes its headquarters in the Marquette building of Chicago.

Baptists Will Build Million Dollar Structure

The Baptists of Rochester, N. Y., will erect a million dollar structure in the near future. The Baptist Temple will be wrecked and an office building will be erected several stories high which will include the auditorium of the Baptist Temple. The total project will reach a million dollars. At the same time it was decided to build a new Baptist church in the eastern part of the city at an expense of $75,000. Rev. Clinton Wunder is pastor of the Baptist Temple, and during his ministry a great advance in the work of the church has taken place. The presence of Rochester Theological Seminary in the city has helped to make the city of Rochester a strong Baptist center.

Movie Film Shows Work of the Minister

The Presbyterian Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation has produced a new film for the exploitation of its cause called "Soldiers of the Cross." The picture is in four reels and is adapted from the story by Thomas Nelson Page called "The Shepherd Who Watched by Night." The film has been reproduced to circulate from various centers so that most Presbyterian churches will during the year see the presentation of the picture. Mr. H. M. Rossiter is the custodian of the picture in Chicago.

Christian Endeavor Promotes Libraries

Among the many useful tasks performed by the Christian Endeavor societies of the land is that of conducting libraries. The Avondale Congregational church of Chicago has a society which has accumulated 500 volumes of modern books. Two members of the society serve as librarians, and anyone in the community may draw books. The cost of maintenance for six months has been five dollars. In addition to carrying on this library work, the denominational papers have been circulated through the church by the young people. In California a society has presented to the San Quentin penitentiary a library of a thousand volumes, which will be of great significance in the lives of the prisoners.

Organization Puts the Bible in Daily Papers

On January 1, 1920, there was incorporated in the state of Ohio the Back-to-the-Bible-Bureau, which has for its object to carry the Bible to the people through the medium of the secular press. How successful this work has been in the past two years may be seen from the following report of the organization: "The first insertion of a verse of Scripture for the bureau was made in a local paper January 1, 1920. From this small beginning the work has grown until today the bureau is serving 871 papers in this country, 26 in Canada, 2 in Hawaii, 2 in Alaska, 1 in the Virgin Islands, and recently the bureau filled a request for the service in far-away Korea. The combined circulation of these papers is something over 10,000,000, or the equivalent of 40,000 congregations of people of 250 each."

Methodist Superintendent Approves Federation

The federation of a Congregational and a Methodist church at Guilford, Conn., was approved by the district superintendent of the Methodist church last year, though some Methodist authorities in the middle west take the position that they will cooperate with no federated church which does not receive a Methodist minister from the conference. After a year of federation the annual report is now out and shows that the offerings to benevolent purposes have been doubled. The Methodists have sold their property and moved in with the Congregationalists. Formerly there were three churches in Guilford, and now there is one. To Rev. David N. Beach, Jr., much of the credit is due for the success of the federated church. Through his efforts two Congregational churches were united, and a federation with the Methodists set up.

Congregational Young People Recruited for Christian Work

In days gone by a good-many Congregational ministers and missionaries have come from other denominations. This will not be so characteristic of the denomination in the future if all Congregational centers follow the practice of the Chicago churches this winter. The Educational Society of the denomination has been holding life-work conferences in different parts of Chicago. The first two were held in Pilgrim church of Oak Park and in Bryn Mawr Congregational church. Two more will be held in Waveland Avenue church and LaGrange church. The conferences have been largely attended and great interest has been awakened in the young people on the subject of life investment.

Bishop Is Taken to Task

Bishop Gailor, president of the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal church, has been widely quoted as in favor of the repeal of the Volstead act. Rev. William H. Anderson of the Anti-Saloon League of New York, who is better known for his valor than for his discretion, has taken the bishop to task in a public statement in these words: "You say that since December you have attended five big formal dinners in New York and at every one of them there was red liquor in plenty. Were they Episcopal dinners? The Episcopal church in New York City has an un-

Great Books for Great Days

Toward the Understanding of Jesus

By VLADIMIR SIMKHOVITCH,
Professor of Economic History, Columbia University.

Problems of history are problems of understanding. The problem raised by the teachings of Jesus is—why such unprecedented teachings at that particular time? The first essay, therefore deals with the "fullness of time," for to understand that "fulness" is the task of history. The author interprets the particular circumstances and conditions that make so great an historical event as the insight of Jesus historically intelligible to us. "Rome's Fall Reconsidered," another of the essays, deals with a determining cause of the decay of that Roman world which historians have overlooked. One single major factor, the exhaustion of Roman soil and the destruction of the Roman provinces, sheds new light by which we see the outlines of the doom of Roman civilization.

"The most satisfactory book on this subject I have read," says John Dewey of this volume.

"An epoch-making book," says Prof. Charles A. Ellwood, of the University of Missouri.

Price $1.75 plus 10 cents postage.

THE PILGRIM

By T. R. GLOVER,
Author, "The Jesus of History," "Jesus in the Experience of Men."

"Few English writers on religious matters seem able to serve the unbiased and thoughtful reader so well as Dr. Glover, and many will gratefully avail themselves of the assistance of a layman who shows that he knows how they think and feel about religion, and can interpret the meaning of Christianity in terms they can readily understand."—Times Literary Supplement.

"A new book from Dr. Glover's pen is both a religious and a literary event. This volume should have a universal reading."—Editorial in The Christian Century.

"We strongly commend Dr. Glover's book to those who wish to study the power of Christ in the life and thought of men."—Canon Barnes of Westminster Abbey.

Psychology and the Christian Life

By PROF. T. W. PYM,
Head of Cambridge House.

Recent developments in the realm of the new psychology have called for a new statement of its application in the field of Christian faith. This Professor Pym has very ably and very completely done. It is not so much speculative and theoretical as a practical treatment of the subject. We have here a pioneer book in the art of applying the new psychology methods in Christian life. The eight chapters treat "Psychology and Common Sense," "Psychology in the World," "Faith and Suggestion," "The Psychology of Sin," "Christianity and Psycho-Analysis," "The Psychology of Jesus—His Practice," and "General Conclusions."

THE TRUTHS WE LIVE BY

By JAY WILLIAM HUDSON,
Professor of Philosophy in the University of Missouri.

Do the conflicting claims of modern cults and doctrines puzzle you? Can you see their relation to the old standards? Is there room for God, Immortality and Freedom in a world ruled by science and reason? Do the old truths hold for a New America? In plain, clear English an able philosopher answers these and other questions for practical people. He avoids dry theology and presents an extremely readable, comprehensive study of the moral background of the modern world. "The truths that have fashioned so many great men and great civilizations rise again with renewed power to solve a new world's problems and to build a new world-order," says the author.

Price $3.00 plus 12 cents postage.

ENDURING INVESTMENTS

By ROGER W. BABSON,
Author, "Religion and Business," "The Future of the Church," etc.

There are materials for sermons in this book by America's foremost statistical expert. Mr. Babson says in a hundred different ways that the one thing needful is to seek first the Kingdom of God." He holds that the present race for material possessions is wrong and leads to catastrophe.

Price $1.50, plus 10 cents postage.

Public Opinion and the Steel Strike

AN INTERCHURCH WORLD
MOVEMENT REPORT

Professor Alva W. Taylor, of The Christian Century staff, holds that this is a book which every community leader—especially ministers—must read, in order to play a helpful part in solving the present industrial problems which almost threaten to overthrow our civilization. Bishop McConnell was chairman of the Commission of Inquiry responsible for this report.

usual proportion of the wealthy, influential persons who today constitute the main respectable backing of the bootleggers and liquor criminals here, and most of the rectors of the leading Episcopal churches in this city have lacked the vision or the courage, or both, to take even as high ground as the judges of the country as represented by the judicial section of the American Bar Association, who say that such persons are "aiding the cause of anarchy and promoting mob violence, robbery and homicide."

Underlying Principles of Christian Union

The World Conference on Faith and Order hopes to hold a meeting in 1922 which it was not able to do in 1921 on account of lack of funds. The churchmen of the world are interested in the study of several underlying questions. These are stated as follows: "What degree of unity in faith will be necessary in the reunited church? Is a statement of this one faith in the form of a creed necessary or desirable? If so, what creed should be used, or what other formulary would be desirable? What are the proper uses of a creed or a confession of faith?"

Syracuse Baptist Church No Longer Requires Immersion

English Baptists have long practiced what has come to be called open membership, that is, the receiving of unimmersed Christians into membership, but the procedure has not been so general among Baptist churches of this country. Recently the Fayetteville Baptist church of Syracuse voted by a two-thirds vote to drop the requirement of rebaptism for membership in their church. Meanwhile the movement spreads among Disciples churches, a number of these churches in different sections of the country having adopted the "practice of Christian union," as it called in their communion.

Congregationalists Bring New Englander to Lead Illinois Work

Henceforth the Illinois Conference of Congregational churches will be led by a New Englander, Rev. C. C. Merrill, who was until recently superintendent of state work in Vermont. A large part of Congregational work in Illinois is in the city of Chicago, which is said to be the strongest Congregational city in the world. Many of the rural Congregational churches, like the rural churches of other denominations, have become weak and disorganized, and it is hoped that the new leader will know how to solve their problems.

Y at Shanghai Has Busy Program

If anyone doubted that the Y would catch on in foreign cities they have only to study some characteristic reports to see how mistaken they were. In Shanghai the association has been particularly active. A great many classes are conducted on various themes, chiefly in the study of the Bible. In a single typical week in the autumn 65 classes and meetings were held in the building, and the attendance at these gatherings was 2,263. Outside the building 36 meetings and classes were held, and at these gatherings the attendance was 2,080. Thus over four thousand Chinese young men were touched by the Y in a single week's work.

Religious People Will Bring Pressure on Congress

The ratification of the treaties elaborated in the recent Conference on the Limitation of Armaments is now before the Senate, and it is apparent that the approval of the various treaties will be opposed by many interests. Four great religious organizations of America have joined in sending a letter to the clergy of the nation asking that the ministers petition their congressmen in behalf of the treaties. The organizations joining in this effort are the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the National Catholic Welfare Council, the Central Conference of American Rabbis and the United Synagogue of America. Each minister of religion is asked to present the matter to his congregation and to interest lay people generally in the adoption of the treaties. President Harding is quoted as saying: "Either these treaties must have your cordial sanction or every proclaimed desire to promote peace and prevent war becomes a hollow mockery. If the senate does not advise consent, it will be futile to try again."

Notes and Comments

THIS is an age of propaganda, when many people expect and desire that the magazines and newspapers they read shall have a strong bias toward their own opinions, without much reference to truth or fact. Among these people, The Yale Review cannot hope to find its public, nor has it. Its appeal has been, and will be, to that great body of independent men and women who wish to know the facts and who like to see a free play of intelligence over all the questions of the day, whether in public affairs, science, literature or art. To this group The Yale Review appeals, and strongly. The Yale Review is at the forefront of the intelligent periodicals of the times. It is a quarterly bringing with it just that leisure which good reading demands, as well as the authority which longer preparation of articles insures.

IT DOES NOT forget the things of the Spirit, but gives a large place in its quarterly contents to essays and poetry that are of permanent worth and striking literary charm.

Reverend Dr. John Kelman, of New York, says: "The Yale Review has made a unique place for itself among the journals of America and it stands for a type of culture which will more and more prove itself to be one of the highest and most valuable influences in American life."

The price of The Yale Review is $4.00 a year. Published: January--April--July--October

For the Playwrights of Tomorrow — A Professional Course in

under the personal supervision of Theodore Ballou Hinckley, Editor of THE DRAMA (formerly of the University of Chicago),
assisted by the famous playwrights, critics, actors and producers,

is offered to a limited number of ambitious people. This is an unusual opportunity to take a personalized course in play writing, which is carefully supervised by recognized authorities in drama.

Personalized Critics of Your Plays

Your work will receive the individual attention of Mr. Hinckley. His criticisms will not be generalizations, but will be directed at your specific needs. He will dissect your plot, your characters, and your dialogue, and give you definite, constructive criticism and help.

The course covers from six months to a year, depending upon the speed of your work. You may decide that for yourself. Several busy professional people are doing the work in their spare time.

Throughout the entire course, the aim is toward completion of plays for professional production and not toward mere amateurish effort. You will be taken step by step through study courses, books, practice plays, criticisms, etc., from the simplest rudiments up to the actual completion of plays.

Producers Will Read Your Plays

If your manuscript has the endorsement of THE DRAMA, it will receive a reading by managers. Your plays will be analyzed by Mr. Hinckley with the idea of production in mind, and plays of real merit will be brought to the attention of producers.

Good Plays Earn Big Royalties

Many successful plays have made their authors rich. Lightnin', The Bat, The Lion and the Mouse and many others have earned many thousands of dollars. The income from The Bat is said to be more than $6,000 a week. If you have ideas and imagination, the practical dramatic technique and honest and competent criticism of this course should enable you to write a successful play.

You will be taught how the public taste in plays changes, both as to subject matter and its development. Through his broad study and experience, Mr. Hinckley knows what to stress and what to avoid. He can train you to sense the changing demands of the managers and the public.

The Theatre as a Pulpit

As a reader of The Christian Century, a magazine of ideas, it is probable that you have a reason for writing plays, which you consider of even more importance than fame or money—the wish to bring the truth about life effectively to the consciousness of many people. Correct dramatic technique is more essential to the thoughtful play than to those of a lighter variety, for there must be no trace of didacticism or preaching. Your play must present your opinions in such an attractive and skillful manner that the audience will be held spellbound by its dramatic power, and absorb your ideas without effort. The course in play writing will teach you how to reach people effectively and forcefully.

Limited Enrollment

Only a limited number of people can enroll, since the work is so highly personalized.

Fill out the coupon and mail it for complete information at once. The low cost of enrollment, together with the details of the instructions, will please you. You will see how different this is from ordinary courses. Ensure your place in the class.

67% reduction on Wells' Outline of History. And you can pay for it, if you like, at the rate of only a few cents a month. But you must reserve your copy by clipping the coupon now—to-day!

Was this the flood of the Biblical Story?

The most terrific catastrophe of ancient times occurred twelve thousand years ago.

There was no Mediterranean Sea then; only a rich and fertile valley filled with men and women whose life seemed easy and secure.

One day, without warning, the water came. The Atlantic Ocean burst its walls and swept into the valley, engulfing the tribes. Torrents of rain from the melting ice of the North swelled the inundation. Terror stricken men and women fled to higher ground, but the water followed faster, and where the peaceful valley had been there was a blank, silent sea and nothing more.

Did any fugitives escape this wholesale destruction? Were their memories of those awful days interwoven with the legends of the tribes to which they fled? Was it from this that humanity gained its story of the flood which is a part of the sacred literature of so many lands?

The interesting thing about H. G. Wells' Outline of History is that it makes everything you have ever read before more interesting and valuable to you. Into that master story he has woven all the fragments of knowledge which we busy modern folks have picked up here and there in our education and reading. All that we have read in school; all that we read in fugitive books; all the events of the day's news—these find their place and relationship in the great story of humanity's progress, told by the greatest modern story teller and historian.

H. G. WELLS' "Outline of History"

Now Offered You at One-Third the Original Price

Perhaps you think the Roman Empire existed long ago—perhaps you think of the old Greek and Roman civilization as "Ancient History."

Not a bit of it. Compared with the many centuries of life that Wells tells about, these empires flourished only yesterday. Wells begins at the real beginning and down through the centuries he carries you, upsetting fairy stories that you have heard all your life—amazing you often; startling you in almost every chapter; but entertaining you on every page as you have never imagined that you could be entertained by history. This is Wells; and we offer him to you now at

A Bargain You Will Never Get Again

"The man who finishes this volume will be an educated man, however much, however little he knew when he started."—Baltimore Evening Sun.

There you have it in a sentence—the reason why 250,000 men and women have paid $10.50 for Wells' Outline and felt they were getting it cheap. The Outline is more than a history—it is an education—the orderly knowledge of human progress which men go to college four years to get—and often come away without.

Voluntarily Wells has slashed his royalties 85% and entered into a contract with the Review of Reviews by which a new edition of the Outline can be offered to Americans—to you—at one-third the original price.

Think of it—the original plates and illustrations; but revised by Wells himself and printed in one handy thin paper volume instead of two. Nothing omitted; better than the original, because it has been improved by Wells himself.

There Is Just One Condition

Only one condition we make—that you send in your coupon at once. The presses are running, the books are streaming in from the bindery. But we must know now how many to print. We cannot supply those who come too late.

As the New Republic truly says: "The Outline is too big even for publishers' superlatives." Without superlatives, therefore, let us say very earnestly: If you want the opportunity of examining Wells' Outline free in your own home for a week, do not lay this page down until you have made your reservation by clipping the coupon.

And The Review of Reviews Too

For Thirty Years the Standard of Usefulness and Authority.

Where Wells' story leaves off, the Review of Reviews takes up the record of human achievement. His is the history of the past; the Review of Reviews records and interprets for you the story of today. It is fitting that the two should be joined together; and only by joining them can we make the remarkable offer detailed on the coupon below.

What's the Matter with Chicago?

By George C. Sikes

THE FUTURE OF THE

Foremost thinkers in the American Church will discuss

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY announces a thorough-going and unhampered discussion of fundamental questions dealing with the basic structure of the church, and leading up to no less searching an inquiry than this:

Is the Church as We Now Have It a Competent Organ of Religion as We Now Conceive It?

The discussion will start with a searching examination of the forces and tendencies in the larger units of organized Christianity—that is, the several denominations. ¶ Are the denominations still characterized by their original genius and significance, or have their distinctive ideas and aims passed over into the common possession of Christendom? ¶ How do the issues define themselves in the several denominations with respect to modern theology and the new social vision? At what peculiarly sensitive spots in each denomination does modernism clash with tradition? ¶ Is the denominational apparatus equal to the great task of present day Christianity? ¶ Are the present denominational groups moving toward a general coalescence, or toward further splits into still more denominations? Or is the entire denominational order moving toward collapse to make way for a distinctly different type of religious organization? The scope of the discussion is indicated by the following partial list of themes and writers:

The Future of the Methodists

Inside View, by DR. ERNEST F. TITTLE, minister of Methodism's cathedral church at Evanston, Chicago.

Outside View, by DR. WILLIAM E. BARTON, a Congregationalist, moderator of the Congregational National Council.

The Future of the Baptists

Inside View, by DR. W. H. P. FAUNCE, president of Brown University.

Outside View, by BISHOP FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, a Methodist.

The Future of the Congregationalists

Inside View, by DR. ALBERT PARKER FITCH, professor of the History of Religion, Amherst College.

Outside View, by DR. LYNN HAROLD HOUGH, a Methodist, minister Central church, Detroit.

Other denominations—UNITARIAN, LUTHERAN, ROMAN CATHOLIC, FRIENDS, and still others—will be included in later announcements. The examination will be carried to the very foundations of the denominational system. Pro and con, the relation of denominationalism to Christianity will be considered, introduced by two articles:

“An Apologetic for the Denomination”

By BISHOP THOMAS NICHOLSON of the Methodist Church

“The Denomination as a Hindrance to Religion”

By DR. OZORA S. DAVIS, president Chicago Theological Seminary

THIS GREAT SERIES IS ABOUT TO BEGIN PUBLICATION!

DENOMINATIONS

is theme in The Christian Century during the year 1922

NEVER in the history of American religious journalism has there been so eager and widespread a response to a program of complete freedom in the discussion of Christian themes as that which The Christian Century is receiving. Thoughtful churchmen, both lay and clerical, in all communions are enthusiastic subscribers. They rejoice in a journal of religion which, without displacing denominational organs, undertakes squarely to face the problems of this new age without regard to denominational interests. The discovery—and it has been a discovery—that a periodical can be religious and at the same time free, positive and at the same time liberal in its hospitality to all enlightened points of view, has seemed to thousands of unsatisfied hearts like coming upon a refreshing spring of living water in a desert place. The influence of The Christian Century extends into all the communions of the American church. It is equally at home among the Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Disciples, Baptists, Episcopalians and other Christian groups. Its subscription list is an album of the signatures of the church leaders of the nation. Besides, it is gripping the minds of thinking men and women who have no church connection. They are astonished that from within the church which they supposed had become moribund and incurably denominationalized in its vision there should emerge a journal loyal to the church, devout and evangelical, and at the same time as free as a university class room. And they stand amazed to find themselves actually enjoying a religious paper! Churchmen and earnest minded non-churchmen are saying that The Christian Century is pointing the way toward a new day for Christian faith and practice.
